Mae thinks back to her life before she began her research, and laughs. "Did you ever see a movie called The Garden of the Finzi-Continis? It's about a wealthy Jewish family living in Italy during the emergence of fascism. We weren't quite that wealthy. Let's say we were 'comfortable.' My activities were centered around my husband, our children, and our home. I was also reading the newspapers, watching the cold war: the Rosenberg case, and the Alger Hiss case.

"I was watching Nixon. I had a strong philosophy about raising children before I began studying political assassinations. The two are related. You can't make the world safe while you are raising a bunch of mad bombers.

"I went to Stanford University and got married a few weeks before graduation. I majored in philosophy. We studied Plato, Nietzsche, Emerson and Thoreau—yet the professors didn't seem to understand anything about real life. Those were the war years, 1940 to 1943. Hitler was raising a Holocaust all over Europe—but we were upper middle-class children, so we studied medieval history. We spent a lot of time learning to distinguish between Rembrandt, Degas and Picasso. It was as if the world outside didn't exist.

"Before that? I grew up in Beverly Hills and went to Beverly High. We sat around swimming pools with movie stars' kids, played backgammon, went to polo games. All of a sudden, there was Hitler killing Jews. My father is a rabbi, but we never discussed Jewishness until after Hitler was gone. Like most cultural groups in the United States, we were never encouraged to respect our own cultural heritage. Yet the Jews have made many important contributions.

"People sometimes wonder how an ordinary housewife like me could get so interested in the John F. Kennedy assassination. But nothing just happens. There has to be a time when you begin to think and feel an emotional climate of caring about people, a nurturing place where you give a damn. If you repress your children, slap them, ignore them, dump them in front of the TV, go away and leave them with strangers, you are not nurturing them to be sympathetic to other people. That's where my head was when Kennedy was assassinated. I was worried about my children and what sort of society we were living in where this murder could take place.

"I didn't believe the official reports because there were too many discrepancies. I was taking the morning and evening papers then. I also had a number of magazine subscriptions. I clipped and saved articles from the day Kennedy died. Gradually, I increased my newspaper subscriptions to include the New York Times and the Washington Post. Now I take eight newspapers a day. I get a better perspective on what is happening all over the country. Stories that are left out of one paper often get into another one.

"In September, 1964, the Warren Commission Report came out, and I read it very carefully. Lee Harvey Oswald interested me. Twenty-three adjectives were used to describe him in the Warren Report.

They said he had no friends, no meaningful relationships, couldn't hold a job, and so on. But the evidence all pointed in the opposite direction. So I bought the 26 volumes of the Warren Commission hearings and began studying them.

"My husband never tried to discourage me. In many ways, he helped me. I could have any book or magazine subscription that I wanted. But my new interest in political assassinations definitely drove a wedge into our marriage. He couldn't see why it was so important to know who murdered John F. Kennedy. And I think most men would begin to resent the time I withdrew from entertaining our friends and devoted instead to what became serious, full-time research. We were divorced four years ago.

"I had gone through a drastic role change. But people do change partners today, when their interests change. If your mind leads you to follow a new belief, and your mate goes with you, that is beautiful. Otherwise, you need the courage to go it alone, or you will meet someone who is on the same trip, and so you continue on that trip with him.

"The people I admired most were Frank Lloyd Wright, Carl Sandburg, Henry Miller, Bertrand Russell, Emerson and Thoreau. They cared about people—how they live and relate to each other. They were calm and placid. They served humanity and tried to turn people on to the truth."

"It seems like a long jump from philosophy to the Warren Commission hearings," I said. Mae nodded. "Yes, but it's a question of survival. I studied the hearings for two years. And I perceived a certain way of questioning witnesses, so that they never got to the point. It is the same technique that was used in the Watergate hearings: you don't push too hard because you might elicit something that you don't want others to know.

"Albert Jenner was on the Warren Commission, and he is now busy helping as Nixon's counsel on impeachment procedures. Other members of the Warren Commission team that covered up the JFK assassination conspiracy ten years ago are in power now.

"I developed a cross-filing system, which grew as I went through the 26 volumes of testimony. I personally believe the JFK assassination was an intelligence operation and that Oswald was a government agent. I'd like to do a book on Oswald, showing how our society can take a person into military service, train him, set him loose and use him—then turn its back, lock him up, or kill him when he has done his work. Oswald was expendable, a 'throw-away person.' If you care for my view, he was framed, defamed and then murdered.

"I will do another book called Decoy into Patsy about Oswald and Arthur Bremer, the alleged would-be assassin of George Wallace—and Sirhan Sirhan, James Earl Ray, Charles Manson, Juan Corona. All of these are political assassinations, conspiracies. Would you accept the supposition that they all follow similar patterns? Once you have solved the first one, it is easy to figure out the others. The most difficult thing for people to understand is the use of the prison system to bury living human evidence of political conspiracies. Yet once the concept is understood, it provides the key to unlock every case.

"Even though there is a wide pattern of conspiracies, it doesn't involve a large number of people. Fewer than one-half of one percent of the population is involved. The biggest problem for the researcher is that the average person can't even conceive of the possibility of conspiracies. But if enough people realized the truth, they could end the devastating process that has kept us constantly at war to protect the financial interests of a small group of people. It has driven 50,000 of our young men into permanent exile, and killed another 50,000 American soldiers, as well as countless thousands of innocent people in other countries. It has ruined our economy and is now leading inevitably to a bloodbath in our own country."

I asked whether she thought Nixon's tape transcripts would have some effect on people's thinking.

"Of course. They follow the same pattern as the Warren Commission hearings. Evidence has been chopped up, destroyed, deleted, shredded or deep-sixed. This is what they did with JFK's autopsy. X-rays were never developed, the original autopsy papers were burned, the car interior was destroyed immediately, and JFK's brain was hidden away so researchers couldn't find out about the bullets.

Remember Sally Harmony and her shredding machine, L. Patrick Gray destroying the contents of Howard Hunt's desk, Mrs. James McCord burning typewriter ribbons from the White House while a C.I.A. agent stood 'innocently' by? The only reason you destroy these things is to hide the fact that you have done something illegal. For the guilty, the crime of destroying evidence is less serious than the crime you are hiding."

"It seems difficult for many people to take what you are saying seriously," I ventured.

She laughed again. "There are many reasons why people won't examine these questions. Some people feel they lack the capacity to understand what is happening. Others believe they are just doing their job and don't want to get involved. Another group fear they would be in danger. They don't realize that whether they like it or not, America could be like Vietnam for the next ten years. An elite group feels that changing the system might be bad for their profits.

"But while there may be little profit in investigative work, there is no poverty in it. I can go out and lecture on what I have learned about conspiracies. Woodward and Bernstein won a Pulitzer Prize for taking a position against the whole administration. There is money in truth these days, although for years you couldn't give it away. I think people are hungry for truth and bored with lies."

I asked whether she had any suggestions for women who might want to get more involved themselves, but didn't know where to start.

"A woman could start with her morning paper, like I did. She has to throw away the programmed assumption that because she is a woman, she can't figure things out. She could learn more about the things that interest her, write to her congressmen and correspond with prisoners. It is up to women to force society to change, because the men aren't doing it.

"I began with one book and gradually built up a collection of information so comprehensive that people come from all over the world to see it. And I am not endowed with special brains. I just sat back and asked myself, 'What is life about? And what do I want out of my life?' What I want is to know the truth about the world I and my children live in."

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

THE MURDER OF JOHN BELUSHI

(World Watchers International broadcast, March 21, 1982.)

When John Belushi died, there was a wave of confusion in Los Angeles for the first week or so from the coroner's office and police officials concerning the cause of death. A week later, the headlines delivered a fait accompli—that he was always drunk, a slob, took drugs all the time. He had this expensive drug habit.

I didn't know John Belushi, but he was very successful, just as many rock musicians died at the peak of their success, at the crest when they were about to do better things. This death follows the same pattern.

He was about to make, with partners, two very important and highly political movies. One was to be called Blue Moon Over Miami, and it was to be directed by Louis Malle, the fellow who directed Atlantic City, nominated for an Academy Award—and also My Dinner with André; it's been suggested this was the best picture of the year. Malle is a serious director. The script was written by highly successful and well-known writer, John Guare.

So one of the movies that Belushi was about to make was a comedy about the FBI and drug smuggling from Colombia to Miami. And he would play the role of the drug dealer, an informer for the FBI, and then the FBI agent becomes the drug dealer. That is, you must admit, a very controversial movie because the state of Florida depends upon the drug market. It is probably the biggest going industry in Florida, and also the United States.

And these people don't appreciate comedy.

And the network of assassination teams and drug dealers selling poison drugs comes from headquarters in Hollywood and Miami.

Belushi was also in Hollywood to make a movie called Noble Rot, and he was to be with his good friend Don Novello, Father Sarducci. Now, Father Sarducci and John Belushi were making a movie about the wineries in California, dominated by the mob. They are trying to establish social acceptance, and this was to be a comedy about the Italian Mafia. Noble Rot, you can imagine what that is by the title alone.

So if you think that Belushi was not overly-political, forget it. In the past, he made fun of the Establishment. And to make fun of the Establishment is lethal.

Incidentally, Belushi had bought a $400,000 home up at Martha's Vineyard—he had 2,000 feet of ocean-front land and eight-and-a-half acres. He bought it in 1979 from former Defense Secretary Robert McNamara. When you read that a man had $2 million in life insurance, and has a $400,000 home that belonged to Robert McNamara, he wasn't just drugging and goofing off, his lazy, sloppy, sleazy image. After he was dead, the articles came out, the mess he lived in, the dirt. To get into productions, you have a commitment to be on time. Millions of dollars are invested in you. You have a schedule you keep, and while it looks like fun and games on the screen, and I'm sure there is plenty of goofing off, there were also a lot of brilliant laughs—and plans and commitments to schedules and sense of timing. The image given after he was dead was the big slob who almost deserved to die in his own vomit. But that wasn't John Belushi. His success, what he earned and what he was saying speak loud and clear. All the rest is garbage. You don't have to believe the cover stories once the fellow is dead.

Three nights before he died he was on LaCienega Blvd. near Wilshire, just bordering Beverly Hills. He was with a cab driver who gave an interview. It was late at night. They were sitting at a counter at a sandwich shop, and there was a newspaper there. They both were looking at it, and he asked Belushi, "Which part do you want, 'Sports,' 'Entertainment," or 'El Salvador'." And Belushi said: "I want El Salvador." He went on to say that he hated what he read in the news, that he hated Hollywood, that they're a "bunch of pricks. I want to get back to New York City." And he said that he wanted to stay there.

They went to Belushi's car, where he had a lot of cocaine in the glove compartment. But the driver said Belushi was unhappy, fearful of his environment, that he wanted to get back [to New York]. I think that about describes it. There was another article published about him, that he didn't want to stay in Hollywood. The last night before he died, Belushi said to somebody, "I'm going home to Judy tomorrow"—that's his wife in New York—"I want to get out of here."

I'm sure that he sensed some danger, just as Elvis Presley was poisoned until he died. Or John Lennon was kept secluded and isolated in an apartment, and the minute he emerged, he died.

Belushi, when he was in Hollywood, was bounced around the drug scenes and a lot of hard people, a very sleazy element that could entrap him later. He expressed the idea that he would leave the next day, evidently drop the movie and go back to New York. But that next day never came.

He'd hired bodyguards. The studios wanted to keep him from using cocaine. If he did indeed have it, they wanted to keep him clean.

Well, Nelson Rockefeller, vice president of the United States, had bodyguards who weren't around when he died. Robert Kennedy had a bodyguard, Thane Cesar from Lockheed, who was behind him when the fatal bullets were delivered to the back of his head. Bodyguards often let people through the door who shouldn't be there. It's a question of the agencies that employ them.

Who was looking after Belushi? Two nights before, someone came to his home - Evelyn Smith—the same woman who would be with him when he died. She was kicked out.

She reappears … and she's one of the major suppliers of drugs to the Hollywood stars. Her behavior at the death scene was questionable—not only was supplying narcotics a crime, but not calling 9/11 or the police or the hotel desk is irresponsible; she was there when he died, went away for a couple of hours, returned. Smith didn't call anyone. She let the bodyguard, who appeared at 12:30 p.m., find the body, even though Belushi was dead when she walked out.

So, again, who were the security guards?

Another article in the paper: "John Belushi Felt Tragically Alone." He was paranoid that he was being used. It's probable that ever since he appeared on Saturday Night Live and did impersonations of famous people, he was placed on an enemies list. He was that political. The last performance of Saturday Night's original group was [so radical], a friend asked me how they got away with it. The next day, the whole group was fired, and it was reported that they were "too political." The whole group was broken up.

Sure, he was followed and used by people. I'm sure that he was prepared by this milieu around him to be done in if he continued to be political. And the two movies that he was going to make were so highly political that it would be imperative to see that he didn't gather any further fame and notoriety.

Noble Rot means the "noble" priest, Sarducci, and the rottenness of the winery people. You can imagine how popular he was with the wine people behind the Hollywood studios and the drug scene.

And, again, the movie Blue Moon Over Miami. I must repeat, these are not popular subjects to make movies about.

The papers reported that John Belushi died alone in bed, nude, in a fetal position. Lieutenant Dan Cook of the LAPD said, "it appears to be natural causes. There were dark blotches on his arms caused when blood starts to settle, and not by needles." That was the first report. Then the police said it appeared he choked on his tongue.

John Belushi died on Friday. On Saturday there were more articles about food, choking, natural causes. Heart attack was a possibility. No sign of drug usage. The hotel clerk said his heart evidently failed him. The room was neat, the actor in bed, his clothes neatly folded as though he had gone to sleep for the night. There was nothing out of order, "no reason to suspect foul play."

He was in good health the night before, according to witnesses.

By Sunday, Los Angeles coroner Thomas Naguchi—the controversial Naguchi who was fired after this case—was telling reporters, "the cause of death has not yet been determined."

"Discounting his lifestyle, he seems to have choked on food."—that was the San Francisco Examiner (March 7). He was at the Roxy nightclub the night before he died, and the owner of the club said that he hadn't taken any drugs.

On Monday, the newspapers reported: "More Tests Needed to Determine Cause of Death."

The Houston Post reported that Belushi was under examination, they were inspecting his heart.

They said he ordered breakfast: "whole wheat toast, jelly, a pot of coffee and freshly squeezed orange juice." He had breakfast on the terrace. Now, Evelyn Smith ordered the breakfast, and at 10:30, when Belushi was nice and dead, she went out for breakfast, she said. But it's obvious that from 6:30 to 8:00, when it was ordered, he was not in any condition to eat.

On Monday the cause of death was still undetermined. Slides of tissue had to be taken, more pathology of the body. Dr. John Holloway—a doctor who worked on the autopsy of Senator Robert Kennedy—entered the case and insisted that parts of the body would have to be removed and internal organs examined to determine if the cause of death was a heart attack.

Now, if Belushi overdosed on narcotics, and there was a mess of needles, cocaine and heroin littering the place as reported 10 days later—the first five days it was reported that there were "no drugs" involved—then the search for a heart attack was superfluous. The doctor from the Robert Kennedy autopsy said that the evidence "may not be so visible," so the tissue "must be tested, and full anatomic evidence presented."

"It may be myocardial infarction, or a coronary attack," Dr. Holloway said.

So they weren't so sure.

Tuesday: No comment on Belushi, a second round of tests for toxic substances and evidence of disease on samples of tissue taken.

On the sixth day, March 10, they still didn't know what killed him. There were interviews. The police said there was a powder resembling cocaine on the nightstand; his body had needle marks likely to be from intravenous injection of cocaine.

Seven days after his death, it was an "overdose of drugs." Chief of Police Gates in Los Angeles said he didn't know about an overdose; he had been informed that the musician-actor died of "natural causes." On this day, "Signs of Drug Usage on Belushi's Body" were reported. He had been stuck with "a needle." One report stated that there were numerous needle marks, another reported only one—and yet another said the dark spots were from blood clots.

And then the official autopsy report came out—and that was the shocker, because it contained very little information related to questions that should have been asked.

The L.A. Examiner: "Official Report on Belushi Death"—"At 1:00 am, he went to a private bar. He stayed there and was driven back to his room, where he vomited, and was pale and sweaty."

He was immediately sick—and then indulged in wine and cocaine. There was no evidence of sickness when the police first entered the room. They thought he had a heart attack.

At 3:00 till 3:30 am, friends arrived; people came, according to the report. We don't know how many, and they are not named. We don't know how many there were. They arrived at the hotel and stayed about 30 minutes.

That would be the time when he was injected with the “cocaine or heroin.”

By 6:30, he was having hot and cold flashes, took a shower.

At 8:00 a.m., he fell asleep shaking and wheezing. Evelyn Smith entered the hotel room, and at 9:30 she heard him struggling for breath.

He was terrified and very sick.

She hears a terrible noise, and he pleads: “please don’t leave me.”

At 10:15, he falls asleep, so she walks out, leaves him “to get something to eat.”

He knew that he was dying, but she walks out.

At 12:30, Belushi’s physical therapist come in, the body was still warm. He was pronounced dead.

Belushi had “congestion of the lungs, liver and spleen, swelling of the brain and heart, arteriosclerosis, distended bladder,” and they threw in “obesity”; he weighed 220 pounds. All of this should have showed up in the first autopsy. It doesn’t take 7-10 days to find all of this, and the enlarged brain (the weight was given in the autopsy report) would have been tremendously painful.

He was writhing in pain. When Ms. Smith left the hotel room, he was covered with a blanket and there was foam coming out of his mouth. He swallowed his tongue. And the eyes rolling—in fact, a friend who entered the room said, “I closed his eyes, because I couldn’t stand to see them open.”

So she would have seen easily that he was dying, the terrible set of symptoms. And she walks out and leaves. Then she comes back, the police hand-cuffed and took her away. Then they released her, and she becomes a super-star, goes to New York City for an interview at ABC, does an article for Rolling Stone.

Cathy Evelyn Smith was not charged with any role in Belushi’s death. There was no mention of collusion, but the unidentified guests who arrived at 3:00-3:30 a.m. were a clue that something was amiss.

The first reports that he was taking drugs—the police chief and coroner didn’t mention it—came from the ABC network. A lawyer for ABC is Gregson E. Bautzer, one of the attorneys retained by Howard Hughes (at the time that HE was drugged, silenced and possibly murdered. Greg Bautzer is the law partner of Frank Rothman at MGM, the domain of Kirk Kerkorian and Fred Benninger, chairman of MGM Mirage.)

ABC had “inside information” and worked closely with teams involved in other mysterious, drug-related deaths. The coroner came along after the ABC reports and stated that Belushi overdosed by “intravenous injections of heroin and cocaine.” The report stated that Cathy Evelyn Smith was with him when he died.

Is she responsible for his death if she sees him writhing in pain, obviously dying, foaming at the mouth, choking? She didn’t call 9/11, didn’t run to the front desk.

The article in the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner reported: “Belushi may have died before the woman left him.”

Where does murder begin and leave off?

What was her responsibility?

Who were the people in the room?

This was a very political, highly successful person offed in Hollywood. Smith left him to die. There were fresh multiple injection marks on both arms. There was no evidence of scarred veins in either arm. He’d been only recently injected. The body was still warm.

She ordered breakfast at 8:00, went out for breakfast again at 10:30. He turns up dead. She doesn’t call anyone, lets him be found.

Tom Gerald flies her to the Essex Hotel in New York City with her attorney, and puts her on ABC-TV’s 20/20. The “Mystery Woman” is described as a known “drug dealer” in Hollywood, supplies big celebrities with narcotics. When they die, shouldn’t she be questioned?

John Belushi didn’t trust her. His bodyguard kicked her out two nights before he died.

“I don’t believe the story,” Belushi’s wife said.

The night after he kicked Smith out, Belushi told friends he wanted to get out of town because he didn't feel safe.

He felt he was in danger.

She suddenly appeared at the "unnamed club" above Roxy's in the autopsy report. Belushi is visited by unnamed people. There are anonymous sources of drugs. The LAPD only made a cursory search for the source and announced that no charges would be filed.

An unnamed rock star was with him shortly before he died—not mentioned in the autopsy report—and said: "there wasn't a needle present anywhere."

His doctor said there were no needle marks on him prior to the fatal injection. (Belushi had recently been to the doctor for treatment of ear, nose and throat problems.)

There were no "multiple" needle punctures, no scarring of the veins, no proof that he had been a junkie. He may have taken cocaine and marijuana—they are all over Hollywood—but certain segments of society are dying.

His wife said immediately, in an article printed by the Chicago Sun-Times: "Something weird happened. That woman was thrown out two days ago. John told Bill to throw her out. John wasn't a junkie."

Evelyn Smith was with Gordon Lightfoot for a short while in Toronto. She moved to L.A. in 1978 for the drug scene. And Judith Jacqueline Belushi wanted to know "where she came from, who is this woman, what was she doing there, and how does she appear the night that he dies?"

Smith was with Belushi until he was dead—and, of course, the obvious move was to not call the police. (When Nelson Rockefeller died, Megan Marshack, his staff assistant, was present and didn't call the guard or chauffeur outside the door, or 9/11 or the hospital—she called Poncitta Pierce, who lives down the street, and she comes over, and the two of them talk it over and decide to call police … when he's good and dead.)

The newspapers reported later that police were searching for the source of the drugs—how far did they have to go. All they had to do was ask the "Mystery Woman."

He begged her not to leave. She left Belushi … who was supposedly so heavily into drugs that they there all over the place.

But the police didn't find drugs and powder and needle marks at that time.

She reappeared two hours later and brought the drugs with her—then she could spread the cover story that she took them with her when she left. And she did confess: "I didn't want to leave [a drug stash behind] because the maid might find it."

If a woman is a drug dealer, and the police are coming because a man is dead, the last thing she would do is incriminate herself by walking in with a stash of cocaine and drug paraphernalia.

Why did she bring it all back and lay it in front of them—unless she knew that she wouldn't be held for the murder? Was she so mindless (after fearing the maid might find the drugs) that she returned to the death scene with cocaine on her for police to confiscate?

Then the stories came along: "John Belushi's Reckless Race to the Grave," the "drug-soaked sex orgies," a one-way ticket to Hell. But it would be awfully hard, as I say, to make a multi-million dollar movie with a "$25,000 a month cocaine habit," or work with the finest directors and writers going in Hollywood. I am sure that he was not the crazy, reckless pig that he was made out to be after he was dead.

The worst article came from Kate Braverman, staff reporter at the Los Angeles Times: "A harsh final look at Belushi, the patron saint of pigs." So he "hits Los Angeles and goes berserk. … What else is Los Angeles good for? It's the last frontier for desperate men, rock stars, exiled tyrants. Los Angeles is a Disneyland for the decadent, a top ticket all the way, the best ride to Hell." Belushi was "the belly of this century," with "an endless appetite for novelty and the rot that began with manifest destiny." She tears him apart, a twentieth-century "nightmare."

"Much Ado About Nothing," opined the San Francisco Chronicle. "Saturday Night Live was designed to attract the sleepy and the sloppy." John Belushi will be "totally forgotten in a few years."

But he will be remembered for the programs he did with Lampoon and Saturday Night Live. His particular brand of political humor was genius—and that was his fatal mistake.

POSTSCRIPT

(Excerpt from Untouchable: A Biography of Robert De Niro, by Andy Dougan, Thunder's Mouth Press, 1996, pp. 156-57.)

De Niro was one of those who did not like Cathy Smith. He thought she was a low-life, and he seemed to resent the hold she had over his friend Belushi. When he arrived at On the Rox shortly after midnight on 5 March, Belushi called him over. De Niro had been trying to get hold of him earlier in the evening and had left a number of messages. Possibly because Smith was there, De Niro did not stay for long. Belushi, however, was keen to talk further about the heroin script, perhaps fearing that he might be losing ground in the argument with Insana and the studio. He asked De Niro to visit him in his bungalow after the club had closed for the night and the actor agreed. Also at On the Rox later that night was another acquaintance of Belushi, comedian Robin Williams. A superb improviser, Williams was at this stage undoubtedly America's finest stand-up comedian. He was also a household name after becoming an overnight sensation in the smash-hit television series Mork and Mindy. He had been performing at the nearby Comedy Store on Sunset Boulevard and headed for On the Rox when he had finished his set. Messages had been left at the club telling Williams that both Belushi and De Niro, an old friend, had been looking for him and had gone back to Chateau Marmont.

To this day Williams, who first met Belushi in New York some years previously, believes that there was an attempt to set him up that night, and possibly De Niro along with him.

"I was only in Belushi's room for five or ten minutes then I split," he told Rolling Stone magazine in 1988. "I saw him and split. He didn't want me there; really, he obviously had other things he was doing. I do think I was set up in some way to go over there. A guy at the Roxy told me that John wanted me to stop by his bungalow. But when I went by, he wasn't looking for me. He wasn't even there. When he arrived, he said, 'What are you doing here?' He offered me a line of cocaine, I took it and then I drove home. If I had known what was going on, I would have stayed and tried to help. It wasn't like he was shooting up in front of me."

The following afternoon, on the set of Mork and Mindy, Williams was stunned to be told by co-star Pam Dawber that his friend was dead.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

WHO KILLED CONGRESSMAN LARRY MCDONALD?

RONALD REAGAN, THE WESTERN GOALS FOUNDATION & THE DOWNING OF KAL FLIGHT 007

(HUSTLER MAGAZINE, FEBRUARY 1984)

In the aftermath of the Korean Air Lines disaster that shocked the world on September 1, 1983, the editors of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner contended with a series of nagging questions. Prominent among them was the following:

Q: Is there reason to believe that Rep. Lawrence McDonald of Georgia, an admittedly ultra-right U.S. congressman traveling on 007, may have been deliberately assassinated aboard the flight?

A: "While the [U.S.] government has made no such charge, McDonald's widow claims that her husband, the national chairman of the John Birch Society, was 'murdered.' She holds that it was no accident that 'the leading anti-Communist in the American government' had been on a plane that was 'forced into Soviet territory' and shot down."

Another question to be addressed is: Why would the Soviet Union wish to make a martyr of Larry McDonald? If the Russians are the experts at terrorism they're supposed to be, it would seem obvious that they could find an easier way to get rid of the congressman than chasing his airplane over Soviet territory for 2 1/2 hours. They could have easily blown him away anywhere in the world.

Furthermore, it is hard to believe that KAL Flight 007 was forced into Soviet airspace, as if a giant mechanism had sucked McDonald toward his mortal enemy. During the strange 2 1/2 hours that 007 ventured as far as 226 miles inside Soviet airspace, the Russians were testing new missiles directly below. They didn't need any more problems.

And I doubt that McDonald, fanatic as he was, deserves the label of "leading anti-Communist in the American government." He has pretty stiff competition from A.G. "Fritz" Kraemer, Sven Kraemer, John Lenczowski, Paula Dobriansky, William Clark, Jeanne Kirkpatrick, William Casey, Henry Kissinger, Dr. Ernest Lefevre, William F. Buckley, James Buckley, Richard Pipes, General Daniel O. Graham, and a cast of thousands.

An article that appeared immediately after the shooting down of 007 accused Secretary of the Navy John Lehman of responsibility for "the deaths of 269 over Sakhalin Island." Lehman's strategic design, known as "Horizontal Escalation" in defense circles, outlines a series of provocations against the USSR.

Lehman: "He who gets the signal to fire first in the North Pacific will enjoy a tremendous tactical advantage. This region … is most probably where we shall witness confrontation with the Soviet Union."

Thus, while Europe and the U.S. divert the public with NATO missile debates, plans are formulated for a first strike in the Pacific. South Korea, Japan and the U.S. are at collectively at work on these plans. Sending spy planes over the Soviet Union serves the purpose of provocation.

Five days after the 007 incident, former CIA spy Ralph McGehee told a college audience that the Korean airliner was indeed on a spy mission. He also believes that the Russians thought 007 was an RC-135 intelligence plane.

It was Senator Jesse Helms (R-North Carolina)—another archconservative ideologue; anti-union, anti-government, anti-Communist and an opponent of an international treaty on genocide—who arranged McDonald's invitation to attend the celebration commemorating the 30th anniversary of the official U.S. entry into the Korean War.

Instead of traveling together, however, Helms and McDonald arrived in Anchorage, Alaska—the first stop of the journey to South Korea—on separate planes. The fact that McDonald was the only person in the 36-member American delegation to fly alone seems strange. After refueling, the Boeing 747 carrying Helms arrived at its destination safely. But McDonald—and his fellow passengers on Flight 007—were not so fortunate.

As depicted in the books by Ian Fleming, 007 was James Bond's "license to kill." In this case, who had the license to kill? Was it the CIA and its Korean counterpart, the KCIA? They were formed at approximately the same time and work together closely.

The fact that McDonald and Helms flew on separate planes brings up several more unanswered questions. Who sat next to McDonald? Korean Air Lines must have a boarding pass for that passenger. If nobody used the seat, and if McDonald was accompanied by others in the American delegation, why didn't one of them occupy the seat? Where were the staff or advisory members of McDonald's Western Goals Foundation, a data bank in Alexandria, Virginia, that serves as a national right-wing clearinghouse for negative information about leftists? Why was McDonald left to die alone?

Who actually gained by Flight 007's violation of Soviet territory? Not the Russians. They were in preparation for the next week's meeting in Madrid, Spain, between U.S. Secretary of State George Schultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko, also the resumption of arms-reduction talks and the annual United Nations meeting. An incident of any kind would—and did—set world opinion against them at a critical time.

On the other hand, the U.S. government benefited by gathering valuable military information about Soviet radar and defensive capabilities in the hours preceding the crash. Other benefits to the State Department and Pentagon included favorable MX-missile and binary nerve-gas votes from a knee-jerk Congress.

Clearly, Larry McDonald did not die at the hands of Soviet planners. The most important explanation for his demise relates to recent revelations about his clandestine activities. A prior relationship between McDonald and President Reagan started to surface before the crash. Illicit espionage concealed behind a cloak of righteous Americanism at any price was about to be exposed.

The media, along with many other institutions and individuals, had purposely withheld the darker side of Reagan's years as California governor from the 1980 presidential campaign. Now the dirty laundry of the past was starting to leak out.

Key backers, financiers and appointees of Ronald Reagan have always been involved in political spying—and worse. California was rife with intrigue. Nixon and Reagan were from California. And California is where the bubble burst. The trail leading to the connection between Reagan and McDonald is long and winding. But the facts prove collusion between informers hired by Reagan when he was governor and McDonald's Western Goals Foundation. The methods—and even the persons involved—were the same in both cases.

The first indication that something was even more rotten than usual in California came on August 15, 1980, when Warren Hinckle—the former editor of Ramparts magazine—noted that the snooping of Jerry Ducote appeared to involve members of Ronald Reagan's gubernatorial staff. (Ducote was a former sheriff's deputy employed by Reagan's backers to infiltrate suspected subversive groups.)

"What is happening in Santa Clara County today is the germ of the biggest scandal of the next 1 1/2 years," Hinckle said. "People thought that with Watergate it was all over. But this is the next layer of Watergate."

On January 4, 1983, nearly 2 1/2 years after Hinckle's prediction, Detective Jay Paul of the Los Angeles Police Department supplied a weary team of investigators with the connection between Larry McDonald and Ronald Reagan. That day marked the end of McDonald's usefulness to the larger network he served. He had become a liability to some very important people.

A carefully constructed web of deceit was brought down by the massive volumes of files illegally assembled on law-abiding citizens by the L.A. Police Department's Public Disorder Intelligence Division (PDID). The files were ordered destroyed in 1975, but it was later discovered that LAPD officers kept the data-bank information.

Enraged by this disobedience, the Los Angeles Police Commission officially requested the files. But by then, Lieutenant Thomas Scheidecker had stolen at least 10,000 pages of documents, and PDID Detective Jay Paul had moved a huge batch of files to his garage in Long Beach. Attorney Ann Love, his wife, was paid $30,000 a year to feed a sophisticated $100,000 computer data that had been ordered destroyed.

The information eventually wound up in the computer of the Western Goals Foundation. And, lo and behold, the man who paid Ann Love was Representative Larry McDonald, chairman of Western Goals.

Also caught up in the web was John Rees, an editor at the Western Goals Foundation, and a longtime associate of Jerry Ducote by way of their common employers and similar methods of accumulating data. Both acted as agents provocateurs.

"An agent provocateur is a police agent who is introduced into any political organization with instructions to foment discontent . . . or to take a case in order to give his employers the right to act against the organization in question," according to Colonel Victor Kaledin of Imperial Russian Military Intelligence.

Ducote was employed by key Reagan supporters and the John Birch Society. Rees collaborated with the Birch Society and a host of other right-wing groups, feeding them information to harass and embarrass those who opposed their point of view.

Reagan's man, Ducote, and Larry McDonald's crony, John Rees, worked together at the San Francisco-based Western Research, also known as Research West. Ducote secluded himself behind unmarked doors, running a blacklisting service for industry. The results of his spying were added to a repository of information used by Governor Reagan to screen out potential state employees with leftist political tendencies contrary to his own beliefs.

At the same time, photographs of rallies and demonstrations—along with copies of underground newspapers—were supplied to Western Research by agents of the Los Angeles Police Department. In turn, Western Research sold background information on employees and advised corporations about possible risks.

Research West, an incarnation, maintained close ties with law enforcement and corporate data banks, employing spies to feed information to utility companies anxious to identify anti-nuclear activists. Clearly, blacklisting didn't end with the death of Senator Joseph McCarthy. The witch hunt never ceased.

Last January in Los Angeles, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit on behalf of 131 law-abiding groups and individuals who were illegally spied upon. Among the defendants in this case were 54 police officers from the LAPD's Public Disorder Intelligence Division.

The law firm representing the defendants was Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher. Curiously enough, Attorney General William French Smith was a partner in that firm. And none other than President Ronald Reagan is a client of Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher in all personal legal matters.

Time was running out for Larry McDonald after many years of stealing, bugging and compiling. He was about to be subpoenaed by a Los Angeles County grand jury. His testimony—particularly the parts relating to the feeding of illegal police intelligence files to his Long Beach computer—could embarrass and even damage a great number of powerful people.

Several weeks after the downing of Flight 007, Soviet President Yuri Andropov blamed the United States for a "sophisticated provocation, masterminded by U.S. special services, an example of extreme adventurism in politics."

How could the United States have written such a script? Larry McDonald was going to embarrass President Reagan if too many of the documents from California were exposed. They shared common spies and common enemies. So let's assume that the CIA, FBI and all federal agencies that worked with McDonald—particularly the Pentagon—wanted him silenced immediately. At the same time, because McDonald was so violently anti-Communist, why not make the Soviets responsible for his murder? A New Right martyr could be created in the struggle against communism. Remember the Pueblo?

The scenario might have continued in the following way:

• There would be a celebration in South Korea early in September. McDonald had strong ties to Korean-born Reverend Sun Myung Moon, leader of the Unification Church (the Moonies) and the South Korean military. Arrange for McDonald to attend that celebration in South Korea.

(Dorothy Hunt, CIA officer and wife of Watergate defendant E. Howard Hunt, was blown up in a commercial airliner over Chicago, and nobody seemed to care. Undoubtedly, her murder scared into silence the primary witnesses who could have embarrassed President Nixon at the time he was paying them to "plead guilty" before sinking his presidency. Incidentally, the espionage activities of both E. Howard Hunt and Congressman McDonald were entangled with the Los Angeles Police Department.)

• Send spy planes over the USSR continuously. The Soviet Union does not appreciate such flights violating its territory. By putting McDonald on a commercial airliner and timing its incursion inside Soviet airspace with spy-plane operations at the same time, an attack by Soviet missiles would be assured.

One of the many mysteries of Flight 007 is the total lack of communication between its pilots and U.S., Korean and Japanese listening posts. This is known as maintaining radio silence. Furthermore, 007 left Kennedy Airport in New York with a defective radio and navigational system. When the pilot on the first leg of the flight disembarked in Anchorage, he assumed the plane's malfunctioning parts would be repaired. But this didn't happen.

It is common knowledge to all pilots flying over Soviet territory that aircraft going beyond a certain point inside Russian borders will be forced to land or shot down. If the CIA and the National Security Agency wanted Larry McDonald dead, thereby assuring an international incident, isolating the pilots from instructions or warnings would be essential. The way to accomplish this is either to tamper with radio transmissions or the pilots' minds—or both.

Chun Byung In, the pilot in command of 007, held the rank of colonel in the South Korean Air Force. He was considered reliable enough to have flown the Korean president to the U.S. in 1982, and fly overseas routes linking Southeast Asia to the Middle East, Paris to Los Angeles, and New York to Seoul.

The co-pilot on 007 was Lieutenant Colonel Sohn Dong Hui. According to news reports, Chun boasted to close friends that he was carrying out special tasks for American intelligence, and he even showed them some of the plane's spying equipment or surveying Soviet military installations. Spying was sometimes the covert mission of regularly-scheduled commercial flights that began in New York City and ended in Seoul.

After the 007 disaster, it was reported that Koreans often flew over Soviet airspace to reduce fuel expenses. But spy cameras with the ability to photograph Soviet military bases are a more plausible reason for Korean jets losing their way so often.

Reports indicate that Korean Air Lines concluded a secret agreement with the CIA in the early 1970s to carry out intelligence surveys of Soviet territory. These reports further suggest that when Flight 007 was shot down, the U.S. intelligence mission utilized a reconnaissance satellite programmed to pass overhead at the same time. This allowed the U.S. to record electronic traffic denoting the whereabouts of Soviet air-defense systems as they were activated to meet a presumed threat.

After triggering the radar warning of a threat to the USSR, the pilot of a U.S. RC-135 reconnaissance plane used maneuvers typical of American spy planes to frustrate Soviet air defenses. Eventually, he dove below the radar cover off the Kamchatka Peninsula to distract air-defense crews and allow Flight 007 to enter Soviet airspace undetected.

Meanwhile, attempting to dodge Soviet fighter planes 226 miles inside the USSR, pilot Chun requested permission to elevate to 35,000 feet. Moments later, he shouted, "Rapid … a rapid decompression." Flight 007 was hit by a missile.

Chun's last words –"one-zero, one-zero-delta"– left everyone confused, as did the plane's final radio transmissions. Neither Matsumi Suzuki, head of Japan's Sound Research Institute, nor the Japanese broadcast network NHK, could explain what "delta" meant. Was that Chun's "Rosebud"?

Early reports following the tragedy, noting the apparent loss of contact with 007's pilots, suggested that the plane had been hijacked. A second report said that the two pilots and the navigator may have been asleep—a dubious theory considering the crew's unblemished record.

A more likely possibility is that the crew had been the victim of hypnosis and mind control—receiving instructions in advance, before they left Anchorage, that could not be picked up and recorded later.

If this seems farfetched, consider the experience of Candy Jones—a famous model and radio personality—who described in her biography how the CIA programmed her mind for spying and activities related to espionage. A single phone call from an unseen person would have been enough to implement previously implanted instructions to kill herself.

These revelations came to light at the height of the Watergate scandal, along with evidence that she had previously done errands for the CIA. Only the intervention of her husband saved Candy Jones from certain death.

The issue of 007's defective navigational system came under close scrutiny following the disaster. Reports filed with NASA revealed that at least 25 times during the past five years, U.S. airline pilots relying on the same navigational equipment used by 007 had strayed off course—once as much as 250 miles. Cited among the cause were computer malfunctions and human errors.

"It's easy to become complacent [on long flights]," said Pan American World Airways pilot Thomas Foxworth. "It's a human failing. The record is replete with numerous incidents of a guy just falling asleep."

What if the "human failing" cited by Foxworth was actually mind-controlled planning? Two of the 007 crew might have been asleep—or even dead. But the one who cried "delta" was obviously awake until the end. His response to what was going to happen, given his years of experience and expertise, was that of a programmed zombie instructed to fly continuously—disregarding any external sights or sounds on the flight equipment.

As long ago as November 1974, the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights—headed by then-Senator Sam Ervin of North Carolina—issued a 645-page report titled, Individual Rights and the Federal Role in Behavior Modification, which plotted the advanced state of CIA mind work and testing.

Three years later, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and the Sub-committee on Health and Scientific Research published another report, Project Mkultra: The CIA's Program in Behavior Modification.

The upshot of these reports is that the Pentagon had the capability, if it so desired, to link mind control with satellite defense systems. And a logical use of mind control, of course, would be to program a pilot —perhaps even turning a normal flight into a kamikaze mission.

Dr. Jose Delgado, the father of military-and-defense mind experimentation who worked with the CIA and Navy Intelligence, perfected such procedures as early as 1971. In one instance, he surgically implanted a receiver in the brain of a Spanish fighting bull. Later in a Madrid arena, when a tiny radio-controlled electrode delivered a minute surge of current to the enraged beast's mind, the bull braked to an abrupt halt.

Delgado also pioneered a method of shooting mood drugs into the brain, calming the subject by a remote computer that sensed oncoming anxiety, depression or rage, and flashed back inhibitor signals by radio.

"The [programmed] individual may think that the most important fact of reality is his own existence," Delgado wrote. "But that is only his personal point of view, a relative frame of reference which is not shared by the rest of the living world."

The justification for perfecting physical control of the mind was to enable outside forces to determine how to use a person's body by activating his brain and directing it beyond the subject's control—in spite of any conscious efforts he might make.

KAL Flight 007 was equipped with the latest navigational technology. Three computer-driven, inertial-navigational systems installed a year earlier told the airplane seven times per second where it is supposed to go.

Only the following elements could have coordinated the death of Representative Larry McDonald with the Soviet missile response: (1) human factors; (2) altered instruments in New York City or Anchorage; or (3) mind control over the Korean Air Force pilots.

Exactly who was Larry McDonald, the strange and complex individual who wore so many robes? At first he was a doctor specializing in urology who prescribed the discredited drug laetrile to cancer patients. He was also a man who concealed the ownership of 200 guns. In 1974, he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, later chairman of both the tax-free Western Goals Foundation and the John Birch Society.

The best way to describe most people is to understand who their heroes are. McDonald reportedly kept two photographs on the walls of his Congressional office that give some clues to his mental state.

One picture was of Senator Joseph McCarthy.

The other was of Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet.

Senator McCarthy began his Senate career after World War II with financial assistance from two known Nazi sympathizers in Wisconsin—Frank Seusenbrenner and Walter Harnischfeger. Fred J. Cook's The Nightmare Decade details the pro-Nazi backers of McCarthy, and how the senator knew of their "passionate ultra-rightism and admiration for Hitler." Harnischfeger's nephew, in fact, often displayed an autographed copy of Hitler's Mein Kampf. He also flaunted a watch-chain swastika.

In December 1946, 43 of Hitler's top military officers received death sentences or long prison terms at the Dachau Trials for the bloody massacre of American soldiers at Malmedy, France. One of McCarthy's primary objectives as he entered the Senate was to facilitate their release. By 1949, thanks to Congressional hearings, he directed another maneuvering. McCarthy's efforts paid off. The 43 Nazis were freed.

When McCarthy conducted his House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) hearings in 1953 and accumulated data on law-abiding citizens for future fascist purposes, most of his information came from combined United States intelligence and Nazi war criminals. He also drew upon the extensive files of a spy network known as ODDESSA, an association of former SS officers formed between 1943 and 1945, when it became obvious the Third Reich could not win the war against the Soviet Union.

After McCarthy died in 1957, it is reasonable to assume that Larry McDonaid—by way of Louise Rees—took over the massive computerized files that now contain millions of names worldwide.

Louise Rees, the wife of John Rees, an editor at McDonald's Western Goals Foundation, worked for McCarthy and Roy M. Cohn, counsel for the senator's 1953 Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee. Western Goals lists Roy M. Cohn, now a New York lawyer, on its advisory board. And when McDonald went to Washington as a representative from Georgia in 1974, Louise Rees was his paid staff aide.

McDonald's admiration for his other major hero, Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, can be explained in part by the fact that both of their careers benefited from the support of international fascist organizations. And there is evidence that Nazis in Chile funded McDonald's Congressional campaigns since 1974, at Pinochet's direction—just as Nazis were the source of funds for McCarthy in Wisconsin.

Ironically, the very night that McDonald was killed, Pinochet, his CIA-supported hero—was taunted by rioters in Chile. The Chilean people also want their nightmare decade to end. Pinochet is responsible for DINA, Nazi-like death-squad terrorist teams that are an arm of the Chilean police, necessary to maintain his repressive regime. Without DINA's methods of fear and torture, the U.S. puppet government in Chile would not last another day.

Pinochet also does nothing to interfere with Colonia Dignidad, a haven for Nazi war criminals located on the border between Argentina and Chile. Colonia Dignidad serves as a torture center where dissenters who oppose Pinochet are mutilated and fed to dogs while still alive. Armed guards discourage snoopers. Amnesty International is currently investigating this deplorable situation.

Larry McDonald's unsavory Chilean connection was further exposed when Robert Byron Watson presented attorneys from the House Select Committee on Assassinations with an affidavit reportedly detailing McDonald's dealings with Fuad Habash Ansare in Santiago de Chile; Watson claimed that Fuad Habash is the brother of Arab terrorist leader Dr. George Habash of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. This organization is said to work with our CIA to arrange Arab terrorist murders around the globe.

Larry McDonald's Western Goals Foundation, another sinister organization, was formed in 1979. Members of its advisory board are listed in brochures and newspaper advertisements, and include the following: Jean Ashbrook, Mrs. Walter Brennan, Taylor Caldwell, Roy M. Cohn, Congressman Philip M. Crane (R-Illinois), General Raymond Davis, Henry Hazlitt, Dr. Mildred F. Jefferson, Dr. Anthony Kubek, Robert Milliken, Admiral Thomas H. Moorer, E. A. Morris, Vice-Admiral Lloyd M. Mustin, Mrs. John C. Newington, General George S. Patton III, Dr. Hans Sennholz, General John Singlaub, Dan Smoot, Robert Stoddard, Congressman Bob Stump (D-Arizona), Mrs. Helen Marie Taylor, Dr. Edward Teller, General Lewis Walt and Dr. Eugene Wigner.

Two members of Western Goals bear special mention. According to Seymour Hersh's recent book The Price of Power in the Nixon White House, Admiral Thomas Moorer masterminded the surreptitious removal of sensitive data from President Nixon's office. Working through Yeoman Charles Radford, Moorer stole papers clearly marked "President's Eyes Only" and had them delivered to the Pentagon.

His reward for stealing these top-secret documents was a promotion to the prestigious Joint Chiefs of Staff. Merry Christmas, Cambodia! Bypassing every member of Congress, Henry Kissinger and Admiral Moorer conducted their own private war against that country—one that has not fought the United States at any time—gleefully selecting bombing targets that cost the lives of millions of innocent people.

It later developed that Los Angeles Police Department files on two million Californians were assessed by Moorer's and McDonald's Western Goals computer.

So it comes to pass that the criminals keep track of the innocent. Information about you is probably already filed and computerized in their secret data banks. Would you trust people like this with your good name?

A second Western Goals advisory board member worth noting is Edward Teller, Hungarian-born father of the hydrogen bomb. The same day that McDonald made the front page of the Washington Post—when Western Goals was ordered to answer the stolen-documents subpoena in Los Angeles—Teller was attending a European seminar on nuclear warfare critical to America's future foreign policy.

There is no beginning or end to the Larry McDonald tragedy. His right-wing fanaticism drew him to the crueler side of blackmailers, burglars, assassins, terrorists, wiretappers, and people dedicated to waging a future war with the Soviet Union.

And there he was, last August 31 and September 1, apparently sitting all alone on Flight 007. If that was by Soviet design, then all in his entourage were communists who knew in advance.

But since the American delegation was screened and cleared for travel with a congressman, then the CIA and U.S. agents knew something they wouldn't share with him—even to save his life.

So what's it all about, Alfie?

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

NASA'S CHALLENGER, R.I.P.

(JANUARY 28, 1986)

William Rogers, chairman of the commission appointed by President Ronald Reagan to investigate the causes of the January 18, 1986 Challenger shuttle explosion, stated for the record, "a serious deficiency in the flawed decision-making process was responsible" for the tragic event that occurred on Tuesday morning, January 28, 1986."

That makes a good cover story. Human error did it.

But what if the demise of the Challenger with its seven-member crew wasn't an error?

Mike Royko, columnist for the Chicago Tribune, wrote: "Somebody should check the laws of Florida and the federal laws for criminal liability. There could be a manslaughter case here."

Senator Donald W. Riegle, D. Michigan, suggested, "one can only assume they, the President's commission, are hitting upon things that are so disturbing they feel they can't share them with the public."

A NASA official said, "it's like an artichoke. Everyday they peel something else. The Commission has begun pointing the finger at the individuals and the procedures involved in the catastrophe and the resulting picture isn't pretty."

Every major military operation and shift in Defense Department policy occurs as a result of long planning.

The problems surrounding the Challenger explosion, with the disastrous ripple effect on the entire shuttle program, suggest that the Pentagon and NASA's Star Wars operation will assure the friendly skies for their Warfare State. Control of all space projects for the future will be in the hands of the military. Commercial and exploratory projects are shelved or put on a long waiting list.

The transfer of NASA shuttle programs to the Defense Department was detailed in an article in Spaceflight [No. 24, May, 1982, pp. 226-29], "The Military Role in the Shuttle," by Gerald L. Borrowman. The United State Department of Defense has a major role in the utilization of the space shuttle.

The participation of the shuttle Challenger in new Pentagon ambitions became obvious in September, 1983.

The Challenger "accident" may go down in history along with the Reichstag fire, the assassination of Austrian Archduke Ferdinand, the Gulf of Tonkin incident or the downing of the Korean Airliner 007 as a provocateur action implemented by the military to gain tighter control of war machinery.

Some estimated costs to activate the shuttle projects are $2–$10 billion. It will take four to five years.

It is impossible to believe that such a system—huge in terms of money, plans and contracts for military purposes and spy satellites—didn't have some kind of backup with less expensive alternatives in the event of a single accident.

Making matters worse, the accident was obviously preventable. Time and money are not thrown away unless there are other major plans waiting to execute. NASA had already ordered the shuttle program's extinction as early as 1983. The terms were an impossible situation: "Pull yourself out of the red and produce revenue of at least $2 billion." Get going or get out of the way.

Problems related to the controversial O-ring, caused by freezing in cold weather, were a concern to NASA back in December 19, 1982. By February, 1983, NASA was warned, then chose to ignore, specific problems created by lack of protection with the secondary back-up seals. Why did the shuttle program have no interest in the survival of passengers and equipment?

Memoranda detailing a "catastrophic" disaster if the shuttle was launched in less than 50 degrees Fahrenheit was presented to NASA in July 1985, and again in August 1985 by two scientists.

Did NASA and the Pentagon choose the timing? They demanded a launch on the coldest day in shuttle history.

The shuttle Challenger, unlike any previous launch, waited outside in rain and cold for 38 days.

Television cameras focused upon the ice coating and huge icicles at the time of the launch. Ice teams were sent out the "check." It was not always cold at Cape Canaveral.

The Rogers Commission limited the public inquiry into launching decisions to the evening of January 27th and the morning of the 28th of January, 1986.

Plans for an earlier launch on Saturday, January 25th, 1986 were postponed due to "dust storms in Africa and Morocco."

It is interesting that weather so far away was conveyed to the launch team at the top of the their pyramid. The same decision-makers couldn't see ice or feel the freezing temperature at Cape Canaveral.

It was not a matter of seeing or feeling the cold.

NASA experts from Huntsville, Alabama at Marshall Space Center literally ordered management from Morton Thiokol and Rockwell to approve the launch, and ignored what they did not choose to hear.

Challenger would leave on the morning of January 28, 1986. Weather was not a factor considered.

Robert Lund, vice president for engineering at Morton Thiokol, the company that made the controversial solid fuel boosters, was told, "don't make an engineering decision." He was expected to quick-change from engineer into a manager. Lund wore the two hats. He had to be a manager because Marshall teams at Huntsville were dangling a renewal contract in front of the compay involving $300-$400 million a year … and was forced to make an about-face and disregard the safety of seven astronauts.

The other hat was military. Lund changed directions and took orders.

Life is cheap at the Pentagon.

Sunday turned out to be a fine day for a launch. Was there too much media competition with Super Bowl Sunday, with Reagan's "teacher in space" production, after two years of publicity?

The hundreds of press, teachers and students waiting at Cape Canaveral could have seen a fine launch on Sunday, Monday afternoon or even Tuesday afternoon when it was much warmer. NASA officials had been alerted by Sunday that a cold front was coming in Monday night or Tuesday, for sure. Indications were always that weather was a factor in safely launching a shuttle.

The orders to launch coincided with President Reagan's State of the Union speech before Congress. Christa McAuliffe, Reagan's pet teacher, was the superstar of this event.

Rumors spread through Washington, D.C. that Chief of Staff Donald Regan called Marshall Space Flight Center and ordered the "ship to fly" on the morning of January 28, 1986.

Regan, a Wall Street broker from Merrill Lynch, does not know the mechanics of space travel. He knows business. Billions of dollars, not lives, have a way of altering judgment. So [does] national security. Only the National Security Council and the Pentagon put words into Regan's mouth on shuttle matters.

A shuttle disaster would not embarrass the "Teflon president."

A shuttle catastrophe would be, and was, an advantage for Star Wars, SDI and the militarization of space.

Reagan's primary goal is to dole out funding to SDI. If he has his way, no matter who is President, Republican or Democrat, the first-strike offensive and space weapon system will be in place.

Background for SDI, and the recent announcement of laser weapons that can scorch the earth, came from the importation of 642 Nazi specialists to the United States between May, 1945 and December, 1952. The importees' expertise was in rockets, atomic bombs and missiles. The United States benefited greatly from Nazi engineering.

Project Paperclip by Clarence Lansby describes how Dr. Werner von Braun, Walter Dornberger and 640 partners manufactured weapons at Peenemunde and Camp Dora, "with the benefit of 10,000 slave laborers under [the] control of the Waffen SS, the Gestapo."

Those Nazis quietly resettling in Huntsville, Alabama arrived with the idea of using space to "rule the world" by building a reflector that would kill human targets immediately. It could instantly kindle forests or turn the ocean water into steam.

It was no coincidence that the pressure to launch came from four top officials at Marshall Flight Center in Huntsville: William Lucas, Stanley Reinartz, Lawrence Mulloy and George Hardy still arrogantly defend the launch massacre despite ignoring all warnings.

Konrad Dannenberg, part of the Paperclip-Von Braun team, and George von Tiesenhousen, Nazi rocket scientists, described in the Wall Street Journal the "hazards of rocketry," clearly implying that death goes with the territory.

Remember, however, the seven murders were avoidable. Why couldn't they wait to launch? Tuesday afternoon was warm.

Star Wars/SDI has been in the minds of both the Germans and the United States Pentagon for over 30 years, but was not formally presented to the world until March 23, 1983.

President Reagan, with Edward Teller, the father of the Hydrogen bomb, by his side coaching this event, pulled out the Paperclip plans and labeled them "SDI," the Strategic Defense Initiative.

August 30, 1983, five months after the SDI presentation, the shuttle Challenger was launched in the dark of night.

Challenger would start its twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth orbit, making a close approach the Korean Airliner 007.

While a satellite could monitor the KAL-007 activation of Soviet defense systems, the shuttle was on one of its designated military functions. Challenger's role "extended intelligence operations with sea, land, air and space involvement."

Representative Larry McDonald, chairman of the John Birch Society and Western Goals, was [a passenger on] Korean KLA 007, a civilian plane used for military purposes.

When KAL-007 was shot down by the Soviets, the arms race escalated as never before. Reagan used the deaths of 268 passengers for pushing production of MX missiles, deployment of Pershing 11 and cruise missiles in Europe, and to escalate funds for his new Star Wars, High Frontier, SDI projects.

Edward Teller sat on the Board of Western Goals, the illicit espionage data bank, with the late Larry McDonald.

The pilot of the Challenger [August 30–September 5, 1983] was Rear Admiral Richard Truly. Truly became head of the Naval Space Command. Following the Challenger destruction on January 28, 1986, Truly has been appointed to replace Jesse Moore as associate director for space flight.

Jesse Moore was offered a promotion to director of Johnson Space Center, Houston, Texas, just five days before the tragedy. Those were the sunny days when Challenger rested before the soon-to-be-freezing launch. Remember, Moore had the final decision for a "go or no go."

[And] 1983 was the year that Lockheed got their contract for maintenance of the shuttle system at Cape Canaveral. Lockheed's $1.2 billion, three-year job included readying the shuttle for each launch. Lockheed was the contractor that built and assembled the suspect rocket booster.

Recent news accounts describe patchwork repairs on the shuttles as "Mickey Mouse" operations.

The history of Lockheed is one that hardly recommends such a sensitive position with the politicized, overzealous and assured NASA-wired Star Wars project that is in the pocket.

The company hired to service the shuttle program, Lockheed, is best described by author Jim Hougan in his book, Spooks:

> "Lockheed's chairman, Daniel J. Haughton, masterminded and raped the treasures of a dozen countries, corrupted the political processes of both hemispheres, jeopardized national security, screwed the taxpayer, destabilized the governments of three allies, undermined NATO, subverted the marketplace, boosted inflation, and stimulated suicides as far apart as Tokyo and Los Angeles."

Would Lockheed employees with past cozy relationships with former Nazis, fascists, members of the Waffen SS, assist the SDI and militarization of space, or have any part of dismantling the civilian space program?

One Lockheed employee working on the Challenger nearly went out of his mind upon seeing the explosion. "It was my fault. I killed seven people," he screamed.

Lockheed had an unprecedented series of accidents. The most recent was a derrick hitting the Challenger, possibly weakening the side for raging fuel to [escape].

There are two obvious changes in NASA and the military space program since January 28, 1986.

NASA is getting exposure of their bitter in-fighting, mismanagement, near accidents and horror stories on inefficiency.

The Rogers Commission, along with leaks and Congressional pressures, will uncover scandals inside the shuttle program and NASA itself.

At the same time, funding for Star Wars has escalated.

SDI is the only Pentagon project not open for any cuts at all by the Gramm-Rudman amendment. National security's sacred cow, Reagan and Teller's baby, is untouchable.

Congress has been asked to spend $4.8 billion for Star Wars in 1987.

The Energy Department wants $603 million for nuclear weapons in space. That will include the Paperclip goals: microwave heat, nuclear pellets and projects related to SDI, in case they cannot pull in enough cash over the table on their own.

$50 million more has been requested for nuclear weapons research. NASA and the Pentagon want a "third generation weapon, beyond the atomic and hydrogen bomb. Edward Teller is to give birth again. Ronald Reagan is the mid-wife."

Teller and Reagan have teamed up since Governor Reagan visited Lawrence Livermore Laboratory, in Berkeley, California in 1966.

NASA, rocket and missile experts, scientists, specialists in future possible nightmares, now are assured monopoly and control of space projects. Atomic bombs, Star Wars lasers, reflectors can be activated without some civilian teacher trying to explain the "humanization of space".

When one shuttle exploded, the other three were doomed for anything but military purposes.

Almost a perfect James Watt "Rainbow Coalition" went to their graves – one black, a classmate of Jesse Jackson, one Buddhist-Japanese, one Jew and two women.

If the launch explosion was no accident and could have been prevented, was the crew handpicked for this specific voyage? Given the mentality and logic of the Reagan team, if not Reagan himself, combined with the imported Nazi space scientists still ordering when to launch, nothing is impossible or should be overlooked.

HUNT FAMILY UPDATE

THE CORPSE OF LEE HARVEY OSWALD

(WORLD WATCHERS INTERNATIONAL, KLRB-FM, CARMEL, CALIF, JULY 26, 1978)

The Washington Post recently reported: "The CIA Tried to Have Oswald Exhumed." The Post reports newly released files show that the CIA, suspicious the Soviet Union may have brainwashed Lee Harvey Oswald, sought unsuccessfully to exhume his corpse to see if his reported 1959 suicide attempt was a Russian cover-up…

The above facts stated in the Washington Post report are a prime example of disinformation. E. Howard Hunt was forging documents that could be released later after Nixon's election in 1972 to show how Kennedy was not only sleeping with various women, but had also ordered the murder of a man three weeks before he was killed.

Neither the Warren Commission nor the Justice Department were deprived of information to find the killers of Kennedy or King.

E. Howard Hunt, a CIA agent, along with other persons would be called to testify at the assassination hearings, and Hunt was caught [forging documents]. The White House, Pentagon, the press, FBI and CIA were part of a combined effort to deceive the American public. Top State Department papers trusted to the military were delivered to Mr. Hunt along with scissors, razor and typewriter to blame John Kennedy for the murder of Diem. It is the admission of new evidence during the hearings into the Kennedy killings that should be suspect. If FBI agent James Hosty threw Oswald's letter in the toilet after the assassination of JFK, he should be indicted for destruction of evidence and perjury.

The UPI memo above is signed by W. David Slauson … the same CIA lawyer on the Warren Commission who took two weeks before the report was published, and stated they should go ahead with the allegation of Oswald in Mexico, his quote being: "I have fudged the text sufficiently to put in phantom exhibits."

This is a crime of falsification of documents.

Arlen Spector is running for Governor of Pennsylvania. He was the attorney who hid the [number of] bullets and the possibility of silencers. Spector did not ask to see the car that Kennedy was in at the time of the assassination, now sequestered in Dearborn, Michigan at the Ford Motor Company. Arlen Spector created the Bullet #399 story—the fabrication of the number of bullets that went through JFK.

This recently released CIA document is false—the CIA did not ask to have Oswald's corpse dug up. In fact, they ordered it cremated. And if the Warren Commission had the body of Oswald cremated, then a body was substituted and not the same Oswald that was in Russia. If anyone challenged the Commission or the hearing officials to exhume that body, now, it would be the story of the century.

David Lifton documents an addendum to the Warren Report about a January 21 meeting, regarding Marina Oswald, called as a witness before any of the other witnesses were called. In reference to this meeting, Chairman Earl Warren said, "We will go to the next item 'H' under Roman Numeral II—'The Remains of Lee Harvey Oswald'—and a letter we received from Nicholas Katzenbaum, attorney general."

Now the situation is this: this man is buried in a cemetery and it takes officers around the clock to watch him and [assure] that "they" don't come in and exhume him, and do something that would further "injure the country." No one ever asked Warren who "they" were. Jerry Ford is still a survivor of that meeting. He might know. So it has been suggested that we should save expenses, we should exhume him AND cremate him. [Oswald's] mother says she didn't care how much it costs or what it is, she just won't consent to his cremation. But if anyone took credit for cremating this man, we would be in trouble.

Senator Russell said: "Do we have jurisdiction in that? It seems to me it would be in the court down there in Texas. I don't see that we would have any right to pass that on."

Warren, the same Warren, who ordered the concentration camps for the Japanese in World War II, said, "well, the question might arise as to something on that body. Now, I don't know what it is, it could be in the course of the bullet, or it might be something else. But I don't think we would want that disposed of until the report had been made."

There was some question about how Oswald died, that perhaps he had to be helped to the death state and didn't die from the shot by Ruby. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Warren, has been told something about the corpse, otherwise why would he make such overtures?

"We can't injure the country. The country can't stand another shock."

"We wouldn't want to do something until the reports are made," Senator Boggs said.

"Absolutely not," said Senator Russell, "because then they would make a case of "if." I thought we might do this. I thought we might get a mausoleum to take the body, and we seal it up and put it in the mausoleum and it would be unknown to anybody else." At the Warren Commission, every secretary and every stenographer and custodian of the minutes of the report worked for the CIA. Senator Russell continued: "Now the wife would consent to that, and the mother hasn't anything to say about it, if the wife consents. I would have that rather than cremate it or dig it right now. We might get into a religious controversy."

John McCloy, head of the World Bank, chairman of Chase Manhattan, on the Warren Commission, released the bulk of the prisoners from the Nuremburg trials … two million Nazi files were found by the U.S. government in World War II and kept secret. Here it is 1964, and he's continuing the cover-ups. "I don't think we ought to have it on the record that we're moving him on this thing. We're not saying anything about it." The steno took it down and it was found in the Archives.

Senator Boggs said that even if you move that corpse 20 feet, somebody is going to say that the body has been switched, that it's not Oswald, and you're going to have to drag that body out and take pictures and x-rays. It may take a little extra money to pay a few cops to watch it, but in this case, it's worth it.

Quite possibly the real Oswald was flown out of Dallas to Baton Rouge and then to Brazil, to the Nazi colony of Daniel Ludwick, described as a missionary of the Latter Day Saints. Relatives who visited L.H. Oswald in Helsinki before he went to Russia arrived on a military plane. A former Mormon is trying to expose the conspiratorial assassination links to Mullen Associates, a public relations firm who represented the Free Cuba Committee.

Mr. Riley, who was receiving money from Mullen and Associates of Washington, D.C., hired L.H. Oswald at the Riley Coffee Company in New Orleans.

A helicopter was left for Oswald's escape from Dallas. The escape route is not documented yet. Joe Cooper, National Tattler, was doing a big story on the Baton Rouge connections to the JFK assassinations and the Navy Intelligence connections when he was blown to smithereens and killed. National Tattler went out of publication after that. This is a very secret story.

The fact that certain witnesses are dead means that Marina Oswald can successfully lie. DeMorenschildt is dead. If his wife Jean DeMohrenschildt testifies under oath, it will be taken as truth because the man is dead. She put him into Parkland Hospital, where the teacher was given multiple shock treatments to ruin his memory and induce suicide. And he was given drug treatments, then "became suicidal" and "crazy."

There's no accountability of the car that was sent to Michigan or the clothes of JFK or Connally. The evidence is destroyed. The witnesses were murdered. The destruction of evidence and murder of witnesses should have been investigated before new evidence was pondered.

A list of witnesses who have been put in prison or the mental hospital as a result of what they know about the assassination needs to be pursued. Like Mrs. Stevens, or Abraham Bolden or DeMohrenschildt. A list of witnesses who worked for the House Select Committee, and lawyers who have been blackmailed or are stopping the investigation, should be examined.

Uranium and the Mormon Church

(Mae Brussell broadcast, KLRB-FM, Carmel, California, August 4, 1978.)

On the morning of July 20, 1878, a press conference was held at the scene of the ordination of Larry Lester, the Black minister admitted to the Mormon priesthood two years ago. The subject of the conference was "Mormon Church Infiltration of Government Agencies Suspected of Sequestering Uranium Ore Outside the United States." This press conference was held by the Latter Day Saints Freedom Foundation in connection with the development of Melody Mountain Ranch, Inc.—an intended boy's vocational training school to be located at Cornelius, Oregon, in 1958. Charles A. Bean became involved in the acquisition of certain surplus government property. This led to the dismantling of some buildings for resale at the tri-city area in Washington.

During September of 1958, volunteer men were working to assist in guaranteeing the supply of iron ore alleged to be needed in the connection of nuclear cooling processes at Hanford. As a result of these efforts several samples of the ore indicated that hard rock uranium ore was located in Washington state and yellow uranium in Utah. Through subsequent arrangements, the interests of 20 volunteers who had contributed to the National Association of Evangelicals—which became involved in backing the Melody Mountain Ranch project, later called Pacific Youth Institute—were exchanged for stock in the Yellow Cat Uranium Co., a Utah-based corporation, which later changed its name to Trans Pacific Enterprises in 1957.

Simultaneously, Lyndon B. Johnson (then a senator) became involved in the uranium discovery through one J.J. McCoy, a fund-raiser who had affiliations with Johnson. Johnson was also a member of the Teamsters Trust Fund Committee at Lubbock, Texas, utilized to move money to the number one endeavors of the Association of Evangelicals, made of 30,000 American churches. The Internal Revenue Service eventually became involved because some of the $4-million intended for use by the Pacific Youth Institute was backed by the Evangelicals. A bond of ten percent (10%) was deposited against claims, which might arise from the non-tax-exempt status of the corporation. This bond, deposited with the Justice Department, was made up of $20,000, some parcels of land held by individual owners and subsequently was funded by the Teamsters' Fund. Teamster funding of many other projects was guaranteed by the anticipated proceeds from the uranium production.

The Treasury Department and the Securities Exchange Commission were to monitor the activities of all concerned. Ralph Grandquist, an Oregon IRS director, recommended to Mr. Bean that he file a Government "Conveniency" Bankruptcy to secure and preserve for future Americans the file which was developed concerning the uranium. This occurred in late 1958 after the discovery. The file was lost and is not now part of the bankruptcy files. A subsequent file was developed by Mr. Bean, and it also was stolen later!

It began to appear that the CIA was involved, for in 1960, some 15 months before the Bay of Pigs Invasion, the request was made that Mr. Bean, who had the authority, sign off on 60 mothball Liberty Ships stored at a California port, ostensibly for use in the Bay of Pigs. Later these ships were used to transport the mined uranium to Australia for refining although it was described as manure and fertilizer. Since virtually all the ore shipped was mined in Utah under the eyes of the Mormon Church, which controls everything that goes on in that state, it may be safely stated that the Church was involved directly or indirectly in the affair. It is of no small moment that the LDS church is infiltrated the CIA and the FBI, and that the special interests of the church have been handled by those church members who had the agencies of government to assist them in the conspiracy.

It is also interesting to note that the Utah Corporation is also the largest mining and refining organization in Australia. This corporation, affiliated with the Mormon Church, was the alleged destination of the shipped uranium. The objective of the Mormon conspiracy was to transport the ore beyond the control of the federal government. The avowed purpose of the church in its secret political conquest council of fifty, was to obtain nuclear capability for future use when it would attempt to obtain world conquest and single world government.

It appears as though president Lyndon Johnson assisted the Mormon Church in this conspiracy by promoting such projects as "Atoms for Peace," "Food for Peace," and "Water for Peace." By executive order, Johnson ordered the movement into an international treaty of one million tons of the mined uranium, which was subsequently shipped to Australia. This order issued in 1966 was violated, in that during three years (1966, 1967 and 1968) all ten million tons of the ore were shipped off to Australia aboard those ships registered to Lady Bird Johnson.

It is a well-known fact to researchers at the LDS Freedom Foundation, that Lyndon Johnson had placed in the limousine two pillows on the floor upon which the Secret Service agents could push him at the moment President Kennedy was to be shot in 1963. It is also known that the pathologist who conducted the pathology on Kennedy has denounced the official pathology report as not being his report, which indicated that several shots penetrated the president's head from different angles. The Warren Commission, appointed by Johnson, has been accused of whitewashing the entire episode.

It is also of no small significance that Lady Bird Johnson acquired numerous FCC licenses beyond normal regulations during this period of time, and further that the chairman of the FCC has always been a Mormon since its inception.

The nuclear capability of Israel has resulted from this conspiracy, which provided for the hijacking of 200 tons of ore in 1968. The rumor was widespread in the knowledgeable circles of Salt Lake City that the Mormon Church had arranged to assist Israel in bringing off Armageddon.

Upon hearing of the ore shipments, Lyndon Johnson made a hurried four-day world trip after which he abandoned plans to run for reelection. His death shortly after retiring appears to be part of the cover-up of the conspiracy along with numerous others involved.

Twenty notes for 1.5 million dollars each are acknowledged to be in a Swiss bank to repay the value of part of the one million tons of ore authorized for shipment. Mr. Bean and an associate, Mr. Robert J. Wright, have filed suit in a federal court in Oregon seeking to make the Treasury Department responsible and accountable for the loss to themselves and the National Association of Evangelicals.

Lyndon Johnson was the head of NASA, and Werner von Braun, the Nazi war criminal, was brought to this country. The atomic bomb and nuclear capabilities were moved with the assistance of Lyndon Johnson and the Mormon Church. Mullen Associates in Washington, D.C., a public relations firm, had been a non-Mormon account for the Tabernacle tours overseas, yet all Mormons give their business to other Mormons.

But the LDS used this Washington firm, Mullen Associates, which carried the Latter Day Saints Tabernacle around the world—a good method of disseminating agents from the tours. The LDS also funded the Free Cuba Committee (which again is Mormon) and the ships for the Bay of Pigs. The LDS funded Mr. Riley of Riley Coffee Co., where Lee Harvey Oswald worked. E. Howard Hunt was the vice president of Mullen Associates. Lyndon Johnson, atomic weaponry and the Nazi-Mormon-CIA, had obvious connections. Australia had one-fifth of the world's non-Communist uranium, making it a major supplier. The ore was shipped from the US to Australia and from there to other nations. This is thanks to the Mormons.

This all started having steam in 1957, a very important year. That's when Admiral Byrd died. His documents and the truth of his visits to the Antarctic were never published. That was the year of the International Geophysical Year. This was the year that Candy Jones was put into her mind control experiments, without her even knowing it for so many years. It was the year that Lyndon Johnson made great strides for the Mormon cause. Satellites, launched by NASA, were organizing the earth for the industrialists who use the uranium.

Please note that some parts of the above information were taken from a press conference by attorney Doug Wallace.

Nixon's Recruitment

In the Memoirs of Richard Nixon, page 33, Nixon discusses his run for Congress in 1966. He tells about his letter from Hermann Perry, the manager of a Bank of America in Whittier.

> Dear Dick,
> Do you want to run on a Republican ticket? Air mail me your reply.
> H. L. Perry

The date 1966 is important because Nixon was then taken to see Mr. Perry and then was taken to the bungalow of Howard Hughes. And they decided, yes, this is our man. Nixon had already written to the law offices of Allen Dulles, asking to be in intelligence work. When Nixon was in the Navy, he had written to the FBI asking to be in the FBI.

The fact that Nixon didn't get a response from them doesn't mean that he wasn't hired. His answer came in the form of Perry and Howard Hughes, who contacted him, and he was brought to California to run against Jerry Vorhees. In the book Wanted, the Search for the Nazis in America, this same Mr. Perry was instrumental in bringing war criminals to the United Sates, such as the Nazi Nicholai Moloxa, who was brought to Nixon's office. Moloxa, of Odessa, then went down to Argentina. Nixon's first visit to the White House in 1947 was a meeting with Truman who discussed helping restore Europe and especially German industry. German industry included I.G. Farben and munitions makers.

This class of "1946-1947" was very important—it included Mr. Smathers from Florida, Gerald Ford from Michigan, and Nixon from California. These men elected in 1946, worked along with the Nazi war criminals and the OSS-CIA officials to form the National Security Council. Then foreigners like Kissinger and Brezinski came in and ran our country. It's no longer run by Americans.

This group looked at the globe and smacked their lips and decided how it would be divided.

The importance of bringing the German space scientists to this country (written up very carefully in the book Operation Paperclip), is that the satellites tell you where the oil is or the minerals, water, oil, vegetation and population are. Then, from this vantage point, you can displace people from where the oil is or from where the minerals you want are located.

Control is either bought or obtained by force. The war was over in May 1945, and in August 1945, the United States dropped the A-bombs made by Hitler and Oppenheimer (a "basket of pineapples") on Japan to keep Russia from going into those oil fields of Asia any further. Russia had already gone west and the United States wanted to stop her from going east.

"Anti-Terrorism" & Government Surveillance

The following is information supplied by Jim Horowitz, of Los Angeles, who works with Mark Lane and Don Freed. They apparently suppressed information on several issues at conspiracy conferences. Jim Horowitz has a newsletter, Vol. 4, No. 6, about Evelle Younger. Younger's "Organized Crime Collector School (he advertises himself as a "spy czar") is actually an anti-terrorist Red school. Our country is no longer chasing communists. We're doing trade with Russia and China. They are looking for "terrorists," and they will become the excuse to open our mail and break into newspaper offices, keep people under surveillance and do anything they want under the cover of "terrorism."

Anacapa Sciences, Inc. is a mystery firm hired for politically and paramilitary-motivated campaigns to get dissidents. In Zaire, it is General Motors which is sending in troops. Private corporations work with the Department of Defense and the CIA so we don't have to declare war, and the FBI doesn't have to half its underground work. Mr. FBI Webster sent 80 informers to monitor the terrorists' work. Then the private corporations get money from the government, and the FBI can look at you and say, "We only have 80 agents on this subject." But Anacapa, whose cover is organized crime, is setting up national—as in "Gestapo" – national training schools. They will work with local police. Hitler worked with Interpol. Hitler had the best police system. It was not only national, but included Vienna, Poland, Hungary and Romania, and then it became international.

SWAT teams are formed under all this and they want more SWAT teams for urban counter-insurgencies and for the militarization of the police forces, with headquarters to be in Los Angeles, California.

Daryl Gates, chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, was under the influence of Ed Davis. In San Francisco, Charles Gain is the chief of police. Gain ran the FBI counter-intelligence program in Oakland against the Black Panthers, before he was made chief of police in San Francisco. Oakland is the third police center in America.

Anacapa is linked with the CIA. It shares with them anti-terrorist money. Anacapa's project director is Jack Kinney of Air Force Intelligence, who is also a top secret National Security Agency executive. Anacapa is also tied to officers of Naval Intelligence, the Defense Intelligence Agency, and has reciprocal relations with the CIA. Evelle Younger's influence reaches through the Organized Crime Collectors

The unemployed, especially black persons who are unemployed, Chicanos who are unemployed—there are no jobs from them. Stealing to get food? Those who are forced to become criminals—these are your "terrorists." There's going to be unemployment, riots, food-riots and so on in this country. There are no "terrorists." There's going to be self-defense. That's the reason the Panthers started.

Younger works with the Organized Crime Collectors School and Anacapa, and also with a group in Washington D.C. called the "Psychological Assessment Associates (PAA)." PAA is a deep cover CIA's proprietary that worked with behavior modification-like experiments. You get a Donald DeFreeze working in Vacaville prison in California. DeFreeze was working under the Defense Department's mind control program established by Westbrook of the CIA. Westbrook formed the Symbionese Liberation Army (SLA) which became the excuse to burn those people—SLA members caught in the burning house in Los Angeles, on prime time TV. The burning of these six SLA members became the inaugural of the SWAT teams' burning of "terrorists." Boy, it's really great that they saved us in time from those terrorists—which, had they been merely arrested, would have required utilizing the courts to hear their cases. United Sates prosecuting attorney Browning, who prosecuted the Patty Hearst case, still hasn't prosecuted Emily William Harris (four years now) for kidnapping Patty Hearst. Browning is running for Attorney General of California while Evelle Younger runs for Governor.

Browning and Younger have links to the mind control programs. One of Younger's liaisons in Washington, the firm Psychological Assessment Associates, works under cover with a John Gettinger. J.W. Gettinger is an agent who works under the cover of the Human Ecology Fund, known to be a CIA conduit. …

Hitler's idea of ecology was the "pure white Aryan race." The Nazis will work with the Arabs and the Asians to a degree until they have control, and then will utilize sterilization. An example of this type of sterilization was the American Indian misfortune. Another example was the mass programs of germs and genocide, conducted by white people in South Africa—which was an experiment after WWII regarding a handful of whites handling a bunch of blacks. It works. People may object to Steve Bilko being killed. 33 other men were killed in those South African prisons last year.

There will be no leaders, a parasol will remain. It's a test case. And it works. And there's no reason why these people can't continue their genocide policy and that is the reason for the Human Ecology Fund. All this is from Jim Horowitz's newsletter on Evelle Younger's spy network in Los Angeles (rather, some of it is.)

Congressional Investigation of Nazis in America Sabotaged

(World Watchers International broadcast, KLRB-FM, April 13, 1979)

There's an article in the Washington Post (April 1, 1979) on Simon Weisenthal. They call him the Holocaust "Avenging Angel." He's the gentleman who was rescued from a concentration camp during WW II, and has spent his life trying to find Nazis still at large. He claims that there are 150,000 Germans who committed war crimes and that 96 percent survived the war. Weisenthal estimates now that there are between 15-20,000 of these murderers still free in South America, Spain, the Near East, Germany and other countries.

There was a photograph of Gustav Franz Wagner interviewed in Brazil in 1978. There was a birthday party April 20 for Adolf Hitler, and Wagner was seen at that time. And he helped organize Treblinka. But in the whole year that has passed, there hasn't been any mention by Simon Weisenthal about Wagner … the name is hardly mentioned in the article, and I think it's interesting because they have his picture.

Vice President Mondale has been down to Brazil, and Jimmy Carter has been to Brazil, but there is never any effort to get these Nazi war criminals. … Another article about Argentina making fake U.S. visas, this was in the Washington Post —"at least 3,000 illegal aliens, some from North Korea, South Korea, and other countries" which are not named, get passports into the United States from the U.S. consulate. A ring may have been involved in $5 million, payments for giving false travel papers. This is April of 1979, but the Vatican was writing passports for Nazi agents after WWII to go down to South America, and Argentina was writing passports for people like Martin Bormann and other agents to travel. … So it comes out this week that this is 20 or 30 years of false papers [so] people can come from all over the world to the United States and stir up some more trouble here.

Another article in the New York Times (March 25), a dispute over releasing funds for investigating 175,000 Nazi war criminals in the United States. Congressman Elizabeth Holtzman, a Democrat from Brooklyn, has been working with the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law for several years. There was a $2 million fund to investigate a special litigation unit on Nazi war crimes. No one can figure out why there is a delay in investigating it. The Justice Department hasn't been serious about prosecution; not a single attorney has been hired since May, 1978 despite repeated requests for the Nazi task force. Congress allocated $2,052,000 for direct use by the unit, and it hasn't been used. There is no staff, no attorneys, and they are not looking for the Nazis. …

There are some powerful forces trying to [run] Elizabeth Holtzman out of congress, the way Bella Abzug was pushed out in New York City. [Holtzman] has been working on this for two years, trying to get this investigation going. She's had no cooperation from the Justice Department.

Political Murders, the Mob, a Missing Shipload of Heroin & the Attempted Murder of Bernadette Devlin

(World Watchers International, KLRB-FM, Carmel Valley, Calif., February 1, 1981)

Our federal agencies—the CIA, the FBI, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the NSA and so forth—have all been pressed together to put down labor unions [and] social programs, kill "radical" [and] liberal leaders, cultural leaders, social leaders—and musicians and artists and writers and entertainers while they develop their police and armed forces around the world.

They use the mob for killing and wiping out counter-forces—and in exchange, the mob was promised, if they would use their goon squads as killer teams, that the mob would not be prosecuted for their narcotic imports. And that brings in Air America and Flying Tigers, and books on the war in Vietnam, and China, and the United States and military planes going into the narcotic business, culminating in large amounts of money stolen from banks every single week, unaccounted money that ends up in the hands of mobs, and gun-running, experimentation and fascism.

So the huge profits today are not $1 million or $2 million exposed changing hands, but it will be $55 million at the Nugan Hand Bank missing from Australia, and $22 million from another city in Florida, and $50 million from Minneapolis, and $23 million from Houston. And a truck with $27 million was shipped to Louisiana this week, and the mob didn't pick it up because it was marked.

And an entire ship disappeared that was supposed to have corn to be transferred for heroin coming in from the Middle East. The ship, "The Poet," is missing from Scotland Yard, and the CIA linked it to the Gambino Family, so you don't get a plane-load or a paper bag filled with seven pounds of heroin any longer—you get the entire ship. …

The reason to study these assassinations is to keep track of how many heads of state have power today because they are directly linked to murders that preceded them. Ronald Reagan has worked closely with people from the team of Alpha 66, anti-Castro Cubans. And Richard Nixon's team—the people who killed John Kennedy, those he has protected and worked with—[assured that] he came into office not having to compete with the power of Nelson Rockefeller, who was done in about two years before the elections. Nelson Rockefeller was quickly cremated on the orders of a doctor from South Africa working at the hospital. They didn't examine the body to see if he was poisoned, and no questions about the Secret Service [agents] who were supposed to be with him.…

There was an article in the Los Angeles Times this week—it's the anniversary of the death of Mahatma Ghandi, a symbol to the British to get out of India. The article has a tragic tone to it, "Ghandi: His Image Fades for the Indians," and it tells how the upper-classes have no interest in him, that they thought he was too austere, and they were uncomfortable with his turning away material possessions. And 97 percent of the students in India know very little about Mahatma Ghandi. He's now actually almost in obscurity, the universities don't teach courses about him, and they want to forget that he existed.

Another leader who was shot this week—that we haven't heard a thing about—is [Irish activist and former Parliamentarian] Bernadette Devlin. A group of three people broke into her home in Ireland, and they hit her seven times in the chest, hip, leg. Three gunmen. And they used sledge hammers. She was in a cottage with her husband, she had three children and she was getting them ready for school. She said when she went to the hospital: "Now they think that they've got me and I'm not dead yet." She and her husband are still alive—he also was gunned down, three times, in serious condition.

But there will be this continuous slaughter of people who speak up, our world leaders, unless there is a positive effort to change this society.

The Worst Kind of Illegal Alien

(World Watchers International broadcast, KLRB-FM, April 13, 1979)

The New York Times (April 5) has a story, "Paraguay Alien Tied to Murders in Native Lands." They found in Brooklyn a man living with a woman, a nephew and a child who [came] from Paraguay. His name is Mr. Pena, and federal agents have been looking for him. He's been living in a Shephardic neighborhood in Paraguay. He's been involved in the killing and torture of the opponent of Alfred Stroessner and the military government down in Paraguay. And the opponent's son was a 17-year-old, picked up, tortured and killed. The boy died, was beaten and received high-voltage electric shock. … Mr. Pena was charged with murder, but he left Paraguay, came to New York City.

People wanted for murder and torture, linked to the Nazis, have no trouble getting into this country.

Joseph Mengele & "The Boys from Guyana"

(Mae Brussell's World Watchers International, KLRB-FM, May 31, 1981)

… I do want to mention, again, a very quiet story that didn't make the headlines everywhere. A New York newspaper had a large story this week that said Joseph Mengele, the notorious "Angel of Death" from Auschwitz, has been very much alive in New Jersey and Westchester, New York. He has a relative living in New Jersey who has a farm manufacturing company, and he also worked for the firm. It was well-known in Germany.

When he left Auschwitz, he was never wanted as a war criminal. He was never wanted at the Nuremberg trials. And when he was recognized in Germany, he went on down to South America. I've alleged for a long time that Mengele has been in and out of this country, and that the FBI has documents that he has in fact been an American citizen since the 1930s. I've had information from people that he's been in Nevada City not too long ago. Now it turns out that he was very much seen in Westchester County, the headquarters of narcotics and organized crime. And his crew from Uruguay, Paraguay, Chile and Argentina have a lot of activity up in Westchester County and in New Jersey where he was. Mengele does travel in the United States. He has lived here and goes in and out of the United States. That was confirmed by another series of articles that just came out this week. Those of you who are familiar with this program know that I've been saying this has been happening for a long time.

There are a lot of people who are outraged by the experiments he did at Auschwitz, his extermination policies, his treacherous experimentations on people, all kinds of body experiments. But there are many other people that consider him a fine, reputable citizen, and they look upon those victims at Auschwitz as animals or beasts, and they don't think of him as torturing. And I believe that if we look further, we'll find The Boys From Brazil—the movie that was made about Mengele—will in fact be The Boys From Guyana. I said that also at the time of the Jonestown massacre.

Joe Holsinger, the aid to [Congressman] Leo Ryan who was murdered down in Jonestown, had given me the phone number of a doctor in Westchester County who allegedly supplied the bulk of the drugs for Jonestown. I never called him and I kept the number, but that's an interesting point now because of Mengele's association there in Westchester, and experimentation with electrodes, the surgery without anesthetics, the mistreatment, and the narcotic or mind experimental drugs that were down in Jonestown.

As I said before, the book The Children of Jonestown tells about enough drugs in the laboratory for a population of 60,000. And there were, at the most, 900–1,000 people there. But there were different accounts, as you know, when [the bodies] were first counted. [At first it was] over 400, and then that number was greater the next day. I was told the bulk of the drugs for their experimentation or treatment came from Westchester. It would be interesting now to see if Mengele and this pharmacist who sent them to Jim Jones had any connection, and if The Boys From Guyana are The Boys From Brazil. I've had a deep feeling for a long time that there were connecting links between the Jonestown experimentations and Joseph Mengele from Auschwitz.

Ronald Reagan, Bitburg Sandwich

(Mae Brussell, World Watchers International, KAZU-FM, Pacific Grove, Calif, April 29, 1985.)

The president of the United States, Ronald Reagan, is a sandwich. He's a sausage between two pieces of bread, squeezed at both ends. One is Fritz Kraemer and Henry Kissinger, representing the Fourth Reich. The other is Richard von Weizsäcker and Helmut Kohl—representing the Fourth Reich. Germany and America, with the president of the United States in between—and the relish on the bun is, of course, Richard Nixon with his contacts to Germans in America.

There was an article about Helmut Kohl, who said that he had reassured Ronald Reagan that he would not back out of the demand that he visit Bitburg, and that there was no way to change that commitment.

A Kohl advisor added—and this was in the San Francisco Chronicle on April 23—"if one tries to act symbolically, one has to choose the symbols carefully." Well, the symbol of this particular Bitburg piece of geography is [its history as] the staging area for the Battle of the Bulge; it had already been decided by that time that the real project was to take on the Soviet Union.

[Reagan's Bitburg trip] involved a cast of characters that I have been talking about for the past years: Prince Bernhard of the SS, he worked for IG Farben and married Queen Juliana in Holland; Henry Kissinger, an advisor to all media networks at the present time, former secretary of state and national security advisor, the roving ambassador for the Germans; William Casey, the CIA director; Fritz Kraemer.

Senator Howard Metzenbaum urged Chancellor Kohl to back down on the demand [upon] our president of the United States: "Please take our president off the hook." And Helmut Kohl said: "No."

Another quotation in the newspaper was: "I don't think the president of the United States should go to a German cemetery to honor German soldiers who died killing American soldiers in the service of the greatest tyrant of our time, Adolf Hitler." That was from Senator Cranston. He said, "there are graves of SS troops in the cemetary that make it unsavory and intolerable." At one point, Cranston said, "are Germany's ties to the United States so weak, so tenuous and so insecure and uncertain that Germany's price for reassurance is the humiliation of our president?"

What they don't understand—the news media, Senator Cranston, Senator Metzenbaum and these well-meaning people—is that the relationship, Germany and Ronald Reagan, is so secure that they don't care who screams and yells, they are going to meet anyways. …

The symbolism, as I say—they said it, and I'm quoting again—"is very important." What is the symbolism of Bitburg? The "symbolism" is that the American president and Americans and veterans and others living in this country will forget the Bulge.

You get help in forgetting the Battle of the Bulge. Many times I've referred to congressional hearings on the Dachau Trials. There were the Nuremberg Trials and the Dachau Trials. And do you know, there are NOT entire books on the defendants in the Dachau Trials. The builders, the SS, the choice elite were separated. The bankers were released by John J. McCloy, and the multinational weapons-makers were released by the Nuremberg group. The Dachau [Nazis] were the Waffen SS—and they are making tomorrow's Waffen possible!

Hunt Family Update

(World Watchers International, KAZU-FM, Pacific Grove, Calie, July 8, 1985)

Another member of the Hunt family's name came into the news just this week—Ward Hunt [and] his association with Princess Michel of Kent. Her name surfaced when Ronald Reagan was going to Bitburg, because her father was (he passed away) SS officer Gunther von Reibnitz. He played an important role with Richard von Weizsäcker's father, the current president of Germany, in the overthrow of Czechoslovakia.

So it came out this week that she was allegedly having an affair or meeting with Mr. Ward Hunt, and it may be very political. It doesn't even have to be sexual, but the British monarchy, the daughter of the SS family, is meeting in Texas and other places with Ward Hunt.

Herbert Hunt is linked in the Italian news this week to Pro Deo, Father Morlion and the CIA. And Ward Hunt is linked to Princess Michel of Kent.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

CIA-MAFIA CONSPIRATORS CAN REST EASIER

By Warren Hinckle

(San Francisco Examiner, October 6, 1988)

Mae Brussell died this week. The question is, who killed her?

Mae was the grandest conspiracy theorist of them all, the Madame Defarge of paranoia. Her last passion before she slipped through the narrow door was investigating satanic cults in the military.

She found conspiratorial links in events large and small, from the Kennedy assassinations to Watergate to Contragate, and anytime anyone of note died, she was at the ready with a fascinating theory of why the death fit The Pattern.

Not one of her many friends, which included this writer, would doubt she would come up with a compelling conspiracy theory of her own death at a vibrant 66. Among the many enemies she was constantly exposing on her weekly radio show that was gospel to conspiracy buffs were Nazi scientists in the U.S., the Mafia, the CIA and the oil cartels—and that's a mean lot of enemies. The doctors say she died of cancer, but that was what they said about Jack Ruby, and Mae knew better than that. "Mae was multi-motivated," her old friend, publisher and co-conspiratorialist Paul Krassner said, admiringly, "but her specialty was Lee Harvey Oswald."

Mae was a complacent Carmel housewife raising a bunch of kids until the John F. Kennedy assassination. The horror of having her kids watch Jack Ruby bump off Lee Harvey Oswald right on daytime TV in what was obviously a set piece of work made her a conspiratorial crusader. If at times Mae was short on theory, she was always long on facts—at the time of her death Monday, she had amassed more than 80,000 pages of research material amassed from a compulsive clipping of 15 newspapers a day and a couple of hundred magazines a month. She was the first researcher to come up with the facts of Richard Nixon's career links—unquestionably earlier, more speculatively later—to the mob.

Krassner said Mae called him after he published a famously crude piece of fiction in The Realist about an alleged act of necrophilia between Lyndon Johnson and the corpse of John Kennedy aboard Air Force One returning from Dallas to Washington, D.C. on Nov. 22, 1963, and told him things even he hadn't imagined about the Kennedy assassination.

Mae remained in the pack of Kennedy assassination researchers but came into her own with Watergate. "Three weeks after Watergate, when the press was still treating it like a third-rate burglary, Mae sent me a piece that had the goods on the entire cast of characters—Hunt, McCord, Martinez and the rest—and linking them back to CIA-Mafia ties to the Kennedy assassination," Krassner said.

The main Brussell thesis, if I dare risk committing the sin of summary on her complex work, was that an ex-Nazi scientist-Old Boy OSS clique in the CIA using Mafia hit men changed the course of American history this past quarter-century by bumping off one and all, high and low, who became an irritant to them. She believed the Manson Family was set up by counterintelligence types to blacken the image of anti-war music-and-youth longhairs who were becoming a threat to the dominant culture and that Jonestown was a medical and mind-control experiment in getting rid of undesirables.

Mae never had a theory she couldn't back up with a bewildering mass of news clippings and assorted facts. The question that must in all respect and sobriety be asked about Mae Brussell is the one Tom Wolfe asked about Marshall McLuhan: "Whaaaaat if she was right?"

"Way back then in the '60s, way back before Watergate even happened, Mae told me that all the crazy and violent things going on in the country were part of a plan to get Ronald Reagan in office," said Krassner.

To the living children whose lives were twisted and thwarted and who were forced to do things that no child could do without being split into many pieces and in memory of the dead children and for those struggling to know who they are

PART I

THE SPLIT MIND

ONE

The sell-off

If you have a single, undivided mind, it must be difficult to fathom how people could walk around with splits in their mind; how one part of the mind could take over and all the other parts would know nothing of it; how one part of the split mind could make the body do something that none of the other parts would want or remember.

I had already had mountains of therapy and thought I was finished with my memories of my childhood and adulthood as a victim of mind control and ritual abuse in a multigenerational family, and the obliteration of my memory by criminal groups. Traumatic remembrances still dribbled out, but my concept of myself held a steady course like a vessel sailing through a fogged night.

I had long suspected that my sister and I did not have the same biological parents. Perhaps we had the same father but not the same mother, I thought. We don't look alike but there is something familiar about us. Marlene is stunning with her long straight hair and I'm not. But we have the same overly narrow wrists, one of our eyebrows is almost identical, and we share the same inherited talents and interests. And now that we have aged, we look even more alike. I ignored all that and thought we were too different as people to be full sisters, though I knew this disparity to be common. How could one sister be interested in the recovery of memory and being, and the other adverse?

A couple of years ago, Marlene visited her married son in a nearby state with her new boyfriend. They slept over at her son's house. I was invited for the afternoon. I went into their guest bathroom and saw my sister's hairbrush filled with her luscious long hair like a bird's ambitious nest on the sink. With my fingers I combed most of it out and placed it in a plastic bag I happened to have in my purse. I left enough hair in her brush that Marlene wouldn't become suspicious. None of this was premeditated. Once I got back to my home in Baltimore, I called laboratories that specialized in DNA testing. I mailed it and a sample of my saliva to a lab. The DNA report said we were full sisters with the same parents. I was shocked. I had been so sure. I started doubting all my memories.

Meanwhile a towel fell off my shower door onto my right little finger and tore a tendon. I went to a hand specialist. While I was in his office, I said, “Would you look at my left little finger and tell me what made it like that?” My mother had told me I was born with a deformed left little finger. There was no reason for me not to believe her, but I didn't. The doctor examined the tip and said in an instant with certainty, “It's an amputation that happened before you were three. How did it happen?” During the years of therapy I received, I had already remembered my paternal grandfather's chicken farm in upper state New York and the initiation ritual with me wearing a white ruffled dress, a hatchet coming down not to my neck but to this finger. The hatchet aimed at my neck swerved at the last moment. I was under three years old. I didn't tell the doctor. He said, “You probably caught it in a door by accident.”

“It was no accident,” I mumbled as he hurried to another patient. So I was wrong about my sibling but right about the initiation ritual.

Starting over

Over a decade before this, I had finished ten years of intense therapy, and now I was in another crisis. Confusion makes people desperate, and there weren't many people I could talk to about memories of mind control. I contacted a therapist and writer friend from the past, E. Sue Blume. She is a specialist in dissociative memories. I told her I doubted myself. E. Sue said that while I had been retired from this field, others had been galloping along. She greatly respected Alison Miller's safe and competent, innovative work. She arranged for me to talk with Alison on the phone.

It was as if a voice without a face fell from the skies. I wanted to know whether all my mind control programs had been removed by my previous therapist, Ann, or whether any were still active. During the phone evaluation, Alison asked me what my internal structure was, who my gatekeeper was, whether I had memories of snuff films. “Snuff films!” I was getting more and more overwhelmed, dismayed, and frustrated. Wasn't the abuse I remembered bad enough? I kept saying, “No,” and “I don't know”. She asked whether I was in touch with my family. I said I was.

Alison explained to me about safety precautions. She was especially concerned that I not report what was going on in me to anyone in my family or who could potentially be involved with the abuser group.

Alison told me that my programs were still active. How could this be? I'd had so many memories, and so many years of therapy. She said I didn't know the fundamental and important things I should have discovered. My brain galloped within. Underneath, some people in me panicked, and others had headaches, as if a vise were around my skull. I hadn't yet recognized that feeling as a body memory. Every one of my nerves was in anxious distress. The voice over the phone implied that all the recovery work I had done for decades was for naught. That work had been my life. Despair mixed with fear. A chorus of internal, indistinguishable, indistinct voices sung out to me, “We are here. They will kill us. Don't tell.” I had body memories of electroshock. Fear, hope, despair, worry whirled around uncontrollably. I was filled with too much unrest to sleep.

Right there, my world changed. The queens in me slipped out wearing their crowns and ice blue fur-trimmed capes. They sniffed. They smelled hope. Was there really someone in the world to help? They watched and quickened in expectation. Word went up and down the ladders in my system. This exploration into retrieving my frozen-over soul began. In therapy a decade before, Ann, my Christian therapist who was also a plant, had taught me that forces in the universe harassed me, and that when I became anxious and depressed and had “visions” of abuse, it was from spiritual warfare, from Satan and his forces making me uneasy. A plant is someone who pretends to help you but really works for one of the mind-controlling groups. “They are all parts of you; they are not spiritual forces from outside of you. So you need to listen to them, not banish them,” Alison said. I grappled with what was outside of me and what was within. Neither one of us initially suspected that Ann was a plant from the abusers. But one day I described the hand signals Ann used during my sessions with her. Alison knew what that meant. Ann was busted, which meant my process was just beginning.

Alison continued to provide long-distance guidance. One day about half a year later, she wrote that she cared about me. Did I want to start this process again, did I want to spend myself finding out what my past is? No, then yes. I do. No. I had held my life intact. I had a simple, comfortable enough house, a job. I could save a little for retirement. I didn't need to open the whole thing again. I didn't need to talk to another of these therapists. Alison was on the other side of the continent and in another country. No. I went to sleep, if what I do can be called sleep. I woke up. I would re-open. I could take out stitches that my skin had grown over. I would begin again.

A therapist who is a good person is an antidote to the people filled with hatred, the people who abused me. It is easy for the tortured to believe that all people are harmful, so it is especially important to be in touch with genuine, wholesome humans. Previously, I had been alone in this world of horror. Now I had an interested companion as I re-entered it. Support also contradicted my low self-esteem. If someone is helping me, I must be somewhat worthwhile, I thought. Alison's targeted questions kept me on track. She spotted the blanks in the narrative, what Ann had deliberately taken out. She probed for the training memories, the first instances of them, pointed out any incongruities and inconsistencies in my story, and reached out to my insiders who held the emotional and physical pain of each memory. She would also ask, “What words did they say?” I might have missed much of this if I were just working on my own.

A life lurked behind and underneath my brain, a life I didn't know about yet but could smell. How could I have spent so many years in therapy and know hardly anything about myself? Now I know it is because I went to therapists who were plants.

If you think the world is pure and innocent and that almost all of our political leaders mean well, then you may not believe what I am about to write. Some of the public has to be interested in the below-the-surface webs of duplicity, why a stench of evil permeates ordinary life.

This story is really about electricity.

The Nazi purchase, 1947

In my normal life, I thought I was a regular Jewish child from Queens, New York, far away from the East European world my grandparents came from and far away from Hitler, about whom I had heard only the vaguest things. I was not face to face with the horrors of the Holocaust, and my family never talked about their escape from Europe.

I think the letters began around when I was born in 1943, but I of course didn't know about them until later.

The memory of the letters came to me in a dream. I saw the stationery, insignia, signature. At first, I couldn't believe that our government was that corrupt. I remembered Mengele's smell in my conscious life, and the black machines, and all the children in the hallways, and the frozen eyes.

A letter arrived which caused great excitement, and Mrs. Twartski called for a special meeting that took place in our living room. Mrs. Twartski was my handler. A handler, also called a trainer, is the person who controls you and makes you do things you never would choose to do. Handlers start by breaking a child's mind into pieces and in cults like these, try to control the mind for the person's whole life. They administer programs and their cues or triggers as they take over a life. All the leaders of our community were present. Children did not attend this family meeting, but we were excellent eavesdroppers.

Uncle Harry and Mrs. Twartski sat on one of Mother's curved sofas. Uncles Richard and Sidney sat on the other sofa. My mother sat on the piano bench by the window that overlooked the waterfall. She wasn't supposed to be at this meeting but since it was her apartment, they let her stay. Maybe that's why she chose the worst seat and was trying to be inconspicuous. Usually she liked a lot of attention. My father was in his wing chair and Wiezenslowski sat in Mother's wing chair. He was very short and always wore a mask. People said he was the master programmer who knew the most. In mind control, programmers divide victims' brains into sections, one section not knowing about another, with each section blindly following commands that are to that person's detriment. Mother had taken the pale blue slipcovers off the wing chairs for this occasion, and their chartreuse silk looked clean and shiny.

Aunts Mimi and Eileen led my sister and me into the kitchen. Grandma and Aunt Bea were there already. We all listened through the walls. Mrs. Twartski read:

> The great country of Deutschland is delighted to accept your invitation to have our revered Herr Doktor Josef Mengele visit your United States of America and instruct selected communities on the current state of our advanced knowledge of mental development, stimulation and management.
> Our officials will be in contact with you concerning schedule and reimbursement.
>
> Very truly yours, Felix Hofstadtler, Assistant to the Secretary of the Interior

This meeting was a big happening in our family and there was a rosier excitement than when they talked politics. I was aware letters were arriving from Germany shortly after Daniel died. Daniel was the boy who loved me and whom they killed. My father kept some of the letters in his safe in his hall closet. He was the lawyer for our group and had been corresponding for years. Germany first wrote to President Roosevelt, then President Roosevelt and Mr. Truman, then President Truman. This letter came after the war had ended. Which part of the German government, undercover government or group impersonating a government, had sent the letters is unknown to me. I might be wrong about the date and the spelling of the name. In their ordinary lives, my Jewish family hated the Germans but in their cult-robot lives, they cooperated with the Nazis. And also their own American government. The United States government was the conduit to Mengele and his entourage. The United States wanted to learn the Nazi mind-control programming techniques and not be left behind. What better weapon than the human brain? The human brain was Mrs. Twartski's and Wiezenslowski's domain. The children who were used were the castaways of the United States government, like dogs abandoned in a vet's office. Mrs. Twartski read the letter out loud, slowly and carefully enunciating every word in her thick Polish accent.

The German research scientists were looking for children who could learn quickly, were between ages four and twelve, and could withstand being famished without dying. Deutschland was paying $50,000 per subject. Everyone in the living room except Mrs. Twartski and all my aunts let out a huge “Ahhh”. My sister's and my eyes grew wide because we had no idea what this meant or why the adults were so excited. Then my sister's eyes narrowed as if she knew something that I didn't yet, as if she had just figured something out. She was very smart even though she got bad grades in school.

Mrs. Twartski continued: “Every selected community that receives this letter via the United States government should nominate two children to begin with. The great Herr Doktor Josef Mengele will visit New York, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Paul, Duluth and other Midwestern cities, Dallas, San Francisco, and Los Angeles next month.”

UNCLE HARRY: “It's like magic. They do things and don't remember they did it!”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “How is that different from what we already are doing?”

UNCLE RICHARD: “They're refined techniques, much more advanced than our methods. The Germans know.”

MOTHER: “But what about the children?”

UNCLE HARRY: “They won't remember anything. Children never remember.”

UNCLE RICHARD: “It will be like it never happened.”

WIEZENSLOWSKI: “That's why the government brings Nazis over here, so they can learn from them, so that we know how to manipulate people's minds better.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “We are already expert on manipulating people's minds.”

Purplish crows outside the windows screeched harrowing cries. It must have been late autumn by the time this letter reached us.

Mrs. Twartski said, “We have decided that Marlene and Wendy Hoffman will be the first subjects. If Dr. Mengele requests other children in the months to come, then Rhonda Jacobs and Sheila Goldman will be the next set, and Michael Jacobs and DeeDee Goldman will be after them.”

“Well, children, now that it's settled, I'll be leaving,” Wiezenslowski said.

“Aren't you going to stay and eat anything?” Grandma said.

“No, I have business to attend to.”

A short time later, my grandfather with his mean beady eyes entered wearing the same kind of coat and shoes as Wiezenslowski, but I didn't think much of it then.

In the kitchen, my Aunt Eileen and Aunt Mimi stared at each other. “Why my children and not yours?” Eileen said. Marlene and I looked at each other. Her features blurred and she breathed sharply. At first, I felt proud. It's always good to be chosen. It was an honor. The letter said so. Although I didn't know what it meant. And why was Aunt Eileen unhappy and angry at Aunt Mimi? Aunt Mimi's children were under four; one was just a baby. But I would be with Marlene. I wouldn't be alone.

My father came into the narrow, pink and green kitchen. His face was glowing. “You can join us now,” he said. He was so wrapped in radiance, he forgot to suspect that we were eavesdropping. We all walked into the living room. The letter with its thick veined paper and insignia lay on the table with its envelope next to it. The gold insignia looked like a sunburst with ripples. Children in my class drew suns that looked like the insignia. Fancy stamps were on the envelope.

“Can I show it to my friends?” I asked.

“No,” everyone screamed. “Bad child!” All the adults sipped ginger ale and ate cocktail franks, chunks of Daitch's Swiss and muenster cheeses and a wheel of gouda cheese wrapped in shiny red plastic the color of the women's nail polish, different kinds of crackers, pineapple chunks that my father had cut up, herring. Uncle Harry and my father had shots of hard liquor. Uncle Harry slapped my father on the back and said, “You're rich.”

It was a big party, filling all the living room and dining room space. People were gathered around Mrs. Twartski, the star of this community. My grandfather also liked being near Mrs. Twartski. He kept bringing her platters of cakes and cookies that Grandmother baked that morning, and smiling his crooked smile and pushing his body a little closer to hers. Grandma glared at her, which didn't stop Grandpa Max. Mrs. Twartski preferred the cheese and crackers.

After everyone left, my parents cleaned up the living room, dining room, kitchen, and bathroom. My mother was angry that someone hadn't used a coaster and had left a ring on the side table in the living room. Marlene would not tell me what the experiments meant, and I sensed it all meant something terrible for Marlene and me. Mother kept banging dishes and seemed angrier and angrier even as my father appeared more and more pleased. My heart was becoming a rope that left my body and twisted itself tight. Around midnight, my sister and I got into her bed together and listened to our mother's ripping screams and deep moans coming from across the apartment. It sounded like something coming from the depths of the forest where Bambi's mother was shot. Marlene and I clasped each other's hands. Around two o'clock in the morning, we heard the front door slam. With our father out of the house, we were able to sleep. I didn't know when he came back, but when we woke he was in his bed.

Mengele in America

A month after my family's meeting, Mengele entered our living room. It is generally thought that Mengele fled to South America after the war and remained there for the rest of his life. He may have used South America as a home base, but during that time he traveled around the world experimenting on victims and informing and teaching other countries about his mind-control discoveries, which the United States wanted to learn.[1] Mengele's face was lined and often had beads of sweat on it. He was like a dead, thinner version of my father. His piercing eyes devoured you in a cannibalistic way. Only my parents were present, and Marlene and I were expelled to the kitchen. Marlene held a glass to the wall and listened through it. She said I shouldn't because I might drop it and then our parents would know that we were eavesdropping.

“Then we'll have to do double experiments on her and it may be too much for one girl. I don't want to have my experiments ruined or falsified,” Mengele said.

My heart stopped throbbing and calcified in my stone body. I ceased being a breathing person. I knew what this meant, that Mother had got Marlene out of it and put the whole thing on me. Marlene looked relieved. She let the breath out of her body and her face spread out. I would be alone there. My father was talking to Mengele in that oily way of his. I couldn't decipher their words, something about payment. After he left, no one talked about it.

A season passed and it was cool outside. Mengele was in the foyer of our apartment. He wore a blue overcoat. The man with him wore a cap and ran in and out of our apartment to the driver outside in the parked limousine. My sister wore old clothes. I was dressed up and scrubbed. Mengele glanced at the portrait of my sister in an off-the-shoulder white blouse with braids piled on her head. She looked like a Greek goddess. I could see Mother killing herself for not having removed the portrait. They never hung a portrait of me.

“I want to see her naked,” Mengele said pointing to Marlene. She froze and shook. My mother flung her body in front of Marlene's and said, “You can't have her. I love her, my daughter.”

My father said, “Take the younger one. She's smarter,” as he pushed me forward.

Marlene cried because our father said I was smarter even though he was just trying to manipulate Mengele. The doctor's chest grew large.

“All right, we'll take her. She'll be back on Sunday or Monday, depending,” Mengele said. It was Thursday. He slipped a check on the dining room table in the foyer. It was a pale blue check that contrasted with the dark wood. Morris S. Hoffman, the date and the dollar amount were written in faint, careful script. “Mengele” was in thick black curving lines. I could read everything but the amount, which had many zeroes.

Mengele slipped his rough arm under mine and dragged me to the front door. The top of my oxfords scraped against the pale gray carpet. My mother pulled out a small suitcase the size of a briefcase that she had packed for me the day before and hidden in my father's hall closet by the entrance. I was too afraid to cry. My body was stiff, dragging and not moving on its own. My clothes seemed to follow me. Betrayal is a more subtle, twisted feeling than terror. It burns and eats, but terror stabs right through.

“She won't need anything,” Mengele said, pushing my mother and the suitcase away and pulling me through the front door, up the three steps, out the side entrance and into the parked limousine. Mengele got into the back seat with me. Two men were in the front. It was 1947. My sister was almost nine. I was four and a half. The car doors locked.

The limousine drove up 68th Road, turned right at 108th Street. Before we reached Enterprise Avenue, Mengele whipped out his white handkerchief and pressed it against my nose. I fell unconscious. It was past midnight anyway and I was usually asleep by eight o'clock. Even in this heavily drugged sleep, I felt my body spasm and saw iron cages opening and closing.

When I awoke, I was at the Montauk Point Programming Center on Long Island. I had been here before under Mrs. Twartski's care. The Center was part Bauhaus sleek and clean, and part dungeon filled with children. The building looked white, and had an outside overhang where cars dropped people off. Water, the Long Island Sound, and towers with machines on top were outside too. The machines were spinning like windmills. The inside had a central open staircase and programming rooms upstairs and in the basement levels. I was probably in the group of American children Mengele first experimented on. Construction in the basement had not been completed. I don't know why I thought there would be an adjustment period. Attendants strapped me to a stretcher and wheeled me roughly into an inner room. At this Center, there wasn't morning, afternoon, and night. It was twenty-four hours with no sleeping and no eating. Mengele only worked on hungry subjects, like a dog trainer. I heard the staff ate in the cafeteria. We wore only the oversized helmets that shot electricity into our brains, and electrodes all over our bodies. The staff kept us in a drugged state from injections into our bodies and scalps.

Terror is so sharp, you wouldn't believe it could be turned up a notch. When it reaches its crescendo, it transforms into a watchful passivity. The insides are running while the outside is both immobile and levitating. The heart is breaking out of the body while the bones and skin invert.

Our government built the Montauk Point Programming Center for experimentation in mind control. Mengele was a guest there. The workers, including Mrs. Twartski, bowed down to him as if he were a god. Mengele thought of himself as God. These groups' first concern is that none of their victims spill the beans. Mengele adapted his mind-control techniques for America and probably other countries. Children like to talk about what happens to them. Some of Mengele's first experiments were to trick us into believing we would self-destruct if we told. He wanted young children as subjects because young children readily believe lies and their minds are still malleable. I believed almost all the lies they told me.

The mental surgeries took place in the basement chambers. I had already been drugged, my wrists and ankles were clamped, a huge helmet with wires was on my head and electrodes were on my body. Mengele said, “Mrs. Twartski, please notate that these are experiments twelve to twenty-four,” as he pushed a long needle into the nerve of the first tooth.

“We are doing a new kind of surgery. It is experimental. We are implanting cameras in you. They are tracking devices. They will follow you forever and record everything you do, everyone you talk to and whatever you say. With these cameras, you will never be free of us. You will never be able to escape. You will always be our prisoner. Only very special people get to be our prisoners. These are the first ten to twenty cameras, telescopes, tape recorders, and other devices that we are sealing in your top row of teeth.”

Another day or night in a basement room at Montauk Point, Mengele put a knife on my chest, and told me he was taking out my human heart and inserting a bomb instead. The cut felt like a ragged line.

“If you ever try and turn away from us, it will explode and you will blow yourself up and the people around you. It knows your thoughts and moves. It is in you now and will be in you forever.

“Close it up now, Mrs. Twartski. Seal her chest back. Now we are making the hideous scar invisible only because we are being kind to you.

We leave it showing for some girls and boys," Mengele said as he administered intermittent jolts of electricity. Mrs. Twartski put a black glue, then a black tape on the pretend scar, then peeled the whole thing off. The child parts of my brain that Mengele addressed believed there was a bomb instead of a heart in my body.

Also while in the lower levels of Montauk Point, Mengele said, "I am taking out your womb and putting in a cow's womb. I've done this hundreds, thousands of times in the camps. You will only give birth to animals from now on."

I spent my childhood looking down at my chest to see if it was growing. I prayed and prayed that it would not grow. I could never understand why I had this fear until the girl entrapped in the Mengele section of my mind's internal structure said, "I don't want to give birth to an animal or to a half person and half animal. If I have breasts, I could get pregnant."

"We have a nice little girl, let's slice her in half and I can have half and you can have half. Which half do you want, vanilla or chocolate?" I felt my fear rising even though I realized he was trying to make me afraid. I thought of the half chocolate and half vanilla cookies my grandmother brought from the bakery on Paradise Boulevard.

Mrs. Twartski answered, "Vanilla." I was surprised. I thought she liked chocolate.

Mengele said, "I'll get my saw. We'll put this vise on her head to hold her still. Tell me when her brains come out, then I'll know I squeezed too tight." That started my terror despite myself. I could feel worry becoming a mountain with ice on top.

Mengele said "You're going to go to a dentist who'll put very sharp needles all the way down your throat. You have that to look forward to too." Then they spun me, saying "Who wants to remember what's going to happen to her?" They were trying to bring out an internal part that would always do what they commanded.

MENGELE: "It should be a boy and not a girl."

MRS. TWARTSKI: "Why?"

MENGELE: "They're more controllable."

I liked to spite Mengele even more than I liked to rebel against Wiezenslowski, the other big shot. I felt my inside people think, if he wants a boy, a girl will come out. That was the only way I could think of to fight back.

I said, “I'll remember and I'm a girl.”

Once a part of the mind comes out to accept a task, it's too much trouble for the mind controllers to put that part back in and coax out a more suitable part. This part's name was Annie and she had a Raggedy Anne doll look. Mengele was angry that I popped out. “Maybe I should whip you.”

Mrs. Twartki said, “Let's get on with it.” Mengele wore a devil costume with a tail. Mrs. Twartski wore her floral dress. She was heavy and square looking like both my grandmas. He went right up to my face and roared and scared me. That made me want to fight him harder. He was like an eight-year-old and I was four.

“Let's take her and flush her down the toilet,” he said.

My head was way too big to flush down the toilet. It was silly. He raged at me. “We're going to throw you in the ocean. You deserve to feed the fish. We'll take you to the top of the tower and throw you out the window. Whenever you see a shadow or a Negro man, you'll be afraid, you'll even scream. Whenever you see a Japanese man, you'll be afraid he'll cut you with a sword. Whenever you hear a bell, you'll be afraid I'm going to come and get you. And if you don't get afraid, then know I will take this knife and cut all the way from your chin down the center of your body and Mrs. Twartski will scoop out your insides. So it's better to be afraid, if you want some advice.”

He threw me onto a cot. “I'm getting bored.”

Mrs. Twartski said “Me too.”

“We'll come back later.” They didn't come back that day.

The information about all these “experiments” was held in different sections of my brain. When all the distinct parts come together, the memory can crystallize. All divisions need an internal leader to control them when the outside cult leaders are not present. The mind controllers torture the body with spinning, alcohol, drugs, and electroshock until one aspect of the mind steps forward only to spare the others and stop the torture. Usually there were many failed attempts and then a part of me relented. For the internal leader of this section, they ended up with a seven-year-old girl who was alternately raped and strangled while relatives chanted, fusing the names “Mengele” and “Wendela.” This girl then thought of herself as an internal replica of Mengele, who kept the other parts obedient. The parts that jump out to do this dirty work are the real heroes because they save the others.

Mrs. Twartski gave Mengele the “black book” on me. Cult handlers record everything that happens from conception to death in the black book. She recorded all the mind-control procedures that were used to separate my mind into sections with purposes. All the victims have a black book on them. Mrs. Twartski hand wrote her entries, but now the black books are computerized. The German scientists would know how to go right into my already created parts, chambers, and structures. They would know how to build from my foundation. People call this mind control Nazi programming. Until Mengele, I had dealt only with my parents and handlers. All of them had a drop of compassion in them, except for Wiezenslowski. They probably had programming in them to force them to control children and believed something worse would happen if they didn't. My parents and handlers flickered in and out of evil, but Mengele stayed consistent.

In that moment, I could have signed up for evil to make my life easier, the way my relatives had, but something in me recoiled sharply. I made a vow and all the morality in me shot out like a missile. From the many parts of my brain that took the Mengele hit, this seven-year-old girl, the internal leader older than my biological age, became the most ethical. I thought hard about whether there could be a God. Mengele's world was sticky and cloying, dense with meanness. There was no God there and no space that I perceived where God could even creep in. In the other world, there was often something of comfort, like eating chocolate pudding with no drugs in it; like my friend's eyes which I remembered clearly even though he had already been dead for over a year; like the breeze, the slope of the hills, when the sunshine leaned on me; like when I could learn something in school; like cantaloupes and honeydews. These might be what other people call God. When you go deeply into the jaws of evil, you have to go one way or another. When you take something to a total extreme, it turns into something else.

My father drove me to Montauk Point many times. He stood by the driver's side of the car while the attendants took me to Mengele's programming chamber. Sometimes a sign said “Advanced Programming” or “Special Programming”. I was a rat in a maze. My betrayer went home to my other betrayers. I hoped they would all suffer an agonizing death, that my sister would have a plague of pimples, my mother's mink coat would get wet, my father would have his pocket picked.

I felt only the knock and throb of terror. Later when I relaxed a smidgen, a tidal wave of worry flooded me. The betrayal gnawed me to pieces. So many children here were like the children behind barbed wire I had seen in photographs, children from different countries, child faces frozen into those of the aged. Some of the faces I recognized: my cousins, neighbors whose eyes had become hollow. Hopeless faces that knew drudgery and every kind of pain. Children of parents who were not parents. We had all steeled ourselves. We all wanted to die. It was not so easy to die but he did kill some of us. Closed doors covered many child-screams. The walls were ice. Ice formed around my bones.

Mengele wore a white shirt and black pants. Mrs. Twartski was at the side of the room watching and studying and wore a dress and thick medium heeled shoes like my mother's. With a vise squeezing my head, I was naked, strapped in a chair, when he injected my arm and I had to drink something like orange juice. He plugged all my orifices during these mental surgeries. Everything got blurry as I watched Mengele reading from my black book and the document my father had prepared which told him crucial things about my programming, history, and general personality. Mrs. Twartski also coached him and kept handing him slips of paper. “This is an experiment to see if we can separate and store emotions,” Mengele said into a microphone. He pointed out the window to a line of nine tall towers and told me each emotion had to become discrete and go in a specific tower. He considered this experiment one of his best innovations. I knew some of the towers he showed me were an optical illusion, because a bird on them looked painted and because I was used to my handlers using pictures to fool me. A pile of records played on a phonograph.

“Didn't your mother just keep your sister home and not you!” he said. When my feelings came out, he directed them to a tower that he identified by number, Tower Number One, hatred of my mother.

“Your mother doesn't love you because you have dark skin. Hitler would have exterminated you for your dark skin alone. I'm going to make your skin dark.” He had a pail of someone's shit (probably his own) and put on rubber gloves and rubbed it all over me. He put shit through my hair.

“You will never be able to rid yourself of the smell. Now put your shame in Tower Number Three. You're having trouble finding shame. Let me tighten what's around your head to help you.” I squeezed out some shame and hopelessness to the tower though I thought he was the one who should be ashamed, but I'd do anything to get him away from me.

“They use your hands to do the sacrifices, don't they?” Mrs. Twartski nodded her head. Now I knew what was on the slips of paper she handed him. I remembered my friend's mother telling me that it wasn't my fault, that they were just using my hands and I couldn't do anything about it. “That makes it your fault. Why does it have to be your hands that kill? They never use your sister's hands. Put your guilt in Tower Number Four. We will keep it there for you and you won't have to suffer so. Let me tighten your headband to help you.

“Your father tells me that some days you can't get out of bed and you can't eat. You're sad because your friend is dead and you have no other friend. Put your sadness in the depression tower. We will tell you when you have to kill yourself. We decide that, not you.

“You're lonely since your friend died. Maybe he didn't love you anyway.” I knew he did. Mrs. Twartski cleared her throat. “Maybe he didn't like you.” Mrs. Twartski made a noise. She talked to him in secret. I knew some of the things he said were untrue. For example, I knew that they did sometimes use my sister's hands to kill. All the children are used at one time or another. Mrs. Twartski didn't like it when programming held obvious lies which interfered with the potency of the programming. I could see that Mrs. Twartski was much better at this than him. The drugs took away some of my will. I felt sick but then realized it was the emotions from the towers. The towers had a life of their own. They moved inside me. He said to imagine a little rowboat going from a tower to the mainland and back and forth. My body was the mainland.

Mengele got angrier at the little boys than at the girls. He roared, and his white shirt became wet under his arms. He screwed a sharp claw onto his baton and pushed it into a little naked boy's chest. “That's not enough anger,” he roared. “How are you going to kill?” he screamed. The little boy was supposed to be experiencing the feeling of Tower Number Six for assassins. Mengele became more agitated and erratic. Mrs. Twartski touched his arm and said “Maybe that's enough for today.” He screamed “How dare you touch me!” and sobbed.

His towers were Number One, Hatred of Mother; Number Two, Anxiety; Number Three, Hopelessness; Number Four, Depression; Number Five, Oblivion; Number Six, Assassins; Number Seven, Anger; Number Eight, Physical Pain; and Number Nine, Terror. The prostitutes he trained came from Tower Number Eight, and the spies from Tower Number Five.

If we learned the hand signals for the towers and memorized them for all time, then we could eat something. Mengele was careful to time the offer before the beginning of starvation, when we would no longer want to eat.

The attendants took us away at five in the morning. The maids cleaned me up and gave me a bowl of Rice Krispies with regular milk. They bathed us and dressed us in our original clothes—for me it was a dress and oxfords. The attendant walked me out to my father's car at six thirty in the morning. Father wore his usual coat and hat and had placed a pillow and blanket in the back seat. Mother had cut up raw vegetables for me to eat on the way home, but my father stopped in a restaurant and brought me a vanilla malted, chips, and a hamburger. “Don't tell your mother,” he said. She didn't like us to eat that kind of greasy food. In our ordinary life, Mother gave us Walker Gordon non-homogenized milk, baked bread, and didn't allow us to eat junk food. I ate a little of the hamburger and fell asleep in the front seat. I couldn't get rid of the headache or the smell of shit on me.

Why Americans thought they could trust the Nazis is curious. Mengele reneged on part of the deal to show Americans what he knew about mind control and wouldn't let Mrs. Twartski into some of the Montauk Point programming rooms or even her own programming classroom in Pleasant Hills. At least sixty-one of the two hundred fifty-six experiments Mengele performed on me were about suicide. Mrs. Twartski did not know that Mengele would try to make Jewish children kill themselves.

The bridges

“Jews are polluting the universe and you are one of them. Jewish girls are not allowed to have babies to further pollute the world,” Mengele preached at a subsequent time at Montauk Point.

I was tied to a large black chair. Mengele used the oldfashioned hypnosis method of moving a gold watch on a chain back and forth, the same way Mrs. Twartski and my Hungarian grandfather did. A large helmet was on my head. Electrodes were all over my naked child's body. How can I still be alive after so much electricity?

“You remember your friend,” Mengele said. He showed a film of this boy, his face, him riding a bicycle, him walking his bicycle down the bicycle ramp in our building. I cried. I was naked, sleep deprived, and hungry. Before I left that night, Mother had not let me have dinner. My father had slipped me some oatmeal cookies.

“You remember how sad you felt when he died. The entire Jewish people have to be exterminated. They are polluting the universe and you are one of them.

“Now I will show you pictures of the bridges you will have to jump off to improve the world and rid it of the evil you Jewish people bring into it,” Mengele said. “Your father will drive you to the George Washington Bridge, or the Triboro Bridge. You will open the car door, get out of the car, walk to the middle of the bridge, and jump off, plain and simple.”

In another room at Montauk Point, he set up several yards of planks with a railing attached to simulate a shaky bridge. I had to walk on it, crouch down, and slip through the bars. If I couldn't, then I had to fling myself over the railing and jump. Beethoven played while I practiced walking along the fake bridge. Mengele made a clockwise circle four times on the tip of my nose and said “Jump.” He caught me. He made the planks move as if swaying in the high wind, played sounds of water and wind, and opened a window so that I could hear and smell the water. I felt like I was walking blindfolded on a plank into an ocean.

“Reach over and throw yourself down, you slimy, disgusting Jew. Feed yourself to the birds and the fish. You are good for nothing else. Redeem your people. You must all die,” he said. Hunger pains gripped my stomach like claws. It was hard to stay awake. He placed me back in the electric chair.

“Now Heil Hitler! Heil Hitler! Heil Hitler!” he screamed as he leaned on the electricity button, my body now nothing more than a marionette.

“The two worst things you can be are Negro and Jewish. You are both of them. You have no place in the world. You are only fit for killing yourself. Rid the world of your odor, your look. Walk over this bridge and jump, jump to your death. You owe it to the world.” He showed a Nazi propaganda film of rats crawling all over one another. The film described the Jews as rats. He spoke as if he were singing to the music. Beethoven reached a crescendo. Mengele's rage subsided.

A few days after I returned home, my father drove to the George Washington Bridge. My parents were in the front seat and I was in the back seat. My mother said, “Get out of the car. Walk to the middle of the bridge. You know what the doctor wants you to do.”

The contract with Germany said there was an extra $10,000 for the parents of any child who killed itself. I know why this is happening to me, I thought. It's because I'm ugly. If I were pretty, I would be home safe and sound with my sister, coloring in my coloring book. I am dispensable. To be dispensable is not to be human.

I walked along the pedestrian part of one of the bridges, suspended in space. It was night, black. The wind swept around me like a twirling skirt. I had heard Mengele tell my parents, “No identifying information. No name tags in her underwear. Some fisherman somewhere will find the body. I want no way to identify who she is or where she comes from. Let her wear her heaviest shoes. They weigh the body down.” I don't think my parents told Wiezenslowski.

Cars drove by. They didn't see me. I approached the middle. I sat down in the right spot. I brought my knees to my chest. If I jumped into the water, no one would know who I was or match me with my parents. I was shaking and sobbing when another me took hold. I would not do what they wanted me to do. I got up and walked carefully along the railing.

When the wind grew strong, I put both hands on the outside handrail and held tight but I kept walking, one foot, then the other foot, always feet touching each other. I stepped over the rods with my left foot, leaving space for my right foot, and resumed walking. My skirt flew up. I wondered what my best friend who had died would say if he saw me now. I could almost hear him say that he was with me. I could feel his long arms around me balancing me. No, I wouldn't think of him now because I couldn't afford to cry. Focus was everything. I belonged to the universe now, not to people. The moon and stars were out. I pretended they were my friends. My heart was drumming into the world. My heart was making a dent into the night sky. Did the stars feel the knock? My bridge was swaying. Hold on tight. Don't let them win. I was on the tip of the universe. No one knew where I was except my enemies. I was the mist, the thinnest smoke. I crept along like a turtle, definitely not a hare. Oh, how I wished I had a turtle's shell to protect me from the wind, and parents, and scientists. I would not be blown away like the light branches of a tree or the red balloon. I bent my knees to make my body more like a tree trunk. I took one step after another in my heavy brown corrective oxfords. One foot touching the other. I saw boats going by. They didn't see me. If I jumped into a boat, I would be killed. If I jumped into the water, I'd be killed. I wished the moon would shine on me so that people could see me. I wished I could fly. The pedestrian walk was going up and down like the waves at Jones Beach. I wished I were a clam living in a shell.

I felt Mengele, this Dr. Faustus, on the bridge. I felt him peel my hands off the railing, hurl my body over it and my body spin and spin down fast through the frigid air. Twisting, chopping. His face roared at me like the lion in the MGM movies. He said my neck would snap during the fall and I would be dead before I hit the water. I felt his insistence that I release my hands and bless the world. I heard his incessant music.

A feeling of despair pulsed out of me. I wanted to leave my family and I was afraid that if I left something terrible would happen to them. I felt trapped in conflict so overwhelming that I became hopeless. This was a moment when I needed someone to intervene and no one did. It was September 15, 1947.

The wind roared, the moonlight pierced. I felt a silvery terror but also a strength from outside me—gathered from the waves or the stars—a strength that was not me but infused me. And with my corrective brown oxfords, I kept my progression towards the other end of the undulating bridge. Something from the moonlight went into the pores of my skin. My spine straightened. My heart anchored itself in my body. The wind helped me along like a dog that pulls on the leash. I believed I was going to make it.

I held my stomach close to the railing so that no space was between it and my body. I arched back slightly. The important thing was not to look down. Look outward. Pretend the vast darkness is a carpet. I was secure on my velvet carpet. Do not feel. When I felt, I spun with dizziness. Pretend the bridge is my horse, the waters my chariot, the sky my kingdom, the stars my friends, the moon my fairy godmother. Here on the bridge I had a family. There were moments when it was fun. I never relaxed into the pull of it—I was always fighting not to be overtaken—but sometimes I felt myself in the middle of a momentum. I was taken off the earth and given an experience of nonhuman life. I could have been a seagull or a hawk.

I cemented my fingers closed. I would not let Mengele, Germany, my community, or my parents win. I was alone in the world but I would fight back. I felt my bones, muscle, ribs disintegrate. It was as if I had a hole in my body that the chill air passed through. I neared the end of the bridge. The anger started when I was out of danger. I felt it mostly in my face. I hoped Mengele and Mrs. Twartski would be chopped into pieces. I hoped my parents would die a gruesome death.

My parents' Packard drove slowly across the bridge. They saw me. The car waited at the other end of the bridge. I got in the back seat. I couldn't tell whether my mother was happy or sad but she said, “I'll be punished for this,” and sighed heavily. By Mengele or God? I thought. My father said, “She's a cat.” I didn't know what he meant until years later.

When I got in the back seat of my parents' car, I realized how tired my legs were. The muscles in my thighs crumbled. I lay down in the back seat, my body shaking like the milk in the malted machine in the candy store at the corner of 68th Road and Paradise Boulevard. I shook until I plunged into sleep.

Each time I walked the bridges, my father carried me into the apartment. I woke when he bumped my head on the outside door, entrance, and our front door. If he was careful, then my mother's voice would wake me: “Take her shoes off before you put her on the bed.” My father dropped me on the bed anyway and gave my mother a snide look. She ran over and pulled my shoes off. “I don't want the sheets dirty,” she said, her voice strident, eyes bulging, the veins on her neck like a dulcimer's tight strings.

My mother would warm up a can of Campbell's Vegetarian Vegetable soup and I would eat all the portions. If I were still chilled, she would warm up Hershey's cocoa for me. I would drink it scalding and eat all the Graham crackers and all the Mallomars I wanted. One day, I woke up early and ate a whole bar of Velveeta cheese and vomited.

In the morning, the parts of me that walked the bridge receded and the rest of me remembered and knew nothing. I didn't know why I was so tired and still felt chilled. My mother's awareness of the bridge walk also vanished in the morning. She thought I was getting a cold, squeezed oranges for me, cooked chicken soup, and kept me home. The brain has infinite divisions and each section can hold a whole life that the other parts haven't a clue about.

In the hidden programming room in my apartment building, Mengele performed other experiments to make Jewish children kill themselves. He used electroshock to teach me how to slit my wrists. The electroshock obliterated the hunger pains.

“It's the only thing to do when no one loves you. You hold out your left arm and with the razor blade that will wait for you in the lower shelf of the medicine cabinet, you slit like this: a long line up like the tree trunk, short lines across the wrists. Anyone can do it. Even a girl like you. It's the obligation of the Jewish people to exterminate themselves,” Mengele said. “Let's see you practice with a lipstick. When you draw the tree, the electric shocks will stop. You don't have to draw the tree. You can stay shocked like this. Now let's pretend you're dead,” he said putting a cloth soaked in something over my face.

Mengele's words formed a caul that encased me most of my life. But when I peeled the scab off these memories, he fell away, word by word, electroshock by electroshock, hypnosis by hypnosis, rape by rape.

After Montauk Point, I walked down the blocks around my home. The hills sloped gently, the air was clean, and yellow and pink flowers bloomed all around the backyards of the buildings. Adults smiled. Women pushed carriages and strollers. Men rushed to and from the subways carrying briefcases and folded newspapers. Girls walked home from school in herds. Boys shouted and climbed trees even in their good schoolclothes. Everything seemed normal. This was ordinary life. But I felt that in less than a second, as fast as a hunger pain or the space before the next breath, the world could change and all these pleasant faces could turn into roaring monster heads that would devour me. While I walked like this, I remembered nothing of all the procedures done on my mind, and nothing of the endless torture, and the sharp betrayals. Emotions leaked out into normal life, but not the narrative. The world appeared as a spinning disk that I couldn't quite slow down or step onto.

In July 2013, I drove over the George Washington Bridge on my way to Connecticut. As I approached the bridge, I felt a terror inside and discovered it was from the children who had walked this bridge. My strong inside adults surrounded these children and held them close as if they were the jelly inside a doughnut. The traffic that morning was fierce, almost standstill. A few peppy pedestrians walked along the outside path and seemed to enjoy the air and sunshine. As I drove at about five miles per hour, I noticed the slats under the outside banister were about one and a half inches apart. I had remembered about five inch spaces. I wondered how I had been able to take these steps in the early morning darkness and wind, so small and alone.

In 1962, the movie The Manchurian Candidate told some of the story of government mind control in a very mild form. The breaking of the parent–child bond, allowing mothers to have one child so that the mothers can be controlled; government creation of assassins who kill on command and remember nothing; the victim's desire to kill the perpetrator and spare the innocent target; idealization of the villain; mind-control procedures such as drugged states, hypnosis, post-hypnotic visual cues; and the destruction and consumption of a person's mind, will, behavior, and soul are all in this popular film.

One fallacy of the movie is that it depicts adults brainwashed to be assassins without the early splitting of their brains. Children's minds have to be separated into pieces and fragments very young, usually in infancy, sometimes in the womb. People who managed to escape programmers before they turned seven, eight, or nine cannot be mind controlled to do criminal acts and not remember.

Waterfall

At times, both sides of the family joined to administer initiations. This primitive initiation rite occurred eleven times, when I was between the ages of two and thirteen, always in August at three a.m., in the tiered waterfall. Four nine-storey red brick apartment buildings surrounded the falls like giant outstretched wings. On the left was where I lived with my parents and sister, on the right was where my handler, Mrs. Twartski, lived. The time I remember most clearly was when I was six years old. My paternal grandfather stood on the balcony off the lobby of two of the main buildings. In his black robe, he lifted his hammer, struck each child over the head, carried each concussed child down the steps, and threw us all in the water. My father, also in a black robe, lifted us up and placed us on the shore, near the berry bushes. Then each child's parents, in black robes, ran carrying their offspring to the base of the waterfall and laid them on the ground, like dead fish. We all lay there drenched with fear and concussions. They separated one child, and the executioner held a knife to that child's throat. The programmer said, “If anyone cries, this child will be killed.”

Portable rods held up an outside curtained area at the bottom of the tiered waterfall. Children of different ages sat there where my other grandfather, Grandpa Max, officiated. He had hung a boy named Donnie from the branch of a tree. Donnie was suffering terribly. All the children cried. In a second, my grandfather slit the boy's throat. Grandpa came to me raging with the bloodstained knife. I was now ten different people. He put the knife on my throat and said “It's your fault the boy died. It's because you cried.” Some parts of me stayed in my numb body, and a few flew in my mind to Donnie, who was rising in the air. The bushes were far below our feet and the people with black robes were like dots on the grass. We went up as I pressed my stomach into his spirit-body. Donnie said, “It's not your fault. Go back. They would have killed me anyway.” And then he was out of reach. He didn't know my name. He was older and lived on Cobblestone Boulevard. Parts of me still wanted to follow him. Even though Donnie had said it wasn't my fault, I decided not to cry and the other parts of me toughened and steeled themselves.

The programmers installed a reservoir and waterfall inside me, where concussed children sit and feel guilty, afraid to cry or leave their families. The waterfall initiations also became the model for inside rivers that would dominate my internal structure.

Learning and unlearning, 1948

When I started first grade, my world opened. I was with all sorts of other children, had an opportunity to learn something and was aware that I was walking the same path that I had watched my dead friend walk for one year. Feeling that I was in his footsteps made me happy. Only television would open the world as much as school. I was one of the youngest in my class because my birthday was one day before the cutoff. My sister walked me to school on the first day. Getting me and my sister ready for school was all my mother could manage so she stayed home. Our front door would close and she would go back to bed. She got up shortly before we returned. But she always made us lunch, braided my straight hair, and dressed us well, and she too was interested in learning.

It was September but it was still August warm. My sister held my hand as we walked up the hill, across the street and down the block. She left me at the entrance for first graders and my heart pounded through my pink and white ruffles. The boys who were monitors lined us up and we had to be quiet. No one dared talk. My new class filed up the metal steps. We held ourselves narrow. Each floor had a boy monitor.

“Did you catch any fish?” the second floor boy shouted.

“None yet,” the first floor boy screamed back. I continued up the steps to the third floor thinking of myself as a fish swimming in the rough Atlantic about to be swallowed by a hungry whale that was trapped near the shore. The momentum of the crowds pushed me on even though my legs had frozen in place. My teacher looked like a regular fat old woman. I liked the inkwell in my desk. I practiced not listening, because I wasn't allowed to learn. One day, the teacher brought in a mix master machine and made butter, which fascinated me. Another day, I was painting at the easel, peed, and told the teacher I had spilled the jar of water. No one hit or yelled at me. In arts and crafts, I made my mother a brooch out of an oval shape, glue, and little pieces of pink glass. Even more than the delight of pleasing her was that of creating something with my fingers. I fell in love with arts and crafts, as well as letters and numbers.

Using a whip, Mrs. Twartski taught me how to be learning disabled in the special classroom underneath her apartment building. I had learning disabilities put in my brain before first grade was over. For example, I had to reverse numbers and letters, not concentrate, give wrong answers, and especially not create anything. First I had to know the right answer, then figure out a wrong answer. My intelligence could only show in the cult life my family led. But still, I got away from home for hours each day.

Various groups contribute to the industry of creating slaves by usurping their victims' brains. Some groups are governmental and power hungry; money or spiritual dominance motivates others. They all use an imaginary geometric structure for mind control, and the trained parts of the mind are located within this structure. Mine was shaped like a layered pyramid that looked a bit like a bridal cake. The section on the bottom was the Reverse Kabbalah group; on top of that the Luciferian group; then the Illuminati, composed of people whose bloodlines made them rulers with aspirations for world dominance; then the Mafia with their criminal deeds; and lastly our government, or MKUltra, with their political interests. The MKUltra Project did secret experiments on people's minds and behaviors. A globe where the soldiers trained in security lived on top of my internal structure. Behind this main structure were smaller inverted pyramids that held different kinds of programming and experiences of torture. Mengele, with his money and prestige, bribed the committee to embellish my structure. The mind controllers put the Mengele child parts of me within the roots of the Kabbalah tree, underneath the structure, driving it, breathing into it. With its spider web structure, it became an avenue of evil.

Child labor

Starting in 1947, my parents and I drove through the outskirts of the Bronx, New York, into sections that housed dilapidated factories and warehouses. A few dingy stores that closed early were on isolated blocks. My parents dropped me off at the half-hidden side entrance of a dirty, moldy, flat building. Brothel 8 had eight floors and was the eighth brothel of the network of two hundred fifty-one that existed in the U.S. and Canada at that time. Attendants recorded the number of the drop off. Sometimes I was number fifty-five or fifty-seven or sixty-eight or even seventy-three. That meant there were that many other children who arrived before me. They put my clothes in a locker with the same assigned number. The matrons said, “The parents get uppity if all the clothes aren't returned, though with all the money they get, they shouldn't mind.” They gave me a pastel shift to wear, and bedroom slippers. The women watching the girls also wore bedroom slippers and shifts but theirs were floral. They weren't allowed to use any cosmetics or put anything in their hair because the owners didn't want anything detracting from the children. The women especially grieved for their toenail polish. The men who visited the brothels mostly liked children so I didn't know what the managers were worried about. The lines for the boys were the longest. I thought maybe it was because they had more to their bodies on the outside than girls our age, though some girls already had breasts. The boys came from all over the world.

One of the younger children inside of me is talking:

> I was one of the girls standing on the stage at the Brothel 8 lower level theater—standing on a stage in a littered room in front of a jeering audience of men hooting, throwing objects, blowing on party pipes; men—smelly men with unshaved whiskers, beer bellies, and cocaine noses. The other girls who were just like me pushed me forward to represent them. The other girls wanted to hide behind me—they were ashamed, too ashamed to come forward themselves but they want to be known as well. (The girls she refers to are all inside me, all part of me and my experiences there.)

We were naked. Our skin was darker than many of the girls there. The men preferred the lighter skin, especially the dark-skinned men. Some were throwing coins at us, others beer cans or just pieces of damp paper. Some were jerking off as they watched the line of us standing naked on stage.

We were trying to shrink. We felt our body crumbling. Our soul was twisting out of our skin. But there was nowhere to fly. We were trapped in this stifling, perspiring, tiny room. A guard was at each side of the wings. The men who finally got me were angry and rough. They threw me against the wall, which wasn't allowed. One time I was in a leg cast and they paid my father extra money because I was hurt more than the contract said I could be. They also rubbed me against their penises. Some girls were raped all the way. The blond, fair girls were raped the most. One of the older girls bled to death.

We saw them roll people out on a stretcher. When someone was killed, they put a purple lily or tulip on the covered corpse. It was a warning, but these girls didn't do anything wrong.

Once I had pubic hair, I would not have to be on the bidding stage, but then life would get worse because they could impregnate me.

“Let's see your ass.”

“Hey, gawky, turn around,” the men screamed at the scared girls.

Shame like boiling syrup covered our bodies. Shame became a barricade between us and the men. Shame became a tight home we lived in and did not exit. Its windows caved in on our eyes, its door pushed into our vaginas.

My parents didn't really need this money. My father was a bad lawyer but he brought in enough to pay the rent and clothe us. My mother's father was a millionaire and could always lend him money in an emergency. He gambled the money away anyway.

Shame can burn, like a stove left on overnight. Shame can burn through the layers of skin. I wanted to stay hidden, shielded, tucked in a safe person's body. I didn't ever want to be looked at or touched again—ever.

My heart folded into itself. My heart slipped down my vertebrae bone by bone. My blood could not hold my body up.

“Turn that ass around.”

Grownups who use children and only care about themselves are bad people. When children were killed or just died, grownups didn't care. There were always more children they could make money off.

The world seemed all dirt and filth like the littered floor and stage. I didn't like the overhead lights shimmering on my skin. I didn't want light to touch my skin. No, this was not a good world for children. And all these mean adults were once children.

It would be easy to say that money motivated this kind of abuse but that's not the whole story. The parents who sold their children must have been programmed, which means that one part of their minds had been separated through torture and did what they had been instructed to do. These parents were programmed against their will until they didn't know consciously what they were doing. They hadn't an idea that they were acting against any instinct for decency, or perhaps they thought their children would be killed if they didn't cooperate. The parents who dropped their boys and girls off at brothels and warehouses—most of these parents would not have done so if they were living in awareness of the other parts of their minds. The customers who frequented these brothels were not programmed. They were simply criminals and perverts. When I returned home, I remembered nothing of being a child sexual slave.

The school yard

Back in my ordinary life, it was a sticky, cloying August in 1949 Queens, New York. My big sister was in charge of me. I was six, she was eleven. She had begun menstruating and had breasts that pushed out from under blouses and sweaters and said “Look at me, I'm swelling.” I had no breasts, just nipples that squeezed together when they were cold or wet. I was glad I didn't have blooming breasts because that meant I wouldn't be pregnant. My sister was glad she had blooming breasts because they brought her attention.

It was hot in our family's small apartment. The walls were sweating and curving from the heat. My sister said we would walk to the playground of Public School Number Three—that was up the hill to 108th Street, down the block to 67th Road, across the street, down another block and there was the schoolyard on the left. My sister had soft black hair in a loose pageboy.

We both had dark eyes. Hers always looked in the mirror. Mine looked around to spot dangerous people.

She said we would go to the schoolyard and stand under the fountain. I don't remember where my mother was, probably shopping or going to a doctor's. My father was at work losing money.

My sister put on a green one-piece bathing suit. She looked in the dresser mirror this way then that way. She looked this way and that way again.

“Just wear your bottom part,” she said.

“You mean go out naked?” I asked.

“You're not naked. You're so young, you don't have to wear a top. You don't have breasts yet.”

“But people will notice,” I said.

I wore my yellow bathing suit bottom. She took my hand and walked ahead. Her arm was stretched backwards, mine forward. She walked eagerly, rushing. She seemed to be rushing to meet someone. I looked from side to side trying to see if anyone was looking at me. When she got to the schoolyard, she ran to the back where the sprinklers sprouted water and where a group of girls congregated. They laughed and jumped up and down looking at one another's bathing suits. Then they pointed to me. I don't know what they were saying. Other children were playing. Their happy shouts formed clouds above the cold blue water.

“I caught a fish and the fish is naked,” another boy laughed.

They circled around me. My sister was on the other side of the fountain standing this way and that way for all to see.

I cried and covered my chest with my crossed-over arms.

“Cry baby.”

“Go suck your thumb.”

“Wa, wa, baby wants to go home.”

I wasn't sure of the way home. I wasn't allowed to cross the street.

One of the girls near my sister yelled at the boys, then yelled at my sister, “Don't you care about her?”

My sister finally came back and took my hand and we walked home while I cried and shivered.

“I'm not responsible for what boys do,” she said. “Don't tell Mommy.”

“I hate you,” I said.

She pulled up her bathing suit and wiggled around in it. One of her breasts moved around.

The Hansel leading me by the hand pretending to be a friend and big sister—this Hansel is an enemy. “I must be careful of people leading me by the hand,” I thought.

Shame burned within me. It started from the inside, forced its way through my ribs, and crawled up my skin, lodging on my cheeks. The boys had seen my chest. I was branded.

Alison thought my sister may have just returned from being used in a brothel, where men had jeered at her, and that she was acting that experience out on me.

Mengele's return, 1951

Mengele wore an overcoat and entered our living room in his fast, demanding way but sideways, hip and shoulder first, not straight on; the way people enter a sick room when the invalid is contagious. He demanded Marlene, who hid in our bedroom. My father told her to come out. Mother had dressed her shabbily on purpose in play clothes and old shoes. Her idealized portrait had been removed. My mother again threw herself in front of Marlene, and this time thrust out a large kitchen knife that she held behind her back.

“You can't have her,” she screamed.

Mengele twisted away as his fingers squeezed my left shoulder and he dragged me. I vomited.

“Jewish vomit,” Mengele said.

“I'll clean her up,” my father said.

“We'll take care of it,” Mengele said. He grabbed my new Tiny Tears doll dressed in a pink and white checked pinafore that I had got for my birthday. I had seen my mother put Baby Jane on the loveseat in the foyer that morning and hadn't understood why. Mengele shoved me into the limousine, handed me Baby Jane and wiped the vomit off with a towel. I felt no better than the yellow vomit all over the front of my pink dress. I pressed Baby Jane to my body. I was in the second grade. We drove for a long while in the night.

Inside the Programming Center, two black programming chairs sat side by side. My cousin, DeeDee Goldman, was already buckled in her chair. DeeDee was one year younger than me with a November 11th birthday. She clutched her teddy bear. “If you resist, we will squash Baby's legs with this hammer,” Mengele said.

To DeeDee he said, “If you resist, we will pull off Teddy's legs.”

He showed us alternating photographs of our mothers under strobe lighting. Aunt Gertrude looked angry. My mother looked beautiful and in love with herself.

“Your mothers hate you. They sold you to me.” My father got my mother to sell me. “They love your sisters, not you.” Uncle Paul may love DeeDee. “It's best for you to eliminate your mothers. Your father will wake you up and show you the jack of clubs. At three in the morning, you will go into the kitchen and get the sharpest butcher knife. It will be on the kitchen table where you usually sit for meals. You will sleepwalk to your mother's bed and stab her in the heart. Just like in the rituals. You will leave the knife by her body, return to your own bed and sleep. You will do this Thursday night,” Merkel said. Mengele used the names Dr. Black, Dr. Schwartz, Merkel, or Menkel when he was programming us to kill, and Dr. Faustus when he wanted us to kill ourselves.

DeeDee loved her family and may never have even picked up the knife. On Thursday, I made it all the way to my mother's bed. I looked down on Mother's head. She had set her hair in curls with bobby pins holding them in place. Some curls took one bobby pin on a diagonal, others crossed like a pair of swords. Mother, a light sleeper, turned, woke and asked with a groggy expression on her confused face, “What's going on?” She probably had just fallen asleep an hour or two before. Her little pills took a while to work. I dropped the knife and raced back to my bed. It was as if I galloped breathless over clouds. My father followed me out; I heard him put the knife back in the kitchen drawer.

That weekend at Montauk Point, Merkel said, “I'm disappointed in both you girls. You did not complete your task. You will have to be punished.” We received double the electricity and harsher drugs. I couldn't think.

“Never disobey Dr. Black. Whatever he says, you do. Dr. Black is your master. You are his concubines. All little girls have to kill their mothers.

Mothers are bad people. If your mothers loved you, they wouldn't have sold you to me.” Enthusiastic Bach music played in the background. Sometimes he played along with his violin, especially when DeeDee and I screamed. Our screams became part of his symphony.

One day, the female doctor, Dr. Lillian Kraus, administered the shocks and in her lust to hurt, she upped it too much for DeeDee. A harrowing scream ripped out of DeeDee; then she faded. Mengele pulled off her helmet, did artificial respiration and put an oxygen mask on her. He yelled at the woman, “We have to pay $50,000 if you kill one of these.” Our programming ended for that day. I felt glad that hadn't happened to me but also guilty. If I had somehow taken more of the electricity, it might not have happened to DeeDee. I pictured twins where one is born larger and healthier than the other. One took too much and the other not enough. After that day, DeeDee couldn't remember anything, not even where the bathroom was. Merkel dismissed the female doctor. “She's too dangerous,” people at the Programming Center said. Our screams. I can still hear our screams. Her scream.

Mengele had access to my foundational homicidal and suicidal programming. Earlier, he had worked up some homicidal programming while in Mrs. Twartski's schoolroom in Pleasant Hills. Mrs. Twartski was not permitted in while Mengele showed us children a cage filled with parakeets, fluttering green and blue birds with busy beaks. Mengele wore his preferred devil suit. As he wielded his whip, we had to jump. If his whip hit us, he took us to the altar where a little bird was pinned down but still fighting for its freedom, its wings thumping. There was a difference between killing a human who was already dead or drugged into a lifeless state and killing a fighting bird. Mengele—he wanted to be called Menkel for this display—held our hands over the knife and stabbed the little bird. “If you tell your parents or anyone at all, all the birds will die and it will be your fault. All the birds will die.” He reinforced the don't-tell program with his gold watch, which we had to follow with our eyes. “Never tell what we have together here,” Menkel said.

We had to choose the weakest child in our group and kill that boy or girl. If we didn't, they would; but they would do it slowly, first skinning the child alive, then in slow motion pushing a knife into the solar plexus but so slowly—it was more than death, it was slow-torture-murder. We saw that happen to a girl named Nancy and a boy named Richard. After that, we stabbed as fast as possible to spare them. Mengele's hands always covered ours. Most of the children wanted to be chosen to die but a few of them wanted to live. The meanest children wanted to live. Our group had thirteen children, six girls and seven boys. If a child was killed, the parents got more money. A child who didn't learn the programming fast enough would be chosen.

Mengele was interested in the mixture of pain and pleasure, always raping while he performed his experiments. He clamped a vise around my head to see whether the brain would squeeze out while he sexually abused me. He measured the pain and sexual response with a little clicking machine like a metronome. He loved machines, but I suspect many of them were just for show. The bones in my neck popped.

In 2012, I had an ultrasound. When the technician put goo on me, and wheeled the table, my jaw clenched so hard it could have broken. She moved the wand over my neck testing the blood flow in my carotid artery. Then my memory transported me to Montauk Point with Mengele and Mrs. Twartski. Mengele shone a red light on my young, closed eyelids.

“This is how you do it, Mrs. Twartski. You slowly move the little red light back and forth tracing the orb of the moon. Start with the right eye on the top and work gradually down to the bottom. Then do the left eye in the same manner, tracing its contours, slowly, excruciatingly slowly. Children will be eternally confused.” Before Mengele began, he called out two of the original infants whom Mrs. Twartski had created in me, and gave this confusion-training to them.

I was shocked to see my mother on a stretcher at the Programming Center. I thought Mengele only worked on children. I felt bad for her lying there immobile as if she were in a coffin. I wondered how she would be changed. Her gray hazel eyes stared wide, unfocused. She had a white turban wrapped around her head. Underneath the turban, her scalp was shaved down the middle. My father stood in the hall. He looked guilty for a while but he shook it off quickly. He once said he had a moment of truth around three every morning, but it was gone by the time he woke up in the morning. He didn't say what he meant by “a moment of truth” but I supposed he was talking about having a conscience.

Hours later, Mengele came out and said about Mother, “She was an easy subject. Very little fight in her.” After that, Mengele used Marlene, and Mother spent hours in bed too drugged to move. She never woke before noon. I noticed that she had no reaction when he took me. I saw my sister at the Programming Center often, though we were not always there at the same time. Mengele brought Marlene home one time with bandages on her breasts. He or his assistant had given her nipples too much electricity. They no longer had feeling. Mengele must have gone after her sexually more than usual. My mother turned sharply to me and spit out, “Why did this have to happen to her? Why not to you?” I knew she was thinking that but was surprised she would say it. DeeDee came home without her intelligence, my other cousin Rhonda with epilepsy, my sister with dead nipples, and me not able to trust anyone in the world. Rhonda's parents said Rhonda had given herself epilepsy by banging her head against the wall. I believed their explanation for decades until I remembered Mengele's experiments on us. Rhonda probably still believes it.

The early morning after Marlene returned, Mother came into our bedroom, ripped off my covers, tore open my pajama top and made four slashes on my nipples with a double edged razor blade. The sting kept me in my body. Perhaps that is why I remembered this assault before I remembered the mind control and Mengele. I don't know whether my mother's violence and favoritism were from programming or whether the environment and abuse drove her crazy. Had my mother been born into another family, she might have had a little life in the real world like other people.

My father drove me to the hospital. The doctor looked at my nipples under a magnifying glass similar to the one Mother's jeweler on 47th Street used. I told the doctor everything because I wanted the world to know what happened. He said, “Parents can do whatever they want with their children.” It was 1951. I had never seen this doctor at rituals.

Mengele spent days programming me to be a spy, thief, and prostitute at Montauk Point. He began these procedures with injections going into the side of my nose outside the right nostril, which is now discolored.

“We are giving her the civilian treatment. In the camps, we didn't have to worry about this. We could put needles in them absolutely anywhere,” Mengele said to Mrs. Twartski, who assisted him for this round of programming. “We have multitudes of frauleins like her entertaining our boys in the cafés in my country. They have no idea what they are doing and do it so well. I tell you, Mrs. Twartski, the less they know what they're doing, the better they do it. Let that be a lesson to you.”

In the present, as I retrieved these memories, my sleep fell into the pattern of sleeping for several hours, then waking in terror. I tried to store the terror in containers and breathe it out. I would fall asleep again and wake later in a daze.

“Now, Mrs. Twartski, I will show you how to construct a government puppet. For males, we build on their capacity for violence. For females, we build from their capacity for sexuality and seduction. The formula is sterling and simple. We divide these programs into age categories: sixteen to twenty-two, twenty-two to twenty-six, twenty-six to thirty-one, thirty-one to thirty-seven, thirty-seven to forty-four (especially if the girl looks young). Each girl will go once every seven years on these particular kinds of adventure. After that, we close the program down. No age group knows about another. No function within a category knows about another. Ingenious, isn't it?” Mengele said.

“Brilliant,” Mrs. Twartski said.

“We will make her a sexual robot. She has a good body and we will use it. We use the obedience drug. We show her the card. We tell her to sit in the chair. We tell her to put her own helmet on. We strap her in.”

To me, he said, “You are now being made a criminal. Do you agree?”

“Keep shooting her, Mrs. Twartski.”

“That's all for today. We want to make her agree, not kill her,” Mengele said. This went on for consecutive days until I started to die. They gave me no food or water and didn't permit me to sleep. On the fifth day, some part of me nodded and I agreed.

“When you are beckoned, you come out. The maitre d' will point to where you go. The next person inside sits on the designated man's lap. The next person dances on his lap. Next person gets two pills from your purse. The next person leans her breasts into the designated man's face, covering his eyes. Next person drops both pills in his drink. Next person slips out documents from his pocket in his jacket. Next person slips in replacement document. The man should have already passed out by now. Next person slides away from the man. Next person exits room. Exiting, next person hands maitre d' in doorway papers taken from passed out man.[1] The assistant will help girl take off her costume. She will return to her home and remember nothing. No person will feel anything—no fear, pleasure, shame, victory—nothing. She will perform her sequence of tasks like a puppet with no emotion, an emotionless puppet. A puppet of the state. Herr Hitler wanted a country filled with these people. Controllable people doing the right thing for the welfare of the government."

Mengele was in a frenzy of ecstasy. All the people he referred to were internal parts of me that he and my grandfather had put in. He instructed me on which fingers to use to retrieve the pills from my purse. "If you drop one of the pills, you discreetly pick it up. If you can't find it, you motion with your left arm to the maitre d' who will be watching, and he will deliver one to you."

When I look at the faces of some of the assassins of political leaders, I think that they are programmed because of their wide-eyed stare that seems to go back into their own brains, and the hyper-determined look of a person acting on a program. When they say they don't remember what they did, I believe them. The part who assassinated recedes, and the other parts of the person's brain don't know anything about the crime.

Elise brings down Mengele

Mengele used Mrs. Twartski's musty schoolroom. Sometimes he permitted her to observe his practices but often he didn't. This day, he permitted her to be present along with almost every child in the immediate neighborhood. He sat us in orderly rows with the youngest in front and the older children behind. Elise was one of the youngest, sitting third from the left in the front row. She had red hair and an open face, and wore smocked dresses that her mother probably bought in a fancy store. Elise was small and looked younger than her four- and a-half years.

Mengele, naked from the waist down, stood in front of us on a little raised wooden platform. He preferred being naked on the bottom during his teaching times, but wore a tuxedo with tails on top or a devil outfit. Sometimes he wore plain black slacks without a single crease in them anywhere. My grandfather Max, also obsessively neat, admired his ironing. Mengele used hand signals to make us take our seats and be quiet. We were all so afraid, we didn't want to make noise anyway. He could even make us all go to sleep by moving his right arm down from the elbow. Mengele instructed Mrs. Twartski on his methodology, right in front of us:

> Step one, destroy their sense of self. This is foundational, Mrs. Twartski. It's easier to take it away from boys, but we can get it away from everyone.

We didn't know what he meant by a “sense of self”.

“Dr. Black, we have already done that by dividing them at birth,” Mrs. Twartski replied. We didn't know we had been divided at birth. She had done that by torturing us as infants until we split away from our body.

“You will see,” Mengele said tossing his head. “We can take it further.”

“Well, I'm certainly not going to stand in front of them naked,” Mrs. Twartski said. She wore her blue and white flowered dress with buttons down the front. Shocked that the great doctor preferred to be naked, I overheard her tell grown-ups that he disrespected her and was a pervert.

“Children,” he said, turning his full attention to us and pushing Mrs. Twartski aside, “take your assigned seat.” We were already in our assigned seats. Mengele spread the tails of his tuxedo out like a peacock spreads its feathers. He liked performing for Mrs. Twartski and also disdaining her. She sat on a wooden school chair on the side of the platform. The air seemed filled with evil spirits climbing over the walls.

“Your parents don't love you. They pretend to but they don't. Even when they do nice things for you, they think bad things about you,” Mengele said to us all. Many of the children started crying, including Elise. I didn't cry because I already knew my parents didn't love me even though they loved Marlene. Marlene cried. She didn't think our father loved her.

Mengele kept his eyes fixed on us as he held out his arm to Mrs. Twartski. We all watched his hand and arm movements because he often controlled us with them. His slightest gesture, his fingers barely moving sent us commands. Mrs. Twartski handed Mengele a bowl with goldfish swimming in it. The goldfish looked young and alive. Mengele scooped out a goldfish that swooshed its body. He twisted off its head and plopped it back in the bowl. The children, especially the girls, let out a breathless sound that had many R's. We saw its pieces sink to the bottom. He scooped out another fish.

“That's what will happen to anyone you tell,” he said to us. His face became all lips. His nose disappeared.

I vowed silently to myself that I would never tell anyone and I also vowed that I would tell. I would have liked to tell Mr. Jacobs, the nice man who lived across the waterfall, who prayed with his family and wore a shawl, but then he would be killed too.

“Some of you still want to tell. Some of you are natural betrayers,” he said as he stepped off Mrs. Twartski's platform, walked to the third row shoving two children out of the way with his right shoe and grabbed a tiny hunched over girl wearing a clean ironed dress and whose hair was in braids. I curled further into a ball as he lifted me, my legs flapping in the air like a fish's tail when pulled out of water.

“Here's a girl who wants to tell. What should we do to it? Push her head under water and let her drown in the fishbowl?” I thought he would hang me upside down. I knew my head wouldn't fit in the fishbowl. I glimpsed Mrs. Twartski's upside-down face. She smiled. I could see she hated me. “Or should we twist her apart as if she was a slithering snake, or should we squeeze her?”

Mrs. Twartski mouthed to the children “squeeze.” Mengele liked to squeeze children the way Grandpa Max liked to pinch them. During each programming session, he took a child at random and squeezed that child until he or she almost died. The child would cough and gag for a long time. He squeezed me like a mother bear squeezes her prey. My legs dangled and the air went out of my body. He scooped out the live goldfish, put it in my hand and said, “Squeeze it until it dies.” It felt slippery, slimy and helpless, like me. I couldn't squeeze. I fainted. He shook me, put his hand over mine and made me pick up the goldfish flailing on the cement floor and squeeze it to death.

“This is what will happen to anyone who talks, especially the children who want to talk and to anyone they tell.” I cried because I had saved myself and not the goldfish. The goldfish was my friend. Mrs. Twartski nodded approvingly.

“Now take communion and scram,” Mengele said to all the children. Communion meant licking his penis. We had to put our tongue on the slit where the semen comes out. The boys also had to stroke it. He told them it was a privilege because they were male. Mrs. Twartski lined us up and then let us out one by one. When I got outside, I vomited.

Boys and girls all around vomited, then ran in different directions. Some went down to the building on Cobblestone Avenue, cut across the courtyard with the waterfall and exited on 67th Road. Some ran up the steps, through the balcony and into the lobby at 108th Street. Many ran out the side entrance, through the swinging gates to 68th Road. They ran past the windows of Mrs. Twartski's first floor apartment and my family's garden apartment on the other side. The parents of the younger children waited for them. Elise's mother waited. Children emerged without a self and the parents didn't seem to notice. The children took their parents' hands as if nothing had happened. Kindergarten didn't exist yet, but the parents took the children's hands as if they had just had a good morning playing and having juice and crackers in preschool.

I overheard my parents' conversations and learned that when Elise turned five, her mother had given her a doll for her birthday. Elise told her mother she couldn't have a baby because she was Jewish. Her mother questioned her, and Mengele's teachings cracked. Mrs. Twartski became a detective, and asked all the children one by one what happened in her own schoolroom or at the Programming Center. If we were too afraid to tell, she used the hand signals we had learned to access the information.

From all the children, she heard “All Jewish girls may never procreate” or “Jewish girls may not have babies.” And “You have contaminated our sacred Deutsch language with your Yiddishkeit. For that, you will be punished,” and “You are an ugly people. When I look at you, I want to regurgitate.” But the one that sealed the deal was Mengele's programming the children to kill their mothers. Mrs. Twartski was a mother. The handlers and parents called meetings—some took place in our living room. The lawyers in the community all got together. They discussed how to break the contract, whether the parents had to reimburse any of the monies, whether they could be sued for breach of contract, and whether Mengele had any rights under the law. They expelled him from our community, and that's how a just-turned-five-year-old girl brought Mengele down in Pleasant Hills, New York, in 1951, and how the children learned that telling could be good.

When my family handed me over to Mengele, they withheld some of the information in the separate, highly secret, black book on me, especially my governmental functions and links. Mengele did the same thing. He created red, green, yellow, and blue books on me. Mengele left these programs in me that my family handlers didn't know about and that were supposed to go off at staggered ages.

All during the 1950s and perhaps later, Mengele and his associates also created hidden personalities in me and other programmed children. These concealed personalities were designed to come to life and perform functions such as kidnapping, setting bombs in banks, stealing from banks, assassinating designated people, and in general causing chaos in the United States. He left behind other Nazis who attempted to follow up on the programs he had created, and Nazi programming probably continues to this day. There may not have been sufficient follow-through for the personalities Mengele created to perform their functions when they were adults.

The foundational destruction

I am in a small plane flying from Baltimore to Toronto. The plane flies over streams of cars moving south and north on a highway, perhaps Route I-95. So that's what we look like all lined up in a row.

I hover above my life and look down. Pieces of it fly together. I spread a golden carpet. “Come to me,” I tell my many inside parts, personalities, what clinicians in the field call “alters” but what is really my splintered brain cut and spilled like a diamond. “Come to me and speak, at last.”

The clouds hide the earth. Barricades keep me from all my memories, from people inside me. I sharpen myself. I must pierce through. The clouds make a gentle clearing. I would have given my life to save the sacrificed children, but they are dead and I am alive. I must do what I can.

In awareness resides responsibility.

To divide a mind so that it doesn't know itself or its parts, programmers have to start young, at birth or before, in the womb.

The womb, 1943

We swallowed together, hummed together, and moved our bowels together. She was quite calm when she slept, and I used to stay awake and absorb the peacefulness. For moments she enjoyed me. She would put her hands on the outside of where I was, spread out her fingers and move them up and down and around to the sides. I don't think she would have done that had she not loved and wanted me. She must have loved me some.

We were in a chair in a strange dark room with presences that encircled us. Suddenly lightning cut an outside wall and ripped through us. I became frozen and my mother went away. No trace of her anywhere. Gone. I was alone, trembling, shivering. Mother and I had been in the same vicinity until the shock. She came back eventually but I didn't want any part of her. How could I ever trust her? And sure enough, that lightning-earthquake happened probably thirteen times.

Decades later, in my forties, I learned that the handlers gave her electroshock with the purpose of separating us.

I floated in the most soothing chamber in the world with perfect temperature, enclosed, wrapped up in life. Then it leaked out, all that perfectly warm water. It leaked out, then poured out, and I was rushed along, hurried along before I was ready, without comfort and uncomfortable. I felt the walls on the sides and top pushing me out hard. Shiny steel cold things caught hold of my head and pulled me out without my agreement. The air felt cold on my neck, shoulders and waist. The rest of my body was still warm. The second half became slippery and fast. My mother screamed almost as loud as her scream during the shocks and breathed even harder. She didn't like my father. She didn't like her father. She said they should never have let their wives have second children. She was the firstborn.

Strange hands did all sorts of things to me. Other hands wrapped me in a cuddle blanket. The tighter the wrap, the happier I became. But I missed her smell and longed to see her even though I still felt angry at her for hurting and leaving me alone. My heart beat faster and faster and went outside my body, like a helicopter.

Then I was near her again. I knew her lavender, gardenia smell inside and outside. I felt her eyes. The eyes are what connect the inside and the outside. Something was wrong. She went far away again. She turned away. She was saying no. Something was the matter with me. Why else would she go away? She liked me better inside than outside. And even inside she had left me.

I was born during an outdoor ritual at Bear Mountain, New York. Right after I emerged, a fluffy white thing, maybe a bird or cloud, floated over me and pulled me up into the air. We went higher and floated above all the people. I felt my mother lying on the blanket with a ring in her left nipple. She lay so still and pale, I was sure she had died and I felt sorry for my mother who didn't move and who had never touched me or known me. I would have wanted a mother. The fluff rose and me with it and we went to the tallest pine trees. It nestled me in a branch and the large hooting bird didn't seem to mind and the smaller birds got a little excited but then calmed down. I felt my tiny body lying on the stone altar pale and still and felt sorry for whoever remained in that frail body. Its loneliness reached the high tree branches because the birds and I felt overcome with sorrow. A whole world of sorrow squeezed into the little heart and some of the birds had to fly away. The tree top swayed gently in the night wind and sometimes I feared falling off but I was glad not to be on earth. I also felt shame for having abandoned those below. I thought about returning and was sure I could get back but I didn't want to. I felt a stab of selfishness but I couldn't bear the pain of my sorrow and loneliness and now I was also sure my mother had died and I had to stay away. She lay so still. Even up here, the heart pain swallowed me alive. I was caught in the middle of two extremes. The Presence wanted me to return. It urged me, gently shoving me like a mother bird wanting her young to fly. But I was just born and too young to have wings.

As part of the consecration ceremony, my grandfather had stabbed my left nipple with the surgical needle. He paced around my body, agitated. His hands waved and he shouted at people. They rushed to my body from different directions and screamed orders to others. They called out “104.5 degrees”. Someone rushed over with a bag and a man pushed something into the limp arm. The body coughed or cried, I couldn't tell which. My father picked up the body and walked it to his car as my Aunt Mimi followed, holding the bag, and my sister walked behind them.

If I went away, I would never see the frail limp body again and I would never know who I became. I would live as a mist in the trees and the birds would never accept me as one of their own. The birds looked down on the people and I could tell the birds thought of humans as bad animals. I quickly rode the white fluff down and returned to my shell just as my father closed the door to the car. My body flamed hot, especially my left side around my nipple, an armor of scalding pain. I heard the body groan.

As I write this at two in the morning in the bed-and-breakfast I stay in during my third therapy week-long intensive, I hear animal fights outside my bedroom window, squeals, grunts and fluttering sounds. A cat may have caught a helpless bird. Now it is quiet again.

My body rested in the back seat and Aunt Mimi held the IV bag as its medicine poured into me. I was not sure I should have returned to this body that couldn't contain the searing physical pain. Worse than that, though, was the line that sharply cut my heart. All around me grew a thick blackness and I felt in too much worry and fear to be able to cry. But then I did cry and made breathing sounds even though I also held my breath.

As we drove away, I felt a deeper cut of sorrow in my heart. I had hardly even smelled her from the outside. I'd had a mother inside and now I didn't have a mother outside, and this new world seemed too large to be in without a mother to guide me. This pain became too immense and the IV medicine could not touch this worse pain. I wondered whether one of the snakes had entered my body and wrapped itself around my heart and squeezed it. Snakes and spiders had walked over the stone altar they had placed me on as soon as I was born.

Even though I remained so far away from my mother, I felt her stirring and rising. I felt them putting her on a stretcher and holding the stretcher high in the air and parading my mother, who had just risen from the dead, high in the sky. The moonlight shimmered on her white body and on the ring in her left nipple to signify she belonged to them and was only an object of use. I didn't know whether I would ever see her again but I felt her alive in the world and alive in me and that gave me hope. I had a new determination to live rise in me despite this cutting pain that sliced through my heart and the throb of pain on my left side. Aunt Mimi held me on her lap and my sister stroked my legs. In the future, when they didn't force her to be mean, my sister would be nice.

It is five in the morning in the bed-and-breakfast and fear starts in my heart that I can't connect to anything. I get out the tapping machine searching for an answer. A small bilateral tapping machine sends faint electrical pulse sensations from side to side and helps unfreeze my brain. It can cut through the mind-control barricades and bring forward unknown, forbidden memories. I feel and then notice my upper chest turning bright red as the rash travels up my neck and face. And my left breast hurts.

They carried me into the apartment and put me in the crib with the IV. Much later, people came in, my relatives, my mother, and also the doctor. I had a rash over my body and the doctor said I had an allergic reaction to the medicine. He said it was not uncommon for newborns. He pulled the IV out of my arm and said my body would have to fight the infection on its own. The rash stung and burned and the left side of my chest had sharp pains.

I know tears streamed down my face then but I cannot cry now. I cannot cry.

People surrounded my crib, relatives and the doctor, but my mother was in another room, resting or sleeping and crying. They said she didn't want a dark skinned baby. I hadn't known that I had dark skin. My grandmother was trying to comfort me by shaking the crib. None of this meant much to me but then a huge finger from above touched me and to everyone's surprise, I lived. The finger gave me a good feeling, peaceful, comforting.

Familiar voices filled the room. “She has ten fingers and toes.” “She's a good weight.” “If you didn't want a dark child, why did you marry a dark man?” “You can't give your baby away.” “She is your baby. She came out of you.” “She has a chin. It will show more as she grows.” “You'll feel better in a day or two.” “You just need to eat something.” “Why can't you be like the other mothers?” Someone sneezed and my mother screamed, “You're making germs.” Then she said, “She looks like the doorman's baby.”

I pulled deep into my cuddle blanket and tried to wrap my arms around me but they went wild. I tried to pull my knees up as they had been but the blanket was too tight. My heart was pouring out, but I went underneath it. I hid there from my mother. I crouched underneath my heart until I needed her milk.

How do I remember all this about being born and before? I don't know for sure but it is possible that the fetus-me and infant-me picked up my mother's attitudes and also the environment. Parts of my brain recorded the sounds and voices, which older personalities in my mind are translating as I put these memories together. All that I write is part of my adult journey of recapturing what has happened. I describe infant reality in adult language because the infants and adults in me are telling this story together. Traumatic memory is more chiseled than ordinary memory. Traumatic memory doesn't wash away, and dissociated traumatic memory, or memory that isn't remembered at first, contains the boldest lines and the sharpest details.

In the apartment in Pleasant Hills, I lay in a large crib so I must have been between three and six months old because I was out of my bassinette. I knew my parents, my sister, and my handler. My relatives and handler gathered around my crib with purpose. Other shadowy presences were there, including the master programmer, Wiezenslowski. We were all in the larger bedroom my sister and I shared. Well-ironed white organdy curtains covered the two windows. Beams that I worried would fall on me protruded from the ceiling. We had two single maple beds and Mother, with her artistic eye, had hung Victorian prints of ladies in crinoline flared skirts. The narrow kitchen was pink and green, the living room bleak and gray. The air was also gray. My parents made the dining room overlooking the waterfall into their cramped bedroom. The basement or garden apartment was large enough for children but the adults lived constrained, one on top of another, with little privacy or solitude.

In this family I was born into, children had to be controlled. I am not talking about behaving-well-controlled. Children had to become marionettes of countless pieces strung together tightly, each string wrapped around someone's finger and pulled fiercely. Inside the pieces in my head, I had always heard babies sucking. Babies inside my brain pushed to come out. Sucking to hold onto life.

Little hands emerge stretching out, calling me now. I cannot turn my back and abandon them. No, I will travel into their countries of fear and exhaustion. I will believe what they bravely tell me even if my life as I know it will turn to wax, and the people in my world will melt and disappear. I can find the people inside me who have never known life. I can retrieve my forgotten, abandoned selves.

For over sixty years, I remembered nothing about my reversed, false Kabbalah foundation. Then one day recently, I awoke early in the morning and saw in my mind a shiny black material going over my tiny body in my familiar crib and Mrs. Twartski's tough hands. My infant-self was fascinated by the different colors within the black that undulated in the air, and the memory of this programming unfurled like the satin material.

Mrs. Twartski was a short, stout immigrant from somewhere in Poland, perhaps Galicia, where one grandfather was born, or Belarus, where one grandmother was born, but not from Budapest, where the other side of the family was born. She lived in a ground floor apartment across the courtyard. Each morning, she leaned out of her kitchen window that was close to the grass and said good morning to my mother. Each evening, she leaned out and asked my mother how her day went. They may have talked in between too. Her husband was a shadowy thin man who usually wore a business suit and conservative tie.

Mrs. Twartski started the mind-control programming when I was being nursed by my mother. She pulled me off Mother's nipple repeatedly until I went into a rage. When I was back in the crib, Mrs. Twartski held a bottle for me and then had Aunt Mimi pull it away. She also took off my warm pajamas and left me in the crib cold and naked and without comfort. Mrs. Twartski gave me a cuddly toy. I liked the way it felt. It was not as good as a mother but it was better than nothing. Aunt Mimi pulled it away. I tried to hold on but she was much stronger. “Give me that toy,” she said over and over. I became angrier and angrier. Wiezenslowski came in. “The jacks will be her card,” he said. He laid down four and said, “The blacks, for killing, the reds, for sex.” He tried to seal my fate. He channeled my anger into distinct internal personalities whom he could access whenever he wanted.

Later, I was still in my crib and hadn't had a bottle for a long time. Adults were doing things to my body with instruments. Alison said they were probably taking my blood pressure and heart rate. Mrs. Twartski was always there. Wiezenslowski was there sometimes. Then they used my mother. She fed my sister Marlene conspicuously as I with hunger pangs watched from the crib. I went into despair.

“She was supposed to get angry. Never mind, we can use this,” Mrs. Twartski said and showed me a card with a picture of a beautiful angel in blue.

“This angel helps you with your sorrow.” She pointed to my tears and wiped the left side of my face with her pudgy fingers. “Follow the angel always.” Then she turned to the adults and said, “We just established the basis of suicide programming. We already have enough anger to make her a killer.”

The “killer” training was mind-killing or psychic killing. They tricked me into believing that I could kill with my mind.

Mrs. Twartski came into our pale blue bedroom. I waited in my crib near the two windows overlooking the courtyard and waterfall. I wasn't wearing a diaper. It was night and the birds were quiet.

Mrs. Twartski picked me up. Her hands were strong, determined, and blistered. They were the hands of a laborer. I was naked and my legs dangled. I liked the feel of my blanket but she left it in the crib. She handed me to my Uncle Richard. He was like a giant so I was high up in the air. My legs were free and moving. Uncle Richard just held me there. His hands were not chapped and rough, but they were mean hands that didn't seem to like babies. Nothing happened. I just dangled in space. The air was quiet and still. It was dark in the room and outside the window.

Mrs. Twartski grasped my left foot. I felt her fingernails. She twisted it the way years later my sister and schoolmates would give my wrists “Indian burns”. Something snapped, perhaps her fingers. I heard the word “good”. The “good” came from my trainer, the woman who had taken over my life, the woman to whom my parents had to turn me over. They had no choice. They kept me but gave me away. They must have also been trained from birth.

I heard a sharp sound cutting the air, a blade slicing the invisible. My chest heaved and my tiny caterpillar legs curled underneath me. Once I began crying, I couldn't stop, the way later, when anger poked out, it wouldn't stop. I cried until I lost my breath and then cried breathlessly and in chokes. A piece of me popped away. Now there were two of me, the crying-gasping-for-air baby and this other baby, parallel to me but not me.

“Cynthia,” Mrs. Twartski said. “Walk by her. I'm putting her back in the crib. Walk by her without making eye contact, without looking at her. Keep walking by her, back and forth without one bit of eye contact until I say stop.”

Mother walked by. She was wearing one of her pretty cotton dresses with flowers. She always looked beautiful. Her hair was still black. When she turned thirty, her hair would start to gray but not yet. Later she became a redhead, which brought out the greenness of her hazel eyes. Mother walked by and she didn't look at me and didn't care that I was in my crib screaming and I couldn't catch my breath and there was another part of me dangling in the air and that dangling part wouldn't come back. She didn't care because I was no good. If she didn't love me, no one would love me. She walked by me with her pretty flowers on her dress and her black hair. She walked by as if I were Father's Camel cigarette butt tossed to the ground. I gasped harder. Mrs. Twartski—my only mother now—picked me up and tapped with her fat, squat hand on my back. I began to calm down and let some air float into me. That other part of me would not come back, the perpetually crying, floating part that they named “Jane”.

“The infant is too delicate. We need a stronger child. I won't use Jane,” Mrs. Twartski said. I felt a cold hush in the room. From the moment I came out into this lighted world, I felt a silence that meant that people thought I was not adequate. It was the way I looked. Now it was also my crying. They didn't like my crying. The more they didn't like it, the more I couldn't stop.

I smelled harsh cigarette smoke. It burned my swollen eyes and insides around my heart. It filled the gray air. All the windows and Venetian blinds were closed. They wanted no one looking in.

Uncle Richard wore a long hooded black robe. So did Mrs. Twartski, Uncle Sidney, and my father, who smoked constantly. Decades later, I would realize this was a religious ceremony. Uncle Richard took me out of the crib and dangled me again. Mrs. Twartski grasped my left leg, which swung loosely in the air. She pulled my loose skin as if I were a chicken. She pulled it and pulled it. I tried to be tough and fight her but I couldn't stay in myself and flew away from myself again. This time I flew further away from my body.

“There she is. Seal it. I can keep this one,” Mrs. Twartski said. “Her name is Pam.”

When she said “Seal it,” Uncle Richard shot something strong through my body that I later in life recognized as electricity. The flash of it ripped through me, shredding me. It cemented the part of me that went away. She had split a part of me away. She had taken a part of me for herself. A numbness settled over me.

Electroshock is like searing raw meat in hot oil before you simmer or bake it.

It causes pain without leaving marks.

Mrs. Twartski laid me back in the crib. I shivered and peed down my legs. As soon as I cried, she said, “Cynthia, walk past her again. Don't look at her. You slowed down a little last time. No lingering or feeling. This is surgery. We don't feel. You do this right or we will kill her on the spot. It's so easy to kill a baby. They suffocate in less than three minutes. If you don't behave, we will kill your other one too. The whole family is so damn sensitive. I don't have these problems with my other clients.”

I saw that my mother who had started out tough was breaking down like the Jane part of me. Mother was crying. My mother with her beautiful flowers and graceful gait walked by without looking at me, but I felt her heart breaking for me. I felt her wanting to scoop me out of the crib and hold me even though she didn't like my skin and didn't think I was pretty.

Mother didn't look but she slowed down by my crib. She even touched the rail when she walked by. Her hand looked graceful, like a white swan.

Uncle Sidney, who had been quiet until now, leaped forward and punched my mother in the jaw. She screamed, and everyone, even Father, told her to shut up, that the neighbors might hear. Mrs. Twartski made a big movement with her arms and Uncles Sidney and Richard pushed Mother onto a desk's wooden chair, tied her delicate hands and legs, and gagged her. My father did nothing to stop them. Uncle Sidney and my father had big round bellies. They turned the chair so that her back was to me. She still made wild sounds through the gag.

“Another misstep, Cynthia, and we will kill Marlene.”

Mrs. Twartski waved a color in front of my face. It was a bold, bright green. She hung a pocket of the same rich color on the side of my crib. She and Uncle Sidney flashed two cards before me. When I was older, I recognized the pictures on the cards as birds flying, one getting caught in eaves. The birds were also on the green pocket hanging on the railing of my crib. Mrs. Twartski put on a black apron over her robe with a shape covering her breasts. Around the shape was the color green. I had never seen the shape before. The shape had a line going down and a line on the top going across. The top line pointed to the windows. When I was older, I recognized this shape on Mrs. Twartski's apron as a Khaf in the Hebrew alphabet. All the time my father smoked Camel cigarettes. So did Uncle Sidney.

To separate each new infant Mrs. Twartski or one of my uncles performed a different kind of torture: twisting, burning, pulling, squashing, suffocating, sticking needles in me, or spinning me, then sealing each split with electroshock. Uncle Sidney put something cold and smooth in my ear. It made a high pitched screeching sound like an animal dying. I couldn't bear it. Every split left a gulf between me and my part. The splits came faster and faster. I had no more outrage or resistance. I was broken into pieces of me. I was a full adult before I went back to share the infants' pain. I am the infants.

Mrs. Twartski showed each new infant she detached from the core of me a color, a card, and a symbol. Each of these separated infants was a root from which an entire tree of parts with a particular purpose would grow.

Perhaps Mother's tiny bit of empathy allowed the programming to dissolve gradually. Her feeling for this withdrawn, afraid, bred-for-a-purpose infant, however slight the feeling—perhaps it was only a blip in the otherwise seamless structure, a kink in the otherwise carefully constructed world—allowed freedom to creep in.

“We will need a queen, you know. You will be our next queen only because of your bloodline though you would never know it from who your mother is.” Mrs. Twartski pinched my neck until I gasped and could no longer breathe, put the sound prong in my left ear, and caught the split.

“The prophets said Cynthia's second child will reign, not the first, not the third, just the second. It is ordained.”

Electroshock is like a virulent force of nature that saws through the body, its unstoppable pain leaving one thwarted, paralyzed. When a deliberate electroshock occurs, everything—all development, awareness, feelings of humanity—stops. A part of the mind is stunned and arrested in that moment and isn't aware of anything but itself.

The irregular shapes were like a rainbow, as I scattered over my crib in the air—I could almost reach out and touch the different me's looking down at my body. Like stars watching on a dark night, almost touchable but not touchable—my body and selves were parallel and not the same.

“Now the last one. We now dedicate her to Lucifer, our Lord and Master.” They all started humming something excited. Their robes swayed sideways as if they were dancing. One by one they took off their black robes. First Father, then Uncle Richard, Sidney, then strangers I didn't know yet. People returned from the other room but not my mother. My mother was no longer my mother. It left a hole in me that never stopped yearning. Even when I will be old and dying, I will have this sadness.

Mrs. Twartski twisted my head off away from my body while I still lay in the crib. As she twisted, when I came to the point of wanting to die, she showed me the picture of the beautiful smiling angel in light blue and a second card with a picture of a beautiful sunset in pinks, golds, and reds.

“This angel will make everything all right for you. Follow him.” The angel had a halo around him as if he were straight out of heaven from God. I would learn that this heaven was not the heaven of the regular world. In that world, people get to heaven by doing good things or by the grace and forgiveness of God. In this world my family belongs to, people get to “heaven” by doing bad things. The worse people were, the more they were valued here.

Mrs. Twartski gave some signal and one by one the people laid their robes over me. As the black fluttered, I saw silver, white, and purple in it. I didn't have enough smoky air to breathe. My sheet was black, my covers were black. The robes lay sticky and heavy on top of me. They smelled of men's sweat. Mrs. Twartski counted to thirteen. She reached under all the robes and put her fingers on my throat.

“Take the robes off her. She is still alive. An angel intervened. She will be our next queen. It's ordained,” Mrs. Twartski declared.

My body betrayed me too. I did not suffocate.

“You will make us proud.” Mrs. Twartski stretched out her five fingers, then one finger, and said, “Cursed be any man who disturbs what is set.”

This memory has crawled out of me slowly but deliberately over days. After each memory sequence finishes, I feel exhilarated for a few hours, then exhausted and blurry for days. Even as I recover, my inside organizers are pulling up the parts who hold the next batch of dissociated memories. Once this process breaks free, it unleashes. It is a difficult form of labor.

Thirteen of me lay disconsolate in the crib. The part who was too delicate and thrown away, “Jane,” hovered by the side.

Mother closed the windows especially quietly. It must have been the middle of the night. I followed her seamless moves with my eyes. She left again and came back with Marlene.

“I don't want to go to sleep. I want to stay with the grownups,” Marlene said, and cried.

Mother put her in her big-child bed and tucked her in. I heard a kiss. Then she came to my crib, her head hanging down.

“Don't touch her,” Mrs. Twartski said from the doorway. “No holding or touching for forty-eight hours.” Mother turned her back and walked away. I saw her glance back at Marlene sleeping in her bed.

Mrs. Twartski came to my crib and put a white blanket next to me. She picked me up—I didn't like being close to her face—and put me on top of the white blanket. She pressed both her crusty thumbs into my ribs. The touch hurt. All thirteen of my parts pulled away from her. This would be one of the last times all parts of me were in unison. The infant blanket felt good, as if I were held. I pulled away from Mrs. Twartski and sank into the safe blanket. She wrapped it tightly around me and pulled out my left arm so that my mouth could reach my thumb. I sucked furiously. All thirteen parts at this moment wanted the same thing. I rooted my mouth over my thumb and sucked until the world with all these people left and only the vacuum between my mouth and thumb existed, as I drifted away in infant sleep. I could comfort myself. I could find comfort in soft material and my own body. I did not need people.

The pictures spun in my head. I saw the yellow rose and the death card together, a skeleton riding on a horse. A circle of dancing children and parents coupled with a landscape frozen with ice translated into “Only here will I have a family and friends, nowhere else in the world.” A card of a naked handcuffed girl with rats told me I would be a sexual slave. All the colors and letters and pictures crashed down on my mind. The joker, hanged man, ace of spades, quarter moon with stars, seagulls flying over an ocean, and candle holder spun around me laughing. I was so filled with electricity that I became an electricity baby.

Flashlight demons

Primarily religious, these criminal groups believe in demonic entities and the supreme beings of Satan and Lucifer. They also believe in their enemies, God and Jesus and the masses of good angels.

Although they believe that these entities are invisible, they make representations of them for children. This kind of programming starts in infancy and continues throughout early childhood. Children's gullible young minds are caught in the snare of preposterous beliefs.

The infant lies in its crib. The room is dark. The programmers give the child a small bottle of water laced with psychedelics. It tastes bitter but the child is hungry, dehydrated and drinks it. Shadows of huge “birds” (at first called “birdies”) cover the walls. The birds fly around the room, go through and into the terrified infant. The infant hears hooting sounds, smells something like tar burning. Suddenly an excruciating electroshock comes out of nowhere. The relative who secretly administered it says “The demons did that to you. They bit you. If you love them, they will stop.” The infant looks up and sees a red eye as large as the room. The relatives say “Satan's eye is always watching you.”

The child doesn't know that flashlights and cameras, tinted lenses and colored paper over flashlights, hand puppets and large puppets on poles and handles formed these illusions. The programmers reinforce this core training recurrently and consider it necessary for the creation of paralyzed, mindless automatons. When the children grow up and when the adults in them figure out what happened, the adult parts will have to coax their child parts to release their frozen terror and cognitive distortions.

During a therapy session, Alison showed me how a flashlight could make shapes that would trick a child to believe in demons invading the crib. I had no idea that children in me lived in this arrested, fabricated terror.[1]

The difference

Security programming

When I was almost two years old and lying in my crib, every person I knew put a needle in my gums. My sister put it in hard. Some of the grownups put it in roughly, others gently. A boy I hadn't met yet who lived in the same building pretended to put the needle in. He whispered to me to cry, and we fooled the adults. I thought we even fooled Satan whose eye shone above my crib all night and who watched everything I did. My father projected the eye onto the ceiling. His projector made shadows on the wall to terrify me.

In my conscious mind and ordinary life as an adult, I remembered nothing of this boy Daniel, the most important person in my life. But he touched and taught every insider. Insiders are parts or personalities in the brain living underneath the front person and hidden from normal life. They do the bidding of the cult trainers and usually do not know about the front person. The front person is the part of the mind assigned the task of living in normal life. The front person doesn't know there are insiders.

In the late 1980s, I am in bed in my 108th Street Manhattan apartment and writing in my journal. My hand starts drawing. It draws the silhouette of a tall, lean, curvy boy. I add a mass of dark curls and deep, haunting dark eyes. I dress him in well-fitting black pants, a cracked leather belt, skimpy shoes, and a V-neck machine-made sweater. Under the picture, I write “Daniel David Baker”. Then I sob. My front person doesn't know what is going on. My insiders have begun to talk. It is as if Daniel has come back from the dead to guide me.

They put needles in my gums to teach me that I was not allowed to tell anyone about Satan or what we do. I would feel dental pain if I even thought of straying. Every bit of my programming addressed security. Joseph, another of my handlers, gave me a little voodoo doll and told me to put a needle in its chest, on the left side. The doll represented me. He shocked my heart with electricity and told me to feel those pains if I ever got close to remembering and telling. After a while, he didn't use the needles and electricity and just told me to feel the pain. I had to watch a metronome going back and forth hypnotizing me as my uncles and father chanted, “Don't tell, don't know.” All through my recovery until I consciously remembered this training, I had dental and chest pains as I approached new memories.

Dedicated and marked

I watched as my grandfather made the bed furthest away from me into a ritual arena. My sister slept in the other bed, closer to my crib. She was seven and I was three. He placed a thick white towel over the pulled-tight white sheet. He took two shiny silver swords with fancy handles and placed them on the sides of the towel and polished the rubies and emeralds on the handles with his handkerchief from his pocket. He patted everything down and measured with his eye, like a dressmaker. He glanced at me but didn't smile, left and flicked off the light by the doorway. I lay in the dark, trying to reach the mobile with my wiggling legs and looking at this world through the bars on my crib.

The neighborhood was shrouded in darkness. There were different kinds of black, the blacks of restfulness, sleep, death, evil. Across the courtyard, light surrounded Mr. Jacobs' apartment, a rocking peaceful shimmer of gold. The rest of the neighborhood had particles of evil forming a solemn and lugubrious aura.

My grandmother entered furtively, glancing quickly behind her. She took something out of her dress pocket and rubbed it on the towel with her squat, strong hands. She wore rubber gloves, the kind Mother and Mrs. Mathies cleaned in.

My mother stood in the doorway holding a bottle for me. She also looked as if she had been rushing. My grandmother looked up from her rubbing and said sharply, “Cynthia, go away for a while.” My mother, always obedient to her mother, turned around and went away with my bottle. I felt angry and swallowed hard out of thirst.

Grandma lifted the ceremonial sword closest to me and put something on its tip with the same rag that she then tucked back in her pocket. She placed the sword in its exact spot, straightened it a bit more, peeled off her gloves, and rushed out, switching off the overhead light.

Hours later, after I'd had my bottle and slept some more, the ritual began for my second dedication. My grandfather lifted me from my crib. He wore a purple robe and looked to me like a girl. His hands felt dry and rough, though his nails were always perfectly manicured. He placed me on the towel on the bed prepared for the ritual. It burned my skin and I cried, but he and everyone else continued as if nothing had happened. I felt my back turn red and crinkly. Grandpa Max and Uncle Harry, also wearing a purple robe, each held a sword with a jeweled handle. Only men were present but Mrs. Twartski stood in the doorway.

They held the swords with tips touching and forming a V over my baby body. They touched the tips together, then moved them to the left side, right side, and center again, all while chanting “Hail Satan, hail Satan, hail to the master of the universe, hail to our guardian Lucifer who foresees all events in his dominion.” Then it all started again. “Hail Satan…” with the curtains billowing and their voices rising to a pitch of frenzy, each hail more impassioned than the last. They seemed to rise off the floor, and sweat poured from their faces. With the tip of his sword, Grandpa made a slit on my stomach and chanted, “Bless this womb that it may provide an heir for Lucifer's kingdom.” That's when the angels took me above the waterfall, and I felt what happened in other people's apartments, and the goodness that came out of Mr. Jacobs' apartment. We stayed there for a long time in a peaceful, delicate mood. When I was in the sky far away from this bed, I felt something higher that was pure and good, and I reached to get there. But that golden, inviting space said, “Go back,” and I was falling, tumbling. I heard the chanting and clanging and was enraged.

When I somehow returned to my body, a doctor was there with my parents and grandparents. They called my grandfather by his nickname that I had not heard before: Wily Max. My grandfather was not wearing any one of his masks. Just as I returned, the doctor told my relatives that I would be all right. I felt a leftover peacefulness from my excursion and also a sorrow all mixed together.

“Wily-Willy-Wily-Max, you've still got a granddaughter,” everyone cheered. But the doctors said I had a fever of 104 degrees. The doctors gave me medicine, and put ice on my feet because they considered the fever more dangerous than the rash all over my body.

I had this memory in May 2013. I hadn't known that my grandfather was the infamous international traveling programmer who ruined many people's minds. I thought he was just an unlikable grandparent who pinched. It is a hard adjustment. As a child, I remembered this well-known master programmer traveling around, programming me; and as an adult, I heard of other survivors who had a similar experience. Then I had a memory in which this Wiezenslowski, who is the same person as Willy Max and Wily Max, peeled off one of his masks, and a second one underneath the first, and there was my grandfather. I wonder whether Hitler had granddaughters and whether they and I could form a support group.

“The kingdom will proceed, hail Lucifer, hail Lucifer, hail Lucifer…”

The clanging ritual swords formed a roof over me. A rash appeared all over my body. It formed almost straight lines the length of my body, wrapping around my feet.

“It's a bad omen,” Mrs. Twartski said.

My father came in, “We'll say she has the chicken pox, that she caught it from Marlene who had a very mild case.” When my mother came in, she saw the rash and screamed. She pulled Marlene away by the arm and would not let her near me.

Now it is 2013 and I am in an airplane flying to Alison Miller. The plane is crowded and cramped. I find a vacant seat next to a young couple with a baby boy. I guess the other passengers don't want to sit next to a baby.

Grandpa called everyone into the big bedroom where I lay with my rash that went right to the bone. It felt as if the rash ate up my body. Grandma sat on the edge of the mattress where they performed the ritual. Mrs. Twartski tapped with her fingers in sequence on the wood desk. I lay back in my crib looking through the bars. Grandpa tried to find out what had happened to me. He was adamant. Mrs. Twartski tapped louder and faster and also shook her crossed-over top leg faster and faster. He asked my grandmother, his wife, whether she had done this, meaning caused my rash. She answered “No,” and resented the question. He asked my mother, and she shook her head furiously. He asked her whether she knew what had happened or whether she had seen anyone alone with me, perhaps when she went to give me the pre-ritual bottle. Grandma's eyes latched on Mother, and Mother continued to shake her head. Grandpa said, “I am getting nowhere and this is a grave offence and a serious investigation.” Mrs. Twartski stopped tapping and shaking. She stood up and hooked her arm under Mother's and walked her down the hall outside the bedroom. Mrs. Twartski was going to do something to my mother but I didn't know what. Mother appeared docile. Grandma frowned deeply and looked as if she wasn't there anymore. Grandpa walked over to my crib, looked me over, and made a disgusted sound in his mouth.

Around April 2013, a month before my next therapy intensive, a rash starts on my right foot around my big toe. After a week or two, it spreads to my chin and neck. I have straight lines of rash over my body and go to my holistic doctor.

The doctor isn't sure what kind of rash I have. The rash isn't poison ivy, shingles, a fungus, or from gluten. It is a body memory of this dedication ritual. The mind is that strong.

In the airplane, flying over the states, the rash on my hip sends out shoots. It becomes a blossoming flower.

They tied Grandma to a chair in her own living room, gagged, and Grandpa whipped her. He said everyone there had to take a turn; Father, Aunt Mimi, eventually me. He held his hands over mine and we whipped her around her calves. He said to her, “We'll mark up your skin the way you marked up hers.” Mother received a punishment in their small bedroom for not snitching on her mother.

That night, they wrapped me in a white blanket, put me in the stroller and walked me to the ritual site in Old Pleasant Hills, off Enterprise Avenue, one and a half miles away. It was after midnight and the only people on the streets were families also hurrying to the site. Children sat in strollers and parents carried babies. Older children walked behind their parents. Everyone rushed quietly. When we got to the ritual site, my mother picked me up out of the stroller and carried me in. The crowds chanted, “Hail to the queen's mother, hail to the mother of the queen.” The crowds wore black robes and swayed like waves in the ocean. Even when my mother picked me up and carried me to the raised platform and everyone cheered and chanted—even then, she did not seem proud of me, just proud of the attention she received.

The mother and father sitting next to me on the plane are absorbed in their baby. They watch their baby's finger movements and beam every time he moves or gurgles or burps.

At the ritual in the courtyard near the train station, Grandpa took me from Mother's stiff, bony arms, removed the cuddle blanket, and held me high up. Doctors in the congregation spotted my rash and rushed over in their black hooded robes.

“Or poison sumac.”

One of the doctors put calamine lotion on me.

“It's a pity,” another doctor said. “It's such an important festival.”

The rash hurt more and more, turned butterfly colors and spread.

“Poor little butterfly,” someone said.

“It's an omen,” Mrs. Twartski repeated.

“She should go to the hospital.”

“We can't take her to the hospital.”

My grandfather insisted he could see lines he had made underneath the rash. He needed a prophetic sign.

Rituals adhered to tight schedules. As part of my consecration as the mother of the future heir, Grandpa put me on the altar with snakes and bugs that hurt my skin more. The sacrifice always signaled the beginning of the festivities. To signify the importance of this ritual, there were two victims slaughtered simultaneously. The two killings had to take place at exactly the same moment. If anyone were too fast or too slow, they would have had to sacrifice other people until the executioners got it right. The tall man, who must have been the executioner, held his hand over my tiny hand. We held the sword at the first altar and my grandfather was at the parallel one. On one altar lay a drugged or dead six-year-old boy and a baby was on the other. I didn't want to kill those people. I wanted to be the one who died. The executioner plunged the weapon into the dead or sleeping child's body and Grandpa Max killed the baby. Through his masks, his underface turned into a tiger's as his beads of sweat turned red and purple. I can see now that these were lighting and film effects, but I thought it was real then. The sacrificial blood the tall man poured over my body stung my rash. They made us all drink the blood. Everyone cheered, then began a frenzy of dancing and chanting. I looked at my hands; they seemed like strangers. No one yet had told me that killing was wrong, but something in my soul recoiled and my heart had another pain right down its center. My wrists felt exhausted from the inside out. My hands wanted to fall off. Rage could have split me open.

I vomited. I didn't want the boy and baby killed, but other people were in a high religious state that built as the tall man lifted me and turned slowly to the left, holding my ribs too tightly. The air was cold. I felt alone even though a man held me up and I saw the tops of many robed heads. I tried to make friends with the stars checkering the midnight sky. I wanted to touch the stars. A longing almost ripped my body open. A sadness swallowed me.

I cried. My father, who was near the platform, frowned and looked worried. He had told me not to cry. “Little queens grow into big queens. Little queens are princesses and princesses don't cry.”

The tall man kept rotating me as the black river of robes chanted. When he put me down, doctors ran up to me with their stethoscopes, IVs, artificial respiration breathing tubes, oxygen masks, and something like Demerol, which made everything look as if I were floating above water. Seven more people split from me and hung out in the black sky above the branches away from my body. I came back to my body filled with iciness. They were not letting me die.

A machine pressed on my chest. Over my face, a hand held something down which got my lungs to work. I pushed as hard as I could against his arm. I felt myself shrinking in.

All these ritualized procedures are ordained and performed in a certain sequence at an exact time according to ancient rules. After the doctors worked on me, and I revived, my grandfather attached a ring to my pierced left nipple and said, “If she lives or if she dies, I dedicate her to Satan and consecrate her to Lucifer. If she dies, her bones will return to Lucifer and be made into ash.” As the ring went into my skin and I bled, I wanted to kill him but I passed out again, and the doctors started all over. The same doctors who cheered the sacrifices tried to save my life once more. They whipped their heads around with authority as if they were in a hospital and said my grandfather would have to leave. Grandpa Max shouted, “I will not leave my own ritual site.” My father and uncles took him away screaming.

After I was revived, Mrs. Twartski began the mind control. My brain recorded Mrs. Twartski's words, and when I recalled the memory, I finally knew what she meant. “You had the chicken pox. You caught it from your sister. If you ever remember this ritual, your hands and feet will be chopped off.” A little later, my father returned with the car to take me home.

The doctor said my nipple was infected and he set up an IV with a bag on a stand by my crib. My parents strapped my arms down so that I couldn't scratch. My grandfather stood by my crib sobbing into his well-ironed handkerchief. The infection spread and everyone expected me to die. A big white bird flew through the window and perched on the railing of my crib, like a stork. I thought it had come to take me away the way it had brought me. It lifted me by the diaper and we went up into the blue sky. My grandfather folded the joints of his fingers and examined his nails.

Everyone felt sorry for me for having chicken pox during such an important ritual in 1946.

As soon as I recovered, my grandfather began the preparation for my use as a government servant.

Butterflies for monarchs

Children had to emulate butterflies. We didn't dance in costumes doing little routines in ballet shoes on elementary schools' stages. We were strung up in the air like the murdered prison guard in the movie Silence of the Lambs. It took three men to hoist up one child. One man held the child who was being attached to a ceiling hook, and two other men attached the child's wrists and ankles to ropes and clamps on either side. They had to fasten the child's arms simultaneously, because a limb could be dislocated if one side was done before the other. This positioning happened to many children, teenagers, and even young women. I saw them in politicians' hidden chambers. Perhaps these male criminals identified with the kingly aspects of the monarch butterfly, dominant in the butterfly skies, whose drenched coloring is breathtaking and majestic.

This secret, deep training took place in my grandparents' second bedroom, his unofficial office. In this second bedroom, where non-relatives were not permitted, my grandfather often did not disguise himself with the masks and personalities he presented to the criminal cult world. He was just his sadistic self, mean and raw. He liked to work in contained, private environments, but sometimes he demonstrated to his sons-in-law. And he needed their help getting me strung up. To start, he held me over his lap and gave me an injection in the same spot he always used, the left side of the lumbar spine. “You tilt the needle up and head for the bone. It doesn't matter how much they scream. It's supposed to hurt,” he said to my uncles.

“Are you a butterfly?” he asked me.

“No.” Even though I was starved and physically weakened, I answered, “I'm a little girl.” Often as the body weakens, the spirit gets stronger. But when the body passes out, the spirit can't do much. My answer earned me more electroshock, spinning, and then being strung up by him and two uncles. All that might have happened anyway. Being in the air, even when held up by a hook and ropes, increases dizziness and disorientation. My uncles told me I had to flutter my wings, but I couldn't because the straps were taut. Before I was strung up, I had to balance on one foot and wave my arms as if they were wings flapping in the air. It was a little dance, sometimes fun.

For the first timed training session when I was three years old in 1946, shortly before Daniel entered my life, I hung for two minutes. My grandfather always timed it with his stopwatch. He built my suspension gradually to sixty minutes, then ninety, then 120. He needed to create endurance for when the “monarchs” of the world would want to use me. While I was suspended, he stretched my two orifices with rods of gradually increasing widths. My grandfather wanted his specimens to be perfectly pleasing.

I was very sore. So were my muscles and bones. I often had rashes, infections, and dislocated joints; but worst of all, I felt like a rag to dirty and throw away. I felt that that was the reason I was born, to be used up. If I was being prepared for “monarchs,” then this was too big to fight. How do you even fight your parents? My grandfather gave my father cash on his way out, and he said to one of my uncles that soon his daughter would have this same training, meaning he'd get cash too. Powerful people must have been paying my grandfather, and he would give the legal fathers a cut of it.

After my grandfather spun the drugged young me, and finished with his other tortures of a head vise and putting me in a freezing compartment, he said to these shivering parts with head pain, “Spin, little butterfly, spin over there. You are on a long string, a pole flying hither and there. Dangle little butterfly. You are no longer a girl. Forget about having curls. You are an insect, pure and simple, made for man's use. Listen to the wives, but do as the man says. Always listen to your Grandma, but it's only I who gives orders. Forget about your father. But the rulers, our monarchs, those are men. You do what they say. Bring honor to your family. Perform your duties. It won't hurt. You are prepared. Everything is stretched. You are a perfect specimen stretched under glass, pinned in the air. Now fly, little butterfly, and do my bidding for the sake of your family.” He created thirty-six butterflies in me. At the political offices, silent girls of various ages who were the butterflies had to stay in a cage until the wives of the politicians called us out.

All of this is coming out in writing. These parts can't speak. I'm writing from my journals. Our butterfly wings flap against the wires of the cage. We're all in the same big cage.

In his second bedroom, my grandfather had an open book of photographs of butterflies, and he wanted my body painted like one. He instructed my artistic Aunt Mimi where to paint. With poster and finger paint, she drew thick black lines and put red, green, pink, blue, or yellow inside, according to his instructions. He especially liked orange, the color for government privilege. He left my backside and legs unpainted. Grandpa was delighted with this innovation. “I should have done this long ago. I should have done this to all you girls.” To me, Grandpa said, “I should have done this to your mother.” Then he talked to himself even though we were still there. “What a unique idea, what an invaluable idea. I'll be a millionaire.” His eyes were visionary but framed in sadism, insanity, and greed. Before I went home, my grandmother had to scrub the paint off me in the bathtub, as she muttered, “Another one of his crazy ideas.” Paint bled onto the porcelain of the tub, which she also had to scrub. The paint clumped on human skin, and pieces fell off.

The wife of one of the monarchs was appalled when a clump landed on her dress. She then would have no part in painted girls, whose painted-on-naked-skin costumes might get dye or chunks of paint on the staff's or her designer clothes.

Half a century later, video sex-symbol stars entertain dressed in butterfly wings painted with the new technologies and deliver secret messages to new generations of victims.

The difference

I do not believe that I ever would have known there was such a thing as love on earth, that people could be kind, that there was a divine presence that lived through people—never would I have known had it not been for a tall, thin boy with dark curly hair whom I first met when he pretended to put a needle in my gum and who became my friend when I was three years old, at the moment before my heart would have barricaded itself off.

He moved gracefully like a dancer or swimmer. He had pale white skin with an under-layer of rose, brown eyes with long lashes, and cherry-like lips. He was born into the same distorted world as I, but he somehow knew what love and compassion were, and he gave them to me. His mother was kind.

He knocked on our front door.

“My name is Daniel David Baker and I've come to play with Wendy.”

I looked at him through the bars in my crib, which was placed in the living room next to the planter that was also a room divider. It divided the foyer that was also our dining room from the living room. Usually, my crib was in the big bedroom that my sister slept in. His eyes looked sad, filled with sorrow. I didn't know why he was calling on me.

“I've come to play with Wendy,” he said again. “They sent me because my sister just died.” He was tall, narrow, and had a bouncy walk. My heart leapt out of my body. Perhaps there was a safe person in the world. He smiled at my mother and looked at me sideways. His eyes were like a velvet path. A new me was suddenly growing within. This glance was the one that changed my life. I went from being one of my family to being an outsider.

“Who sent you?” my mother asked.

“The masters,” the new boy answered. They bowed their heads a little, and the new boy entered our apartment that most people would have wanted to escape.

“She's three years old and often a bad girl,” my mother said.

“I'll be careful with her,” he answered.

“Come here, Wendy,” he said as he lifted me out of the crib. He smelled like the outdoors and leaves on the trees. His skin was very soft and didn't have hair on it. He wasn't an adult yet but he wasn't a child either. His cheeks were smooth, his hands gentle. My body snuggled into his shirt. He carried me walking back and forth in the gray living room. His body didn't jerk or move sharply. My body melted into his bones and flesh. It was the first time I had ever wanted to be held.

“It's okay, Wendy. I will take care of you,” he said.

Maybe he found me before it was too late. Maybe he would let me taste this thing that I didn't have but that I seemed to know about, even have a memory of. I felt my heart shed the plaster and brick walls that I had constructed. Windows opened, spring air entered, wild flowers in blues and greens sprouted inside me. I felt for the first time like a person with arms and legs and a stomach that didn't hurt and a face that could spread out. My body was feeling and singing and not just aching tight. I started crying.

“It's okay, Wendy. Cry if you want.”

The tall boy who came with trust even though he was sent—it was impossible but I felt safe with him even though I didn't know the word yet or have the concept. I wrapped my dangling legs around his thin waist.

When my father and grandfather carried me, I pushed away. Mother never carried me.

The tall boy carried me to the wing chair closer to the kitchen hallway. It had a washed-out blue corduroy cover over the chartreuse silk. Everything in the apartment was colorless except the chartreuse which Mother covered so it wouldn't get dirty. He sat down slowly, holding my back and backside. He pushed his back into the soft chair, leaned back, and let my front fall against him.

“Don't be afraid any more, Wendy. I'll take care of you,” he said.

His chest got large when he breathed in and hollow when he breathed out. I made my breath the same as his. I breathed faster than he did, so I held my breath at the top and the bottom waiting for him. I wondered whether this was what people called heaven, where it was peaceful and calm. I took a finger from my right hand and put it in the middle of one of his curls on his head. I circled it to the right and then the left. His hair felt like silk and the softest cotton. I took a curl and made a moustache on my lip. We both laughed. It felt delicious underneath my nose. My breath naturally slowed to match his and I didn't have to hold it anymore.

Mother paced around the apartment. She watched me as if she were threading a needle. The fire in her smoldered within but did not lash out to burn. A barrier of angels or something kept her from charging in and ruining this too for me. I leaned my right ear onto the center of his heart. I heard his heartbeat, pulse, and breath all at once. My ear sucked in life and hope. I was not alone in a whirlwind. I matched my breath to his, he matched his breath to mine.

I moved my left hand up past the little buttons on his white shirt and reached my thumb into my mouth. I sucked hard while matching my breath to his and feeling his heart beat life into mine. I rode on his breath as if it were God's. It was. For me.

Cool air swam through the walls of the living room windows like love. Swans outside in the waterfall screeched, the sparrows chirped. I sucked away fear and torture. In this nest, my brain began to be silent. I drooled on his shirt.

Now as an adult, trying to sleep or in a crisis, my mind returns to the wing chair; I put my ear on his heart, I feel the up and down of his breath. I surround the scene with pointy pine trees. I sleep. I smile. All else stays away from me. But thinking of him still makes frozen me immediately cry.

Daniel, the tall boy, visited me every day. One day he walked me out our front door, down the basement hall and into the elevator that was in front of the garbage room with the fiery furnace and next to the laundry room. He took my hand, which fit into his palm the way my breath matched his. He pressed the button for three. We got out of the elevator, made a sharp right turn, and rang his doorbell. His mother answered. She had the straightest back, her hair was pulled tight into a bun, and she wore plain, drab clothes. When she smiled, her eyes disappeared into her face. When she looked at me, her face got wet. Daniel took me into his parents' bedroom.

On the dresser in their bedroom, large compared to the other rooms in their apartment, was a small photograph of a little girl, maybe four or almost five. She looked like a nice little girl with dark thick curls, white, white skin, puffy cheeks, and big, round, startled, soft eyes. I couldn't tell the color because the photo was black and white. I would have liked this girl for a friend. She wore a white starched dress, pale ribbons that were probably pink, patent leather shoes, and white anklets with lace. Or the socks may have been pink to match the ribbons. Her eyes were soft. They drew you in through tunnels to different worlds. Worlds of love for her mother and brother, and fear of her father, monsters, demons, life. She wanted to hug her mother and dig her soft head into her chest. She wanted to cling to her brother and fold her body over him. Her patent leather shoes wanted to run and dance and fly. In this family, each child had the mother's good heart. She wanted to go to public school and learn, and then grow up and take the E train to Manhattan where she would work as a secretary. She would have lunch with the other secretaries, who would confide in her. She wouldn't marry a man like her father. She would have children like herself and her brother. She would have added a sweet pea smell to the earth had she lived. Maria, this Maria, this innocent with cheeks like plums, and eyes like blackberries, and lips like slices of peaches. Luscious girl. Miracle.

The word in the neighborhood was that she had died from a virus. Daniel told me they had killed her during a ritual when she turned six years old. His mother cried because I reminded her of her little lost girl. I must have reminded Daniel of her too. Maybe they don't love me for myself, I thought. Maybe they are just lonely for a little girl. Maybe they love me because they have a hole in them.

All summer, Daniel still came to my apartment every day and my mother let me sit on his lap in the armchair and suck my thumb. In the fall, when his school started again, I watched the clock and when the little hand was on the three and the big hand on the ten, I slipped out of the house with my shoes on, went out the main side door, turned right and walked to the corner and stood under the ancient maple tree whose branches bowed down like a willow's and whose samaras spiraled down to the cracked sidewalk. I stayed there, never crossing the street, eyes fixed like a terrier's on the corner down one block and across the street. I was on the corner of 108th Street and Sixty-Eighth Road. I looked to the corner of Sixty-Seventh Road and 108th Street and at five minutes after three, he was there wearing his jacket, carrying his school books, surrounded by boys his own age. When he reached the corner, his eyes looked for me. Our eyes were like sailboats floating toward each other, cementing together, locked. He left his school friends and walked toward my corner. Each day he said, “Did your mother see you leave the house?”

“No,” I said.

“I'll walk you home,” and we walked side by side down the sloping half block, through the side door into the hallway and then the door to my apartment that I had left unlocked. My mother knew I was out but pretended I had never left.

“Hello, Daniel. How about a snack?” she said. In my family, everyone got offered food. Mother took things away from me, everything I wanted, but she was letting me have Daniel. Why? She let me have what would be most valuable and irreplaceable.

Daniel and I sat at the kitchen table or on the love-seat in the foyer eating Dugan's wholewheat muffins with raisins and drinking Walker Gordon milk. Walker Gordon non-homogenized milk had disgusting clumps of cream floating in it but with Daniel everything tasted delicious. I've searched for those wholewheat muffins but never found them again, anywhere. The company must be out of business. I can still taste them. For years as an adult, I ate muffins for almost every meal and never knew consciously why I found them so comforting. Now that I have conscious memory, when I bite into a muffin, I cry.

Daniel sat on the loveseat doing homework and I watched him. I watched him swallow and frown and think. His Adam's apple protruded and then was flat when he swallowed. His writing had heavy curves and he stabbed the paper with his pencils. Then we would sit on the wing chair with our hearts beating, breathing together, and I sucked my thumb.

Without this interlude, I would have been like my twisted family and not remember what happened or what I did or who I was. My brain would have stayed sealed into isolated and barricaded sections.

Our job was to get rid of the body parts. After the rituals, the butchers cut up the sacrifices into small pieces so that children could manage picking them up and throwing them away. It was always the children who scattered them around the neighborhood. At the ritual site, the men cut the bodies up and wrapped them in towels so the blood wouldn't seep out. They moved them to a storage bin in the concealed rooms off the furnace and laundry rooms. Daniel kept his Schwinn bicycle in his apartment on the third floor. He rode down with it in the elevator. My father and I were waiting when the doors opened. My father handed him the body parts that needed to be disposed of. Daniel put them in a basket on his bicycle. Then he and I walked the bicycle up the steep ramp to the sidewalk. Daniel was an expert bicycle rider and had strong arms too. And I was an excellent lookout even at 3 a.m. when we did this task. Sometimes we were out at 2 a.m. if it looked like it would rain early in the morning. He lifted me between him and the handlebars and we were off crossing 108th Street and heading toward the woods. No one was on the street. No buses, cars, pedestrians, police. Just us and the body parts that hadn't yet started to smell. I leaned my head onto Daniel's heart. My ear felt the throb of his heart beating fast. I didn't care what we did. I was safe with him. He would never hurt me. I would do anything for him.

He put the small parts like hands, feet, eyes, and tongues in the trash cans along 108th Street, Cobblestone and Enterprise Avenues. We stayed away from Paradise Boulevard because sometimes there was middle-of-the night traffic on that big road. The larger body parts we put in the woods where other people had dug holes. Later other children would fill the holes with dirt. The children's battalion had to do this chore because no one would suspect children of burying people or their body parts. I didn't care what we did as long as I could rest my head with my ear pressed onto his heart. But he cared. He cried when he pedaled. Tears wet his shirt. He said if we didn't do it, something worse would happen and they would kill me. He said he didn't care if they killed him but he didn't want them to kill me. The choice was always between two evils.

Daniel was so graceful and curvy; he looked a little like a girl. The men used to line up to put their penises in his rectum. I saw it at rituals and he spoke about it.

“He's the sweetest with the softest,” the men said, even my uncles and father. It made him want to die. It didn't just happen every now and then. It was another of his chores. I could keep living because of him, but I wasn't enough for him to keep living. Maybe if the real sister were still alive, that would have been enough for him. But she wasn't, and I wasn't enough.

We lived like this for one year, me walking unnoticed to the corner, my eyes latching onto his, our having milk and wholewheat muffins, wholewheat because my mother cared about nutrition and health, and my breathing with him while I sucked my thumb on the wing chair in the living room. I had a year to heal from the early ravages of not having love. Then he was turning thirteen, the year boys like Daniel were sacrificed. We knew it was coming. Everyone talked about it. It must have been December 1947.

All during that year, his mother did not knit him a sweater. She was a seamstress and made all the clothes for her family, even her husband's. Daniel's slacks always fit perfectly. She kept a dummy and a sewing machine in the corner of her dining room. She often had a tape measure hanging around her neck. Baskets of wool were everywhere in the apartment. A glass jar held a mass of knitting needles, their heads and numbers pointing up proudly.

“The children who are the most loved are put on the altar first,” Mrs. Baker said. “I should not have dressed Maria so well. I will stop knitting him sweaters. I will not put home baked bread and desserts in his lunch bag. I will not touch him in public. Maybe we can fool them and they'll let him live longer,” she said out loud but to herself in her narrow kitchen, while she baked oatmeal cookies with Irish oatmeal. His father scowled.

“We need the money soon,” he said. Mrs. Baker looked at him with hatred. They were poor. They had hardly any furniture and only had a radio. Mr. Baker went to work but didn't get paid much. At night, he drank from bottles with red liquid. She babysat to bring in a little money and pushed a baby carriage up and down Sixty-Eighth Road. Mother said everyone should have posture like Mrs. Baker's. She always looked proud and plain. That's how the breeders of sacrifices looked. Breeders are girls and women who give birth to babies, usually for sacrifice, though sometimes for positions of power within the cult. The babies are sacrificed either right away or later in childhood. You'd think the children to be sacrificed would be mean and angry but they weren't. They were sweet, kind, feeling. For weeks, Daniel had been preparing me. When I sat on his lap sucking my thumb, when he walked me home from school, when we walked down the basement hallway to take out the garbage for my mother.

Walking home from school, he said, “Wendy, you know my turn is coming.” When I sat on his lap, “Wendy, don't cry. You know it is coming. It's why I was born. They say it is an honor and for the good of the community. They sacrificed my sister when she was six. Boys are usually thirteen. I will be thirteen soon. I will be leaving you, Wendy, but I will always be with you, always looking out for you. You are my sister. It is my turn now.”

The last night I saw Daniel, he wore a V-neck medium gray sweater that was not hand knit. We were in the basement hall that led to the laundry room. It was after dinner but not ritual time. Rituals start after midnight. I ran my hands up his sweater and along its long sleeves. I could feel the life in his body underneath the sleeves' machine-made stitches.

“It doesn't pay, Wendy. They'll find me and punish you,” he said.

“I don't care. I stole money from my father's wallet.”

“Yes we can,” I insisted. “Run and hide.”

“You're too little. Wendy, you know the swans outside in the waterfall, how white and pure they are. Grow up to be pure like the swans. Don't be like the rest of the people,” he said.

“You're the only good person in the world, Daniel.” I couldn't bear the thought of Daniel just disappearing, like the petals that fall off the glorious tulips that give beauty to the universe. “I will memorize what happens and tell the world about this ring of rackets. They will know who you are and your name. They will know you as the best person who ever lived. I will write and make your life everlasting.”

“That's a very good idea, but don't bring too much trouble on yourself, Wendy. Just be pure and good, like the swans gliding outside. Grow up to be pure like the swans.”

“Take me with you. Don't leave me here alone.”

“No, Wendy. You have work to do, I don't,” he said. Then he turned around and walked down the dark basement hallway. Halfway down the hall, Daniel turned around and said, “I'll always be with you, Wendy. I love you.”

He turned around again and walked. I was crying too hard and my knees were failing so I could only mouth the words back to him. Tears came from my whole body. Then he walked down that grimy hall, rays of light surrounding him in the damp blackness. He pressed the button for the elevator. It was slow in coming. It was probably on the fifth or sixth floor. The doors opened, and he stepped into the jaws of the elevator, his slender, graceful silhouette moving away from me, bravely going toward his death at thirteen years old. He turned around in the elevator, raised his right arm and opened his right hand as if he were holding my hand, then waved to me as he had waved to me for a year after school. Our eyes locked and his soft mouth formed the words, “I love you.” The elevator door closed with its familiar creak and moan but I could still see him. I saw him walk down the hall to his mother in their corner apartment. His mother would be at the table sobbing. His father would be pacing back and forth with his hands in his pockets, jingling change. His mother would offer him nutritious food, an Irish stew, and even though he would want to please her, he would not be able to eat. He would lie on his bed unable to sleep on his last night on earth. All during the night, our eyes remained locked though separated by three floors and many walls.

I went back into my parents' apartment. My mother was in the foyer. I walked past her. I lay on my bed, stomach down. I did not take my shoes off, even though it wasn't allowed. I did not have the energy to follow her rules. In bed, I formed the words “Daniel David Baker” over and over. I said those words all night every night for a long time. Sometimes I still do. I became old in those moments, when I was four.

My parents came into my bedroom. They must have given me a drug because my body became rigid. They turned me over and sat me up in my bed. My legs and arms were stiff. My father spoon-fed me Campbell's tomato soup. I could eat some of that. My mother wanted me to eat a banana but I couldn't. Then she wanted me to eat American cheese but I couldn't.

When it was time, my father carried me down the basement hallway where last I saw Daniel. I felt as if I could still touch him there. My father carried me into the back rooms, down a shaft into the second lower level under the basement. People were already there. They stood me up naked. My body would not fold or bend. They smeared me with dog or human shit mixed with mud, poured blood over me, put a cape on me. It was ice blue with white fur on the edges. They tied Daniel up. He looked more gaunt than usual and seemed almost unconscious. He must have been drugged. Uncle Sidney held the scepter with my hand over it and his over mine, while my mother masturbated me. I don't think I was being spun, but everything went round and round and I collapsed or fainted as they chanted, led by Uncle Richard: “Hail to the new queen, hail to the new queen of Pleasant Hills, hail to the new queen of the Feast of the Beast, hail to our princess forevermore.”

And then my life was over.

Young healthy blood rushed out. They cut up his body into parts. Daniel was no more. They told me they had to kill him because I loved him.

“Anyone you love will be killed,” the masters said to me again and again. “Anyone you love…”

I thought I had killed the only good person in the world by loving him. The masters and my mother made me believe everything was my fault. Mrs. Baker said her children were born to be killed and that it wasn't my fault. Maybe if I hadn't sucked my thumb so much, I thought. Mr. Baker filled their apartment with furniture and a record player. He carried around a stack of cash in his trouser pocket. Now I understood why Mother had let Daniel be my friend, why they had let me taste love.

He and I have gone through life together, dead and alive, merging worlds where we leave scents, one following the other, always.

They cooked his cut-up body in a large black pot. The pieces swam around like goldfish.

The neighborhood learned that a boy had died from leukemia. His teacher and classmates were very unhappy. I couldn't let Daniel go, so in my mind I decided that I had twelve Daniels in my life. I told everyone I had a dozen brothers but I pronounced dozen “muzen.” Some people understood what I meant. My mother loved my telling people because a few said to her “But you look so young.”

A few days later, I retraced his steps on the bicycle ramp in the building, then stepped onto 68th Road. My heart burst out of my mouth and I collapsed on the sidewalk. A neighbor saw me and called an ambulance. I lifted my arm, the one they used to hold the scepter, against the plastic in the oxygen tent in the hospital and my finger outlined over and over the letters DDB.

Only recently have doctors noted that there are two kinds of heart attacks, mechanical and emotional ones that mimic the physical ones.[1] I had an emotional one that didn't leave physical scars. After they killed Daniel, I could no longer eat. I needed to be with him. My uncles stepped in to get me to eat. They held a gun to my head right there at the left temple and pulled back the lever so that I heard the click. They said “Eat.” A bowl of spaghetti, a food I used to like, was in front of me even though we were all seated in the living room. I couldn't, wouldn't. “If you don't, we will kill you.” I still wouldn't. They sat Marlene on the piano bench and held the gun to the middle of her forehead. “If you don't pick up some of the spaghetti and eat, we will have to kill Marlene,” my uncles said. We could hear Mother groan in the kitchen.

UNCLE SIDNEY: “And it will be your fault.”

UNCLE RICHARD: “You will be killing your sister.”

They didn't let my father talk much any more because he said unnecessary things that confused the programming. Mother always complained of his premature ejaculations. He had premature ejaculations in everything.

I didn't much like my sister and often hated her. I did think that if she weren't around, maybe Mother would love me, but I didn't want her to die, not because of me or anyone. I, or parts in me who were still able to eat, picked up the spaghetti with our fingers. Once I started, it tasted good with the tomato sauce. Uncle Richard called to Mother in the kitchen, “She's eating.” Uncle Sidney put the gun away. “Because you ate, we don't have to kill Marlene. Say thank you to your sister, Marlene,” Uncle Richard said. Marlene said, “I'm not thanking her. We wouldn't have had to go through this scare if she would just eat in the first place.” I was angry at Marlene for not thanking me. They didn't punish her. As an adult, Marlene had a blatant lack of empathy. They must have programmed empathy out of her. That night, in our bedroom, Marlene twisted my arm—more than an Indian burn twist, more like a near-break twist. She said if I told, she would kill me.

At the next ritual I told Uncle Richard what Marlene had done. The reaction, led by my mother, was that I should have eaten and Marlene was right. That night in our bedroom, Marlene twisted my arm harder. She, like everyone, had been taught to be as vicious as possible. The adults were really only unrestrained children doing harm.

Before I was four years old, I had developed a pleasure principle of life. If I could look forward to something, then I could be wrapped up in that delight all day. I could look forward to walking outside when the flowers were out, noticing new cracks in the sidewalk, which made delightful patterns and designs. Any time I was not in physical pain, I rejoiced. Before Daniel died, every moment was rich because I either was with him or felt him with me, or was looking forward to seeing him and smelling him and feeling his breath and his eyelashes. After he died, I could still talk to him and hope to catch a glimpse of Mrs. Baker. I might be able to pet a soft dog or friendly cat. The air had changing hues and was not polluted in the 1940s. Each day, I looked for another color, one I hadn't seen before. Perhaps all the color coding Mrs. Twartski did when I was a newborn made me sensitive to the glories of color. And any day I could have vanilla ice cream or a Mallomar cookie would be a good day.

I enjoyed thinking. When I was almost seven years old, I watched a television show in which the host asked people from all stages of life what was the best part of life. People gave answers like getting a first job, buying a first house, marrying for the first time, having a first child. One person said having sex for the first time. From their wing chair seats, my parents gave similarly silly answers. I knew right away that the best part of life was all the parts, depending on what you made of it. The last person interviewed was eighty-nine years old. The camera showed her stooped over, wrinkled, barely able to walk. She said the same thing as me. I realized then that out of my suffering, some wisdom had grown. I will use this wisdom to outsmart them and survive, I thought, because Daniel wants me to.

There were at least monthly rituals, if not weekly. They continued deep within the basement levels of the apartment building, on its roof, in hidden ritual sites. Many took place at Bear Mountain. Worship of Satan or Lucifer, sacrifices, orgies, and cannibalism were mainstays. The events of these rituals were scripted, carefully planned and organized. Sometimes, however, domestic scenes went wild. Once they gave people permission to harm others, they never knew what would happen.

Scripted scenes

When I was an infant, Mrs. Twartski separated one piece of my mind to be the person who walked the pathways. She put the child-me on a baby scale, tied me down, put a support under my bobbing neck, and spun the scale. With each new rotation, Mrs. Twartski said, “You will do whatever you're told.” Spinning, I passed my families' faces and representations of wild animals, monsters, and devils. I spun until all the faces became one and my family's faces melted into the animal-devil ones. This dizzy infant surrounded by people who didn't rescue her grew into the child who walked the inside and outside pathways in the bitter blackness.

Over sixty years later, the pathways still shiver in my mind. The leaders of my false-Kabbalah-based cult indoctrinated small children by having them walk a dirt path alone, usually in a secluded forest. The path was like an exploding tunnel. I felt alone despite Daniel's telling me he would always be with me, and my being surrounded by people. I never had a family and no longer had a friend, yet at times something insulated me. The pathway earth was filled with electricity, the kind the world made naturally. The earth breathed the way Daniel had breathed. I felt his breath through my feet. The forest with its trees reaching the black sky and breathing soil was not criminal, only people were. The earth molded to my feet. Typical pathway messages were, “You may never escape us,” and “You belong to us”, or “This is your destiny.” “What is learned in the pathways is applied to life,” they taught. By “life” they meant normal life, what all people lead. And I was deliberately given “normal life” experiences that echoed or foretold what the pathways taught.

The foundational pathways, reverse Kabbalah training, 1945–1952

My father lifted me gingerly from my white crib and carried me over his shoulder to the car parked outside the side door. I lay on the back seat in my blanket sucking my thumb hard. My sister sat in the front seat between my parents. My mother and sister wore sneakers instead of their usual dressy shoes. My father wore his everyday leather shoes. He drove slowly and carefully. He wasn't speaking and didn't call any other driver an ignoramus as he often did. It was as if he were trying to be invisible. When we reached a highway the car went faster. Behind us was a car with my grandmother and grandfather, another with Aunt Eileen and Uncle Sidney, and another with Aunt Mimi and Uncle Richard. My cousins had not been born yet.

In the middle of the night, we arrived at Bear Mountain, where bears lived. My father had a hand-drawn map that I could see from the back seat, and he searched for a certain section that had been prepared for us. He had one hand on the steering wheel and one hand holding the map to his side. He went up and down and back and forth along the dark dirt roads with the relatives following his car until he found it. People high up in the trees flashed lights that led him to where he needed to park. Other cars were hidden in the bushes. The ritual had to be on this night because a particular ranger was on duty then. I had heard my parents say that he got this job to protect us but he had really wanted to live in the Midwest where it is quieter than in New York. Rangers like solitude.

Before they took me out of the car, someone put a cloth over my nose. Now that I was drugged, the world seemed to fold in on itself. The dirt was soft and moist. The trees had survived storms. People sprayed insect repellants on their skins. Others with flashlights looked for snakes.

Darkness hid our people stationed among high wires in the tall branches of the trees. Stars dotted the dense sky. The set-up crew made catcalls to one another.

I could just manage walking on the gray carpet in our living room. Uncle Richard in a hooded robe told me to walk along the rocky dirt path where wild animals lived. When I lost my balance and began to crawl, voices behind the trees said, “Bad, bad, get up, get up.” Eerie sounds rang in the dark, and there was no one to love me. I wanted to be home, inside. I didn't want to be eaten by a bear and I didn't like the hooting and howling. I didn't know where my father was, the only person who might give me a little protection. At the end of each path was a symbol on a tarot card and a Hebrew letter printed on sheer material that waved in the wind. People's cheering pushed me forward until I finished the walk.

The most intense loneliness I have known has been on these pathways. Even people cheering and chanting at me could not make a dent in the feeling of being hopelessly alone.

After I had already walked several pathways, Wiezenslowski (who was Grandpa Max, though I didn't know it yet) and Mrs. Twartski worked on me in a programming room underneath the Pleasant Hills apartment building.

WIEZENSLOWSKI: “A person is no stronger than her weakest part. Bring out the split we didn't use because it was too weak.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall, Humpty Dumpty had a great fall. All the king's horses and all the king's men couldn't put Humpty Dumpty back together again. Come out Baby Jane.”

Grandpa Max pressed his thumb between Baby Jane's eyes.

“You will be our pathways' queen. You can cry but you must finish. It is your destiny. Your mother wants Marlene to be our queen but we will not permit that. It is your destiny according to the prophecy. But you must complete the prophecy.” Then he said to Mrs. Twartski: “We'll test her on the next pathway.”

I had to wear a crown, which kept falling off. Baby Jane cried but finished. I had known they put the snakes on the ground. But I also knew they wouldn't go through all this trouble training me if they were going to have a snake bite me to death. The snakes were hapless beings like me. I thought it would be good to have these non-lethal creatures as my friends. I liked snakes better than I liked people.

Another pathway with candles along its edges happened soon afterward. I had to go through two doors with my crown on. I was too faint to walk. I crawled as crowds chanted, “This is your destiny. Praise to Lucifer our Savior, Lucifer our guardian. We give you the next queen. Hail to the King Lucifer, hail to the god almighty. Hail to his son Satan, hail to the trinity.” The crowd's cheering was seductive and I was caught in grandiosity for the moment. Grandpa Max rubbed his semen over me. Now I could be queen, though I had no idea what that meant. My father talked about how the bloodline came from this grandpa, my mother's father, and this grandpa was always rubbing his semen on me at the end as an anointment. Then Joseph and Grandpa led the procession to the altar. Uncle Sidney lifted me up beside the altar. Joseph held my hand over a sword and stabbed as the chanting roared. I went so far away from my body that I'm not sure I ever fully came back. It was my first killing. Blood spurted. The body was so soft. The sword went in as if the baby were cottage cheese. They had little cups that they passed around and everyone drank blood. I felt as if I had entered a new world, and that everyone hated me. I didn't trust anyone and thought that no one trusted me. My mother and sister called me murderer, but when they used that word, I didn't yet know what it meant.

When we got home and I was back in my crib, the bumper guard spun around. I was sure I was going to be killed at any moment. When my father put me in the crib, he said he was proud of me. Mrs. Twartski had said she was proud of me. I was a murderer.

I witnessed my cousins walking the pathways at Bear Mountain and I became one of the people in the bushes jumping out and scaring them. I should have been relieved to be on the other side of it, but that first split in me took over, the delicate Baby Jane, and I cried. My father put me in the car so I didn't see the whole miserable walk, ending in the customary sexual assault. The trainings had the same themes: You won't escape. You belong here.

Grandmother's noodles and the monster, 1946

The family was at Grandmother's lavish table filled with homemade-from-scratch foods. My grandfather placed me in a booster seat with my back to the kitchen. A thick phone book was under my seat so that I was higher up. My father sat at one end, my grandfather nearer the kitchen, Marlene and Mother by the window. Everyone seemed especially happy, and I watched with interested caution. Even happy moments could turn in a second in my family.

My grandmother never sat down to eat. In her apron with the big butterfly bow, she went back and forth in her kitchen stirring, opening and closing doors, dishing out. Grandpa had just finished his plate of hot food. I was two years old.

GRANDFATHER: “Rosie, don't you have to do something? Get something?”

GRANDMOTHER: “Just a minute, Max, I'm in the middle of something.”

GRANDFATHER: “First things first.”

GRANDMOTHER: “I can't do everything at once.”

MOTHER: “The strudel's delicious.”

Father wanted a third piece.

My grandmother, in animated spirits, left the dining area for a moment and returned from the bathroom holding one of Grandpa's single-edged razors. Holding up the blade, she said, “I'm going to make noodles, but first I have to cut the dough in half,” and rushed to my booster seat. She still had her floral apron on. She made a line down the center, a deep cut in my scalp. “I'm making a half and half cookie. This half is bad, this half is good.” Grandma cut lines horizontally then vertically on my scalp just as if she were making her broad noodles from scratch on her worn wooden board that she brought over on the boat from Belarus. My scalp stung, and blood dripped onto the towel on my shoulders. My grandfather and father sat as if nothing had happened. My mother and sister stood up and clung to each other as if they, rather than me, needed comforting. I hadn't spilled or thrown anything, said “No”, or thought anything bad. My torso fell forward onto the table. One arm was outstretched and the other descended in slow motion on top of it. Hopelessness sealed me in this sorrowful position as I watched the kitchen walls crash into me.

My grandfather came over to my scalp, pressed on the squares on the left side one by one, and said, “You, and you, and you belong to me forever and ever. Whatever I tell you, you will have to do. I'm going to give you each a letter and a number, and when I call you by those, you will have to do it.”

On the other side of my head, he used the squares to put in functions so that it appeared as if I behaved well, such as “You will smile when people talk to you,” “You will say ‘thank you’,” and “You will curtsey”. The distractors and reporters are also in the “good” part of the head.

That night, we did another pathway. As usual, I had to walk down the dirt pathway alone. It was cold and rocky but I was able to balance a bit better now that I was over two years old. They brought me a hand mirror. I looked in the mirror and saw that I had no hair, because my grandmother had cut up my scalp. They all chanted: “Monster, Monster, decrepit you, Monster, Monster, no one would choose you, Monster, Monster, into the fire with you.” They said I was born a monster, would always be a monster, and that they were going to sell me because I was no good. I thought, but monsters have a lot of hair. I felt ugly and it was a world where prettiness was everything. I was no good and would be sold to bad people because I was bad. I wanted to die. I didn't have a place on earth.

In the middle of the line my grandmother had carved that separated the bad and good parts of my brain (both parts mind controlled to belong to evil)—right there in the middle, my grandfather placed a representation of the Angel of Mercy. This angel was to lead me into suicide. The angel was slinky, squished, but it could grow enormous.

My grandfather, grandmother, and Mrs. Twartski tied me on a hard chair in my grandparents' second bedroom. The lights grew dim as Mrs. Twartski fed me teaspoons of a brown syrup, and my grandmother injected my scalp. My grandfather showed me a picture the size of a tarot card of this beautiful Angel of Mercy dressed in a pale blue robe. As I looked at the picture, my grandfather talked to the angel. “Your assignment is to follow this child all over. I'm placing you in her mind, right in the middle where Rosie made the cut. And you will be perched and nestled there until she dies, Angel of Mercy…” All the fight in me was gone, and I had sharp pains in my eye. Alison said it was from the syrup, and that they probably get this effect with pills or injections in modern day programming sessions.

Grandpa started his projector. He put the picture of the angel in front of it. The projector made the image of the angel go from small to huge on the wall. Grandpa said, “If the bad side and good side of your head talk to each other or weave together, then you and the Angel of Mercy will be one.” The angel travelled up to the ceiling, around me, over me, finally landing in the center of the wall. He projected an image of me onto the one of the Angel.

Mrs. Twartski kept giving me teaspoons of brown syrup, and Grandpa said, “You have people who do very bad things, and people who do very good things. And the two will never meet, and never know about each other. The bad side is very bad and nobody should know about the bad side, or they will never like you and never accept you as part of the world.”

Normal and pathway life

During these early years, there were also moments of peace, rare like spring days in January and snow in April. We four were strolling. My father and mother were arm in arm. The apartment was clean but Mother was not exhausted. Marlene and I were in the row behind. Marlene did not have to be Mother's confidante or I, Father's wife. We wore mother and daughter outfits that Mother had designed and Father wore a tie made out of the same green and white checkered material. The family walked over the cherry blossom petals spilled on the sidewalk. The hills and breeze were comforting and exciting. Lilac bushes created a cocoon. Marlene and I held hands, swung arms, and giggled until we were sore. The parents looked over their shoulders and smiled from their inside. My mother smiled at me as well as her, and my father smiled at Marlene as well as me. They were glad we were theirs. The earth, sky, air radiated warmth, fragrance. Tulips, red and yellow, tall and proud sprouted. We smelled them until we became intoxicated. Each pansy had a dreamy face and eyes, a soft soul. We crossed the street. Father bought two chocolate coated and two toasted coconut ice cream bars from the Good Humor truck singing our song. I could have eaten ten of these. The cold sweetness slid down to my hunger.

“We had our moments,” Mother said to me right before she died. We had moments.

My family's ancient cult had been training children on pathways and combining scripted, known life with secret rituals for many centuries. The mind controllers anchored the pathways teaching in scripted scenes of family life that family members played like actors. The only person who didn't have a memorized role was the child victim. The scripted scene staged a family conflict and an assault on the child's self-esteem. Then the pathway training threatened the child into submission and rendered the child loyal to the criminal group. The leaders made a point of not sharing this information with Mengele.

The pathways training took up a small percentage of my life. I had one or two pathway treks per year, and perhaps one or two programming sessions a month. The programming not to stand out or succeed in everyday life continued, and affected all areas of my regular life. Most of my life was spent in “normalcy,” going to school, with my mother shopping for clothes and food, going to Manhattan three times a week for ballet, speech, and art lessons, plus having weekly piano lessons in my home until Mr. Brown fired me for not practicing. How could I practice when I wasn't allowed to succeed in the normal world? I had to look bored and lazy during ballet lessons because the Russian master teachers came to Mr. Yanvinsky's studio and spotted me. I was double jointed and had high extensions. In normal life, our theater-mother couldn't be stopped from being ambitious artistically for her daughters. Mother, who had talent, must have been madly frustrated.

Pathways trainings resonated all my life. The experiences captured some of my soul. What they didn't capture, they scratched. I remembered few normal life setups for pathways until I began to delve into my inner world in the early 1980s, shortly after my mother died.

Four hundred dollars, 1949

When I was in my twenties, living in Pittsburgh, I put my toddler in the stroller and walked him to the Arts & Crafts Center, which had an exhibit of Marcarelli's paintings. This artist cut or ripped unprimed canvas into strips and pasted the raw lengths on other canvas. When I saw his work, I froze.

Strips of canvas. More strips of canvas. Strips of uneven widths. Pleasant Hills. Gray living room. My mother's portrait in oils. With these spurts of narrative, a living room scene charged out from my stunned mind.

For three days and three nights before it happened, she lay motionless in her bed like the center sardine in a can. Then, as I watched from the hall doorway, she emerged ponderously, a sleepwalker. In the portrait, she wore her diamond ring, pearl choker, and a blue satin gown. Only its scooped bodice showed. She smiled with perfect teeth. She appeared American enough to be a first lady but looked too alive. In the oil painting with an ornate gold frame, Mother had thick, dark, wavy hair; the painter made a big deal about how white her skin was. She looked proud of her beauty and like she wanted sex. The perfect blue tint of her enormous ring glowed.

The knife. I don't know whether she had the knife in her bedroom the whole time or whether she had detoured into the kitchen. It had a black handle. I watched from the door-way. Strips of canvas, flying curlicues attached to the wall. They looked cheerful, like my doll's hair, the flickering of sunlight dancing on the wall. Her nose that she would later have fixed and that we weren't allowed to touch gone, her high forehead, creamy breasts. Only her hand with the ring remained intact.

More memory dragged across my brain. My sister and I were in bed. I was in a deep sleep the way I slept as a child when I did not have one of my frequent migraines. My sister shook me. It must have been the middle of the night or at least around midnight.

“Wendy, get up,” my sister said. She took my hand and led me to the doorway in the hall that contained the long sliding door closet. Marlene, who was much taller than I, stood in front of me near the foyer. We all wore pajamas except for Father who just wore boxer shorts. My father was already in the foyer; my mother in front of her recently hung portrait held two kitchen knives, one in each hand. Mother's eyes were fixed and wild. Whoever was out in her was not one of Mother's usual parts. Bambi, our miniature Doberman, must have been hiding.

“Watch,” Marlene said. My father smiled slightly. I yawned since I was still asleep on my feet, but noticed my father nod to my mother who was holding knives. My father told Marlene to go back to her bed, but I stayed glued in the doorway.

My mother screamed and started slashing her portrait. The strips flew away from the canvas backing and curled at the bottom. They looked like a blossoming flower in papier mache. Mother screamed as she shredded. “I'm not happy, I'm not happy,” she sang to the knife sounds. Pulp left my heart. She glanced at me. “It's your fault. Why is she standing there always in the way? Why can't she be good like Marlene?” Marlene colored much better than I, chose better colors, and stayed within the lines of our coloring books. But I didn't want to be like her. She was a show-off.

And then Mother threw the knife at me. I ducked and the knife went into the material-covered sliding closet door behind me. With her other hand, she threw the knife at Bambi, who was under a side table. He was whimpering and bleeding by the side table in the living room near the planter room divider. Bambi had a knife in his stomach. Blood spread like my fear. I rushed back into my bedroom and dove under my bed. My heart felt like skin rubbed raw.

Decades later, when I asked my father about it, all he said was that the portrait had cost four hundred dollars.

My sister was safe in bed. I was under my bed and Mother poked the knife trying to reach me. I kept sliding away from her. My father's hand pulled the knife away. He was barely stronger than she at that moment. Finally, my father shouted “Cynthia, Cynthia,” which stopped her, and he was able to pull her out of the bedroom. My mother must have been trained as a witch to have had such excellent aim.

The penultimate part of the memory that I associated was my sister waking me up and leading me to the doorway. The last piece that I brought into the memory was my smiling father watching my mother slash. My mother should really have been on the stage. The handlers didn't create a personality in me to watch this scene unfold. They took whoever spontaneously came forward. My controller called that same person out to do the pathway walk that night.

It was hard for me to accept this memory and that my parents would act in such a drama. In the 80s, when my first memories shoved out and before I had the memory of my mother's slashing, when I was creating and exhibiting visual art in New York City, I reproduced the hallway wallpaper, put a knife in it and a representation of a small child huddled on the floor. The knife had just missed.

I wondered what had happened to Bambi's body. My father said he wrapped him in a towel and carried him out. I wondered whether he threw him down the fiery furnace. He wouldn't have taken him to a vet. I had never felt close to Bambi, but I hated to see him violently killed and was aware it should have been me, according to my mother's intent or at least the script.

That night, there was a pathway at Bear Mountain. Its goal, like that of the other pathways, was to terrify me and make me feel that within the criminal cult group was the only place I would be safe. Mrs. Twartski said, “We want to talk to the person who saw her mother throw the knife,” and that part of me emerged from pools of terror. Towards the pathway's end, the ground was covered with the same strips of canvas that my mother had slashed with her knives. On the altar was Bambi with the knife still in his stomach. A chorus of people chanted, “You killed him.” The other half chanted, “It should have been you. It was meant to be you.” All together, they sang “You are always in the way,” and “Marlene is better than you.” Wiezenslowski held up my arm—the left one—with a sword in it.

Contradicting themselves, at the end of the pathway, people chanted “Queen Philomena, Queen Philomena” over and over. “Here you are wanted, here you are something, here you will rule for ever more.”

Pressing his thumb on the back of my neck, Grandpa Max said, “Only here will you be accepted, with us. All else is ashes and shreds.” He held up the tarot card pictures of the skeleton riding a donkey and the queen on the throne holding the scepter and globe.

Someone in a devil suit danced around, opened its mouth wide and put my head in the mask's mouth, then raped me. “You will never escape us. You belong only to us. You belong to Lucifer.” There were more pictures of a field of daisies, a mountaintop and a hanged man upside down, then the letter ayin.

The morning I remembered this part of the pathway, I awoke in hollow fear with the image of Bambi on the altar and the strips of canvas on the ground.

During the pathway, Baby Jane fainted and stronger parts stepped forward. Grandpa Max was probably wrong, how strong one is does not depend on one's weakest parts.

Later I remembered another scene from the day after the pathway: My parents had a big party. Noisy people filled the whole gray apartment. Cheeses and crackers were everywhere, and my grandmother had brought platters of interesting concoctions that grown-ups like. My mother cooked little cocktail franks, which I liked but wasn't allowed to eat until after the company arrived. My father sliced salamis paper-thin. Everyone drank hard liquor. On the carpet where there had been Bambi's blood was a patch scrubbed almost white, which served as his memorial monument.

Even though I was the only child in this crowd and I hardly knew anyone at the party, the party was ostensibly to celebrate my sixth birthday. My sister was present, but she was so mature that she didn't like playing with me anymore. Some people brought me presents. One woman gave me a red and white checked blouse. My mother thought both red and white were becoming with my dark skin. I was sure I had said thank you. I don't remember the other presents. What was not traumatic washed away. Trauma sticks through a lifetime.

Around midnight, when everyone had left, Mother came into my bedroom. I had a walk-in closet in my bedroom and I stood in front of it. She hit me over and over with the red and white checkered blouse. It resembled the waves at Jones Beach undulating, rising, and falling. “You didn't say thank you,” she screamed. “I did, I did too,” I answered.

Then she said, “You killed Bambi.” The rotating axis of the apartment froze. My father shouted “Cynthia!” and pulled her away. My parents disappeared into the remains of my birthday party.

The next day, the Council was in the living room sitting on the two curved half sofas and wing chairs. The apartment was clean and neat again.

My parents or father must have stayed awake cleaning. I was not invited but my sister and I eavesdropped. Grandpa Max wearing his Wiezenslowski mask, Joseph, Mrs. Twartski, and my parents attended.

“Cynthia, I had to fly here from the west coast, which was very inconvenient. You have broken a cardinal rule. You are not allowed to refer to a pathway event in your other life. The pathways are holy, secret events. Yours is a grave offence,” Grandpa said. I could feel the others nod their heads. Mother was in trouble. And I hadn't killed Bambi, she had!

“We will have to do double programming on Wendy to prevent consciousness. That will cost in time and money.” What about me? I thought. That meant more drugs, electricity and spinning for me—torture.

“We have a family in Salt Lake City that is willing to take her or you in. We could say you have an illness, which is true, and need convalescence. If anything like this happens again, one of you will go and it will probably be you. That means you would not be with Marlene. Marlene would stay here under Morris' care. In the meantime, Morris will take you to Dr. Brown tomorrow. You will remain on sedatives. Morris, you must make sure she takes them every day. Cynthia, you have crossed a serious line. We never refer to a pathway in mundane life. No one in our community will speak to you for ten days.” Then the front door closed, and Marlene and I believed everyone had left.

Mother screamed wildly at Father. “You told them, how could you! You're trying to get rid of me.” Then the pounding that we recognized as Mother's fists on Dad's chest began. Marlene and I went to our room and sat on the floor between the beds with a blanket over our heads.

In the 1980s, I watched the movie Bambi with one of my bad boyfriends. After Bambi's mother was shot, I began to cry uncontrollably. One of those long New York City lines that went around the block was in front of the theater when we exited. A woman in the line saw me sobbing and asked what movie I had just seen. I ignored her, but the boyfriend gratuitously answered Bambi. The gawking busybody repeated Bambi in disbelief, turned to the person behind her and said, “She saw Bambi.” This information traveled quickly down the line. My suffering became comedy. I had as yet no memory of the tragedy with Bambi.

Marlene kept doing her English homework, but I left our side bedroom window from where I could see the waterfall, swans and geese and rushed out to greet Father at the front door. Daddy sniffed and his neck and nose stretched almost to the ceiling. I could tell he was relieved to smell food cooking. If meat were cooking, he wouldn't be angry and then there wouldn't be fights. Mother was in the kitchen broiling a sirloin steak, warming up peas from a can, and baking potatoes in a potato baker on top of the stove.

He hung up his overcoat and hat in the hall closet and said, “Get your mother. I have a surprise…. Cynthia,” he called. I wondered why he told me to get her if he was going to call her himself. He unwrapped a package from the furrier and took out a sleek white fur collar. Its smoothed out white hair all over reminded me of Slinky, the cat on our block.

“It looks alive,” I said. The fur collar was the gift for Marlene becoming a grownup. They had been talking about it all week. She was thirteen but already had birthday presents that took her up to her twentieth year. Anything to keep Mother from going deeper into one of her moods. My special things were hand-me-downs.

“It is stunning. Oh, I love it, Morris,” Mother said. “It will look beautiful on Marlene. Perfect for a girl becoming a woman.”

Mother cooked in her apron over her housedress. She was slim and petite with dyed red hair and amber eyes that shifted colors with her feelings. Mostly Mother was sad. She was around thirty-five now, and Dad was older. She was unhappy about getting older because she thought that looks were everything.

Marlene came out of the bedroom slowly, wearing an ironed paisley dress and black polished shoes. Her long brown hair was braided and pinned in a pile to the top of her head. Mother spent a lot of time on Marlene's hair. My sister had rosy cheeks, what my mother called a “Greek nose” and a sculptured chin. She reminded me of Queen Elizabeth.

Mother took the ermine collar, put it around Marlene's neck, and joined the hook and eye together. No one watched me watching.

“Ouch, it's hurting me. It's pressing on my throat,” my sister screamed.

“Oh, no, Morris, it's too tight for her. You brought too small a collar home,” Mother said. She was angry. “How could you do that?”

“Well, try it on Wendy. It should fit her,” he answered. I knew that oily tone in Daddy's voice. He used it when he was trying to trick someone.

Mother handed the white collar back to Daddy and looked away. He hooked it around my neck.

My heart was pounding as I imagined myself a Hollywood star in a fur coat or one of the glamorous women in Mother's magazines.

“There, it fits her fine,” Daddy said.

“It does look good. It's becoming with her round face and it gives her a lighter look,” Mother said.

That compliment may have been the first I ever had from Mother. I could always read disappointment in her eyes. Once, after I had had my own ordinary-life child, I tested her. I asked “With you so beautiful and Daddy so handsome, shouldn't you have had a prettier daughter?” She smiled at me as if someone finally understood her. I wanted to rip her dyed red hair out then.

I rushed to the mirror in the hall closet with my collar on, sucked in my cheeks, lifted and pushed forward my right hip and shoulder. Daddy looked happy and Mother smiled a little. If I could be prettier, then Mommy could be happier. And maybe even love me.

I had thought my father was relieved to have done something nice for me. He knew Mother ignored me.

“That's a size four. I'll bring you a size seven tomorrow, Marlene,” he said. My older sister's soft brown eyes narrowed into steel. Her self-satisfied expression changed into cold hatred and envy.

“You promised. You promised me the ermine collar for my thirteenth birthday,” my sister pleaded. “I will not wear the same thing as a nine year old. I'm not a child. I have to have better things than she has, not the same. I'm older. Mine has to be special. I'm thirteen. If she wears one, mine won't be special.”

Marlene was holding herself back from hitting me in the face. And I wanted to lunge forward and put deep scratches on her cheeks and leave scars.

“You're acting ridiculous, Marlene. Her having the same collar doesn't take anything away from you. I'll bring you the right size tomorrow,” Father said.

“You promised me,” Marlene screamed, as she left the room and slammed our bedroom door. Daddy let out a breath that said he was the only reasonable and just person in the house.

“I can see her point, Morris. It's humiliating to wear the same thing as your younger sister, and we did promise her,” Mother said.

The wind roared outside. The water was restless. The ducks swam zigzag, the swans in circles. My chest swelled.

I will hate Mother and Marlene forever, I said to myself silently and meant it. I felt myself sliding out of my body, going to the window, and watching the waterfall. The bushes sprouted red and yellow berries. Rust and orange leaves floated down the falls. My father's voice startled me back into myself.

“I'll bring an ermine collar in a larger size tomorrow. I'll bring a different kind of collar in a size four for Wendy,” he said.

Mother's angry mouth smiled. Marlene's smug look came back on her face, and her chin went up again. I returned to my station at the smaller of the two bedroom windows and looked out into the courtyard. I stared at the swans shrieking and the ducks moving their wings. One swan was particularly loud. It was getting dark. The birds made large shadows on the water. The wind was blowing. The swans circled. The ducks rested on the shore. The moon was out. Then my chest filled again with hatred as Mother called us in for dinner.

It must have taken consistent planning to script regular life so that it backed up cult programming. We all drove to Bear Mountain in the middle of the night after Father brought home the ermine collar. Mother and Marlene got out of the front seat and Father said to Mother, “I'll get her. Go ahead.” They went into the woods. “Listen to me,” Father said. “Don't go with the man, don't listen to what anybody says, and you can fight back if you want.”

I was angry about the ermine collar and angry that I had to do another pathway barefoot and in my pajamas, even though I was nine years old. The pathway training was supposed to be just for small children.

Lookouts and temporary lights were in the trees; members hid in the bushes. As I walked down the path, a tall, thick black robed figure came towards me and said, “Follow me into death.” I said “No” and the people in the bushes cheered. I had passed the first test. I thought these pathways were getting more and more concrete. “If you follow me, you can have this,” he said. I kept walking straight ahead, about a quarter to a half mile. It was chilly on the mountaintop. My mother came onto the pathway. I was surprised to see her. She said, “If you follow him, I'll love you more than I love Marlene.” I spit in her face and thought this pathway was getting to be fun. My mother would love me more the day I became a blond with blue eyes or maybe a boy. My father came toward me from the front. “Wendy, I just lost all my money in the fur market. If you follow that figure, I'll get my money back.” I walked around him feeling guilty. I knew they were playing and testing me, but I felt sorry for my father because he had gambled away all his money and all the family's money that he invested for everyone, and that had ruined Mother's popularity in the family. My father had saved my life many times. I walked through a screen and there was a card. Someone shone a flash-light on a picture of the beautiful angel in blue with wings and a crown and another Hebrew letter, I think this one was lamed, then an ugly picture of a skull and crossbones. Mrs. Twartski came forward holding a mirror. “Follow the angel and you can be pretty.” The girl who had tried to kill my mother spat in her face and attempted to kick her. I had overcome these temptations, because of my father's advice.

The next night I had no memory of the pathway temptations. Dad brought home a sleek white ermine collar in a size seven for Marlene, and a round brown mink collar for me. Marlene put on the ermine collar, which made her look like a princess. She wore it for three days straight and then forgot about it. Everyone said the mink collar was beautiful, but I didn't want it. “I don't like the brown,” I said. “I don't want to wear the brown one.”

My fingertips and nails ached. Sometimes even my toenails felt the rage. I so wanted to scratch my sister and parents. I went back to my bedroom and looked out the window. The water was frozen, thick and green. Cracks were around the edges. The ice looked like a giant jigsaw puzzle.

I remembered the ermine collar scene but never knew it was scripted and a setup for a pathway. I realized that only last year.

In the 1980s, when I was in New York City, I choreographed a dance about a tall hooded and robed figure tempting a little girl. The death-robed figure strolled on the stage. Someone in the wings unrolled satin material onto the stage. An anorexic dancer wearing a child's blue flannel pajamas with a white ruffle across the chest moved on the satin material that resembled a pathway. I found the actor for the part of the tall robed figure on the street. He looked like my ex-husband. He turned out to be a theater student and accepted the role. The tall dark figure tried luring her into death several times and she resisted. When I choreographed this piece, I had no conscious memory of the pathway temptations.

The Rosenbergs, 1951

My father brought home one of the first televisions that he got probably from one of his clients or perhaps he stole it. A stranger and my father carried the bulky console in past the heavy front door, down the long hall where my parents each had a large closet, and through the foyer that we used as a dining room. The man wearing a cap and my father turned the corner and with difficulty put the television between the two curved sofas, where a small table had been, and opposite two winged chairs centered against the wall, where my parents usually sat. My sister and I sat on the gray-carpeted floor. My mother liked pale gray. The carpet and walls were seamless, hushed. The emotions, fights, stinging voices, aromas of food added the color to the living room. Our family's ordinary life was monotonous, with eruptions interrupting the numbness of childhood, the intensity of boredom.

The television screen was bare, not covered by doors. It stood about three and a half feet high and about two feet wide. When it entered our tiny apartment, the world came in too. We watched television shows in which families listened to one another and didn't pretend that what happened didn't happen. People were not objects for use.

My father reached into his pocket and flicked bills. He caressed each one as if he were in love with money, then slipped the mystery man a pile. The stranger left and my father plugged in the television, raised the antenna, and started fiddling with knobs on its back. First there were dots on the screen, then horizontal, then diagonal lines. It reminded me of people rushing along the streets of the city. An urgent-sounding male voice was coming through the helter-skelter designs. My mother, sister, and I shouted “now” as soon as the picture came into focus. Faces, bodies, scenes emerged from green-tinted, black and white patterns. It was like a radio with live pictures, like having the Atlantis movie theater in the living room. Sometimes Father didn't stop turning the knobs just as we shouted “now” and we lost the picture. Then he would reverse the motion and the people would come back into view. It was magic.

On the front, the TV case said “Hoffman”. I thought at first that the name referred to my family or perhaps my Uncle Arnold who was an inventor. I asked my father whether we had the TV engraved with our name, but he said it was a coincidence and that Hoffman was the name of the company that made it.

Television created a happy time for my family. Every Saturday night, we watched Your Show of Shows. Imogene Coca was just like my mother, crazy and funny, and Sid Caesar was like my father, baffled and obstinate. We laughed as a family. Suddenly, my parents' personalities weren't just peculiar. They were universal. Stars had the same idiosyncrasies, and they were famous for them. My parents took on a Hollywood sheen. And nothing bad happened while we watched Your Show of Shows.

A while later, when the family was hypnotized in front of the television, maybe during the evening news or maybe there was a special news show, an outline of a face popped out. The accused spy, Ethel Rosenberg, came into view. She was in a drawing of a courtroom on television. I had seen photos of her in the newspapers. Now there were newsreels on the evening news. She wore a dress that my mother said flattered her. Her face was like a risen moon, pale white but also material, physical. She also looked like a housewife: a moon-housewife. The television cameras panned on a photograph of the judge, a thin man in a black cloak, a gavel in his hand. The announcer said his name was Judge Irving R. Kaufman. He frowned. His mouth went way down and his ears flared out and looked like they were about to fly away. He was looking down his nose at everyone. I would not have wanted him to resolve an argument between my sister and me. The screen went back to Ethel's face. Her eyes were like little bungalows and behind the eyes, I could see her soul flittering down into her body and coming up occasionally for air. Her eyebrows rose in defiance. She could have been one of our gang when we were called into dinner and didn't want to stop playing outside. On March 6, 1951, she was thirty-seven, about the same age as my parents. The television left the courtroom and showed an interview with her that they had done months before. She appeared in what looked like an east side tenement apartment then, held a butcher's knife and chopped a raw chicken into parts that she would cook for her husband, Julius, and their two sons, Michael who was almost exactly my age, eight, and his three-year-old brother, Robert. That's very young to be away from your home and parents. The walls behind Ethel were streaked with grease.

Why didn't she clean her kitchen before letting the television cameras in? Mother went wild with cleaning before company came. I wondered who advised her. She seemed disorganized, like Mother.

One night, after dinner, we watched again and the television announcer said the lawyer pounded her with questions, the way my father cross-examined me when I had done something wrong and not admitted it, which I did often, sometimes for spite. My father questioned well, trying to get you to admit. This Judge Kaufman asked about the atomic bomb. The judge asked Ethel if she was a Communist. And about typing. He wanted to know if she typed for her brother. Mother said her brother betrayed her. He saved himself by sacrificing her. I looked at my sister with suspicion. She would do that too.

Another night they talked about a Jello box cut in a curved line. I couldn't believe grown people were talking about Jello boxes on TV in a courtroom. My mother and I had just gone to Foodland grocery store on Paradise Boulevard. They had a promotion on Jello. If you bought twenty boxes, you got a paper house you could put together. I loved to put things together. I thought my mother would never buy so many boxes all at once, even though we ate several boxes each week. But she did. She bought twenty boxes of orange and strawberry. Every now and then, my mother wanted to give me everything. It didn't happen often but when it did, the skies opened and stars fell on me. I thought, “Now she loves me” and I felt mellow and peaceful. I supposed other children felt this way. Soon, however, she beat me again just for being around. The television talked about fitting pieces of the box top together. Why would grownups fit a box top together? The mean lawyer asked Julius about a box of raspberry Jello and an atomic bomb. I didn't know what an atomic bomb was. Perhaps it was like a rifle. I asked my sister, who was twelve. “You drop it and it wipes out the whole world, all of us too,” she said, “in one fell swoop. Russia wants to do that to us.” I believed my sister because in school, we had to squeeze ourselves under our desks to practice hiding in case the Russians attacked. We had to curl ourselves up really tight so the Russians didn't kill us right there in our school and blow us all to smithereens. But when you curled yourself into a ball, your shoes touched your dress and smudged it. Mother didn't like having to wash my dress again. The television announcer kept using the word “espionage”. I didn't know what that word meant but it sounded as if someone had to use the bathroom. I wanted to ask what “adjourned” meant but both my parents were too absorbed to be interrupted.

They showed more pictures and drawings of Julius and kept using the word Communism. Maybe that meant a neighborhood all together having a party. Julius kept saying, “I refuse to answer on the grounds it might incriminate me”. “Incriminate” sounds like “criminal”. Maybe they were criminals. Maybe I was a criminal. My mother said if they wouldn't answer, they were guilty. Father said everyone was Jewish, the judge, lawyers, accused. He said the world had them in a hole that was like a pit bull fight with a gentile jury watching.

They showed pictures of Ethel's eyes wandering. Mother said she was searching for Julius. Ethel did not answer. A wall between her and the world existed, but she yearned for her husband. Mother said she was a woman in love. Photographs in the newspapers showed Julius kissing Ethel in an endless kiss; they fused into each other. Julius kissed Ethel the way Mother always wanted to be kissed. Mother seemed jealous of Ethel even though Ethel was going to be electrocuted. Electrocuted, that means having electricity run through your veins and kill you. I knew all about electricity but it hadn't killed me yet. But it had ruined DeeDee's mind. And Mother's mind. And Marlene's nipples. I didn't remember any of that while watching television with my family. I wouldn't remember until the turn of the century. In the photograph, Julius and Ethel grasped onto each other as if they were the only ones in the world. Mother sighed. Father was disgusted.

Julius' face was huge on the screen, the natural green of his complexion mixing with the television's hue—he looked sick, there but not there. It was as if he were focused on a faraway mountain, maybe an ancient mountain. His ears listened to the inside of the earth. His spirit danced in the clouds. He was not in the courtroom. He was not being tried. In his listening eyes, distant and fragile, I saw myself. I felt close to him. He was not listening to the courtroom drone. He was listening to angels. I didn't listen to my family's fights. I went far away, like Julius. And both of us looked delicate and hopeless.

My family had just finished dinner. My mother cooked pot roast that night and we had mashed potatoes that she placed under the broiler to form a crust. We wolfed the meal down. I wondered what prison food tasted like.

Did they serve just bread and water? Did they give them something more because the world watched?

Julius answered questions. He sounded smart. He didn't elaborate. Ethel liked to talk more than he did. I knew what film meant. I didn't know the micro part. My father stirred in his wingback chair covered with the pale blue corduroy cover. My father's body moved. His arms and legs jerked. His stomach bloated out. Sounds came from his moist mouth. He dribbled and stood up. He stood up for hatred. My mother responded too. Julius again said, “I refuse to answer on the grounds it might incriminate me”. My mother jumped out of her chair. Her chin jutted out. Her bottom teeth showed. This was the mother-face that scared me. Something bad would happen when she made that face. Saliva came through her teeth. Whom did she hate so? Europe? My father? Her parents? Her friend Edith, who had a better marriage? The 1930s when she should have gone to college? Me? Her voice formed a knife, silver, serrated, with an invisible handle. It could go anywhere and stab anything. My parents poked in the air at the screen. My father poked at the air trying to hurt Julius. I thought he liked to help criminals. They thought Julius and Ethel were real people in their living room and they were poking and hurting them. It was like a ping-pong game between the TV and my parents on the covered wing chairs. Everything seemed life and death. Words and energies bounced from my parents' shouts to the lawyers' words to my parents' gesticulations to Judge Kaufman's gavel to my parents' curses to the Rosenbergs' eyes. Our gray muted living room turned into a courtroom.

“They should be killed. They should be shot. The electric chair is too good for them.”

My mother answered, “How could they do this to us? The Jews haven't had enough trouble? The world doesn't hate us enough already?”

“Traitor,” my father screamed. Spit curled around his lips.

“Jew hater,” my mother said, her arms waving like a wild ballerina in the air. World War II had ended less than a decade ago. It was still dangerous to be Jewish.

“Commie,” my father snarled out. It sounded like the nail in the coffin. “Come-me.” Did it mean “come here?” My parents' voices slit the air stretched taut in our apartment. I covered my ears with my fists. My nails dug into my palms. I pressed my knuckles inside my ears. I had to keep out their voices but still I heard, “Commies, traitors”. Then I heard my thoughts. If you go against the family. Traitor, spy, betrayer. My head crashed in, a tower crumbling. Tiny bones couldn't hold. Spinning, reeling. The gray became continuous, three dimensional walls and floors of gray. The walls of my mind, the walls of the living room collapsed on top of me and my family, because of me. If you go against your family.

Back on the screen, Ethel started to dissolve. It started in her waist folding, her shoulders falling forward, her head to one side. Ethel Rosenberg was having a breakdown. She couldn't stop crying. She couldn't go on. Her lawyer asked for an intermission. The judge allowed her to see Julius for a short visit. She needed to see her husband and they let her. Just for five minutes. It was private. She was like the exhausted Olympic runner who caught a glimpse of his girlfriend on the sidelines and ran faster. Now she could go on. She could fight. Her melting was from my parents' hisses. They were killing Ethel. Mother suddenly understood Ethel. She understood dependency on people. She saw herself as a woman who would do anything for love and sex, including sacrifice her children. She softened. She stopped lynching Ethel Rosenberg for the rest of the night. My father remained disgusted with all this female goo. Women slowed everything down. But my mother had begun to forgive Ethel.

The television went to commercial, and my mother served chocolate cake with strawberries and whipped cream between the layers of the cake. She had whipped the cream herself and added vanilla. She had baked the cake herself and used buttermilk. We ate in front of the blank television. My parents had two slices each. Then Ethel was back, as defiant and physical as ever. Mother nodded. She said to herself, “Ethel needed that”. Mother didn't feel close to Father. She had always wanted a communion in marriage like Julius and Ethel had. Once when we were visiting Aunt Ruth at her farm in Florida, Mother and I took a walk and saw a banana stalk unravel into bloom right in front of us. “Why not me?” Mother said out loud. I felt her hunger for love. But Father only liked children. He came to life around a child, any child, and Mother became jealous.

The judge said, “Ladies and gentlemen, you will be asked to return Monday morning at ten thirty. In the meantime, I want to wish you all a very happy Easter and a pleasant weekend.” I wondered whether the court killed people on Easter the way the Satanists did. My parents grunted but didn't answer. They talked to each other and forgot my sister and me.

“They won't snitch,” my father said.

“They are protecting others,” my mother said. They looked at the Rosenbergs as if they were fools but underneath I could see they respected them. Deep inside my parents' dead eyes, something glowed. The Rosenbergs didn't tattle.

Later in April, with spring vacation from school over, Julius' face appeared large on the nineteen-inch screen. His eyes, watery and prophetic, strong and fragile, had a tribal look. No one cared what he said. They hated him and wanted him dead. My parents hissed. My sister, in her own world, was not watching. She liked to make up stories and write them down, so she didn't see what really happened. I saw Julius. I saw myself. I didn't know the word yet or even had a hint of its concept, but when I saw the still photos of Julius' face, I knew that I was a “revolutionary” and that a revolutionary would sacrifice everything for a belief and a purpose that he thought was right. Julius was thirty-three when arrested, like Jesus, and he sacrificed a wife and children for his protest beliefs. I was a child in the third grade knowing I would betray my family and tell. The TV announcer said Julius grew up in lower-east-side, tenement-immigrant poverty, and I was growing up with a family that hated. I didn't know whether these conditions made Julius and me who we were or whether we would be like that anyway. This was long ago, but I knew something then in my child's mind. I knew that like him, I would do something that was not allowed. I would break rules. I would tell my family's story even if they killed me for it.

When they sentenced him to death, I became inconsolable. I could not look at what happened, I could not face the pain. I became like my sister ignoring the world. As I crumbled, and as he died, I realized he looked like Daniel.

Green fruit

When I was ten and a half in 1954, Grandpa Max said to Mrs. Twartski in front of me, “I want to bring her to fruition soon and I need more pounds on her.” I thought he was going to give me fruits to eat, though I was confused because I knew fruits didn't have many calories. I loved peaches and cantaloupe and could eat any number of green grapes as I sat with my family under a beach umbrella at Jones Beach every summer in ordinary life. My father took me into the endless ocean. I floated on my back and he hooked his feet under my arms and also floated. The waves caressed, but I felt as if I could drown. I could sink into the waves and rest on the wet sand floor. We floated out to deep water that I could not stand in. I had to trust that my father would keep me afloat, but that trust was impossible. My mother and sister sat linked together under a striped beach umbrella rented mostly to keep my skin from getting any darker. While I swayed on the unpredictable waves of Jones Beach, while the waves flung themselves high and low and I felt entrapped and also banished from my mother and sister—something descended from the skies. The force was stronger than the piercing sunlight and turbulent wind, calmer than the blues, greens, and salty smells; a force reached down and held me as if I were a nurtured fish in a pond. Though heavy and huge, it coated me gently. The air seemed to smile like Mr. Jacobs' face. The clouds emitted love that felt like Daniel's presence. The precarious Atlantic Ocean did not feel unsafe. I felt like I was on dry land, in an enclosed watery garden, secure and with the fragrance of ripe peonies and roses. For a moment, I did not feel enslaved. The intense sun framed my eyes causing me to see rainbows of translucent color. Even when the waves peaked and spilled over my face, and the inside of my nostrils and eyes stung, I still felt a solid, indestructible presence rain on me. I was alone in this liquid garden but filled with a presence that was goodness. I don't know whether it covered all of Jones Beach or the universe or whether it was trying to make me less distraught, but it was there even while I was drowning in waves of hopeless loneliness. As my father turned his feet at a sharp angle, stood up, and yanked me out of the ocean by the arm, even then I carried this protected paradise into any abysses he and my other handlers had planned.

Grandpa had no intention of waiting until my body menstruated in its own time. He started injections to bring it on by eleven. He must have been working for the Mafia group then because the Illuminati hadn't wanted to start impregnating me until I was thirteen.

In ordinary life, I was sitting on the toilet in our long, narrow Pleasant Hills bathroom with a floor of miniature black and white ceramic tiles. I was eleven and menstrual blood poured out of me. I must have made a sound because my sister rushed into the bathroom. We were not allowed to lock the door. I wanted to die, foreseeing what lay ahead. Crisp blood flew out of me as if I had been cut in half. Life would become a tidal wave that pulled me into the sea with sharks, then washed me to shore with family. If no one would help a child escape, who would rescue a bleeding girl? Previously, life was set with my parts in place, now life would be executed. My father came in, attracted by the commotion. I said, “What are you, a sex maniac!” My mother had retired to her bedroom.

I began to feel sexual feelings for the first time. I was finishing sixth grade and starting junior high school.

For my eleventh birthday, before they sent me away, my mother bought me many gifts including a leather jacket with knit sleeves that I had admired in Klein's discount department store for months. She filled the two curved sofas in the living room with a panoply of beautiful clothing either from love or guilt. My sister didn't even seem jealous. My mother also baked a masterpiece for my eleventh birthday, a gorgeous, round, four-layer chocolate cake. She baked the batter in two round nine-inch pans, then sliced each layer in half and put hand-whipped cream in between them. She wrote Happy Birthday in pink whipped cream, and around the border put pink decorations like rosebuds, and added giant fresh strawberries. As if that weren't enough, she then said, “I want to take you shopping and have you point your finger and I will buy you whatever you point to.” Perhaps that's when I realized how transitory and meaningless material possessions are.

In normal life, my father practiced American law. In later years, he was on a White House committee and was a law partner with a congressperson's father. But deep within him, he believed in ancient Roman law. Like the church leaders who think pedophilia is a not a crime, my father felt entitled to use his daughters' and other children's vaginas and rectums. He preferred younger children and impregnated me by accident. I had remembered this pregnancy when I worked through my incest memories in the 1980s. As I worked more deeply into my mind control and ritual abuse memories in 2012, a body memory brought this phase of my life roaring back. I felt nauseated and almost vomited. Then I realized the eleven-year-old child my father impregnated had suffered from morning sickness. My vomit had informed my mother and grandmother that I was pregnant. Since my father raped me repeatedly, they deduced it was from him. This was right before the Mafia group started impregnating me deliberately at Brothel 8.

My mother and grandmother rushed me to the family doctor and Dr. Brown gave me an abortion, which I hadn't wanted. I thought it would be nice to have a baby. I loved my Tiny Tears doll. I knew nothing of the societal implications of having an incest baby—to me it was like having a doll.

I was well aware that my father kept me alive, but perhaps my mother would not have hated me so much if he hadn't kept raping me. Or perhaps she would have anyway because she was programmed to hate me. My father, when confronted, said, “She's so cute and adorable,” blaming me for being raped weekly, sometimes nightly. After the abortion, it was quieter in the apartment. My father was trying to make it up to my mother. I found myself in multiple double binds: I didn't want to be raped and I was raped; I had sudden sexual feelings and I felt confused and guilty; I didn't want the abortion and was forced to have the abortion; I was blamed for the whole thing; there was no way out. Mostly I wanted to rip my skin off.

Driving to the brothel, 1954

This inside girl never hid. I always remembered her. She never told me her whole story but she told me the beginning. Or perhaps that's the only piece of the event she held. Then other parts inside of me finished the history she had begun.

They put me between them in the front seat of the light blue Packard and later the green Pontiac. I held my body in so that no part of me touched either one of them. I wore my brown coat and brown hat with a feather that curled around into a question mark-type shape. The brown hat covered my whole head and the feather wrapped around my left ear. My brown coat went below my knees and matched my hat. This coat was my dress coat, not the storm coat I wore to school. Underneath, I had a simple dress, a starched white blouse, a sweater, and good, new, white underwear and a training bra. I was shiny and polished like my shoes. Mother had arranged my hair in curls along my forehead. I had had to sleep with the bobby pins holding them in place the night before. This was how mother dressed me when she took me to the brothel. Anyone would think I was the most cared-for child in the world. My mother looked out the window of the front seat through the polka dots on her hat's French veil. Her gray suede gloves matched her pumps with fat heels. She wore a mink stole with mink heads dangling down the sides that collided with her belt. I wondered how many dead minks those dangling heads represented. It must not have been the dead of winter or she would have been wearing her mink coat. My father had on a stylish hat. I was almost eleven and a half. The girls in the car, my inside girls, didn't know about the past experiences in the brothel. It was all new to them. The older girls who had been at the brothel earlier shivered deeper inside me. But even they didn't know what was coming. I should've been at Oldtown Junior High School. They thought, They are driving me to the brothel. Soon my parents will leave me at the brothel.

How this girl with the hat never got sunken into the forgotten is unknown, but I thank her for never disappearing. To stay connected to the person who lives ordinary life is a feat. Tons of electricity and torture discourage communication. I hadn't remembered where she was going. Just that she was in the front seat flanked by my parents and shaking, wearing that hat. Sometimes my heart hurt so much that I could feel its outline pierce through my torso. Big bold strokes outlined its shape. The center of my tongue was dry. The back of my throat had a chute that went past my tailbone.

My left leg started shaking violently. My father ignored me as he drove recklessly. My teeth rattled and smashed. “Stop that shaking,” my mother snapped. Her bottom teeth jutted forward and her bottom lip dropped. The minks' heads bobbed. “Stop it.” I tried to hold my body still but my left leg jerked wildly.

“Stop that shaking!” My father drove on.

At the entrance to the brothel, Father handed me over. Mother stayed in the car. No one saw her mink stole or her coordinated outfit. The thin male greeter gave me a shift, slippers, and a number, and tagged my arrival clothes, the same way as when I was younger. Another man who always looked down and was probably from the same country as the first took me to an empty room with a bleak single bed on a cold, uneven floor. The window was fogged over and the wall streaked with dirt. Rusty pipes made sleep apnea sounds. This place is putrid. I wanted to go home, even though I had no home.

The visit

I looked down at my chest all the time and prayed that it would not grow. I inspected to make sure it was flat. Several years later, my breasts did start to change but they grew wide rather than out. The relief I felt that I still didn't have breasts was as huge as the town I lived in. The girls in the brothel did not want to be pregnant, and they knew that the brothel keepers impregnated the older girls. The older girls were salmon swimming upstream. Once they deposited their babies, they died unless their parents came for them. Even girls in regular life were hyper-conscious of their breasts forming. What distinguished us was who wore an undershirt, a training bra, or a real bra. And who had a boyfriend, the most exotic accomplishment.

My parents visited me at Brothel 8 in the Bronx weekly, on Wednesdays or Sundays during visiting hours, which were from two in the afternoon until six in the evening for the younger girls and three to five for the older ones. My mother brought me chopped liver and other foods I liked, like Mallomars. Mother broke off tiny pieces and put them between my lips. My eyes were sunken. I was often chained to the bed when they visited. Mother sobbed. Father looked down and around. They seemed to feel bad, but the fact was they had sold me into this slavery. My father always left with fifty and hundred dollar bills and a few thousand dollar bills thrown in; I saw the stack with a rubber band tied around it. I imagine that they thought they didn't have a way out of this, and that they might as well take the money.

During one visit, my mother wore a new, elaborate pearl choker.

“That's a pretty necklace, Mom,” I said.

“Your father bought it for me for our anniversary,” she said.

With my money, I thought.

I wonder, when my parents visited me, did they know? Were they conscious or so programmed that they didn't know what they had done? My father flicked off a fifty dollar bill, handed it to a man wearing a pale green medical shirt and said “Make sure no one beats her up.” If my parents had stopped visiting me, the men would have killed me the moment I got sick. Sometimes the men sold the abandoned girls to foreign men. The parents had already got the money. They didn't want the girls any more. And just looking at the girls probably made them feel guilty. My parents were better than that. It's hard to believe my parents were better than anyone in the world.

The harvest, 1954–1959

Pamphlets were scattered all over the downstairs of the faded warehouse:

> See your sperm spread over the world.

Have offspring on every continent.
Be a real man.
Give your sperm to one of our girls.
Grow babies in lots of our gals.

I had overheard the managers telling the nurses, “The eggs have to be fertilized—we can't afford a bad batch, we'll lose our customers.” Nurses on the floor drew our blood after we had a series of rapes. My left arm and leg were tied to a bed, this time with metal bracelets and chains like the African slaves wore. My life consisted of rapes, attempts at impregnation, hormone shots, vomiting, and having my insides scooped out. It felt like diarrhea and cramps when they scooped out my eggs to ship them to places around the world. “You have to keep stimulating her. I want constant orgasms. We need an uptake for the sperm,” a nurse in the brothel said. The stimulation was painful.

The air outside was clean, the sky a dreamy blue. Sometimes birds chirped a sharp and harmonious sound. The women had left the window open a crack because they were too hot. The employed women always kept photographs of their children, especially the babies. These women who had the hardship of leaving their home country for another, who struggled with the language—these women loved to make circus-like bows and put them on their children. I realize now the bows were a code saying, “don't tell or you will be killed”. My grandmother also made butterfly bows. I would not mind leaving this country for another, but I thought every country had these brothels and parents who were forced to sell their children and think of themselves as farmers and their children as their crop.

The air was warm and playful. I longed for a glass of orange juice—Mother squeezed oranges for us and left the pulp in—and to go out and play, perhaps ride my bicycle, later go to the drugstore for a vanilla egg cream. When I moved, the metal cut my skin. The men liked to see blood on the girls. The more wounds and scratches the better. Maybe Mother will bring me orange juice when she visits on Sunday, I thought. I had tried to infuse ordinary life with as much pleasure as possible. The key to not going crazy or killing yourself was to find some enjoyment somewhere, somehow, possibly. Daniel had wanted me to go on living. Therefore I had to find a way. But here at the brothel, all I could come up with was that my mother might bring me freshly squeezed orange juice on Sunday. My throat was sore. It would taste good.

I also thought of my eggs going to all these countries. Some would create babies I would never see or care for. Would they grow up to be slaves like me who would die soon or be bought by a middle class or rich family that wouldn't know about me lying here in chains? If they thought about it, they might know, but why should they bother thinking about it? They just wanted a baby, any baby.

It was springtime. I was on spring vacation from seventh grade. Maybe one more week and they would send me home and back to school. I would be home for my birthday. Where I lived, the hills were soft and caressing, like a lullaby. The woman sitting on a chair here in the corner sighed and wiped her forehead. She wanted to be home also.

I prayed that my babies would find a good home, not here but perhaps in a small country where parents didn't sell their children. Maybe when my children were eighteen or thirty, they would look for me and find me. But how would they know who I was? There would be no records. Maybe my children would never be. That would be the best. I prayed for that, that my children would never be.

The woman, Trixie, came over with a rag and swatted my cheeks.

“No cry. No allow.”

I wondered what they were doing at home now. Mother and Marlene would be getting up late since school was out. They would have breakfast, probably pot cheese and corn rye bread, slowly dress and then take the F train downtown to Klein's. Mother would buy Marlene nice clothes. Mother might buy me a welcome home outfit. I wondered whether Marlene had ever been sent to Brothel 8. Sometimes she disappeared and I didn't know where she had gone. In September, she'd be going away to college. Then I'd be all alone with my parents. Mother would have stopped Marlene from going to the brothel if she could, but she might not have been able to. Me she just handed over. But she would never have chosen to do that without the masters making her.

My heart got caught in a hard knot. I was trying to coax the fluid in it to move around. The air outside smelled clean. It was funny how it didn't show the pollution outside or inside. I felt a wave come over me. It was light and careful and touched me gingerly. I felt a peacefulness.

“No cry. No allow,” Trixie said.

I didn't know whether the peace was coming from inside me or perhaps from God outside in the sunshine or maybe from the spirit of Daniel. My nerves were always tumbling around my body, crashing into poles inside me, making dizzying circles. Crash, crash, jump. My mother was driven crazy and these nerves would drive anyone crazy.

I think they charged $500 per vial, or maybe it was fifty dollars? The men who delivered sperm were mostly businessmen, politicians—sometimes a truck driver. The men were rough and came into the girls' small rooms one after the other. Some just laid their entire over-two hundred pounds on you, didn't move, just sank into you, all their weight crushing your child bones, and let their semen dribble around you. They fell asleep and the guards had to be called to get them off. A matron in each room watched that we weren't killed. Each room did not have its own set of guards, and there were nights when more girls were having emergencies than there were guards. That's when a girl or even two were killed. They carried the dead girls out in the darkness in large bags. We envied those girls.

There was a time limit and the matron timed it. “Cigars outside. Rest it in ashtray,” the concierge said. “All men are like this, not just these. They want women, girls chained.”

For exercise, we walked only within the building and up and down the steps while a male nurse held a gun to our ribs. For air, I stuck my head out the window for an hour each night. The matron always watched so I couldn't jump.

Some men were there because they wanted to propagate children all over the world, the way Florida exports citrus fruits and California mangoes.

A cleanup team was supposed to wash the girls off, and bring them a bedpan and water, but often the cleanup crew skipped people because they were lazy. We showered and washed our hair after every ten clients, and we were supposed to wash our parts after every client. The clients, who included a rare woman, didn't notice how sticky and dirty our bodies were. When men wanted to ejaculate, all they cared about was their own sperm. And when they wanted to beat and whip, the dirtier you were the better. It justified their need to make you bad.

Physicians came to the Brothel 8 every ten to eleven days, sometimes every fourteen days, if it was a holiday. They spoke with accents. I don't know whether they were really doctors. They wore street clothes and carried a little black bag. They had a stethoscope, took our temperature orally, pressed on our stomachs, examined us for bugs and venereal disease, and determined whether we were pregnant. We were tied up during the examinations. They didn't treat us as human beings. To them, we were also just bodies that could bring in money. One time I was sent home early because one of the pseudo-doctors had done a bad procedure and I hemorrhaged. They couldn't use me for a while.

Mrs. Twartski was sometimes there, checking to see that none of my programs broke down so that my parts would cooperate, not fight and, when released from the brothel, remember nothing. Some of us, however, did remember. She or another programmer would press on both my temples together and a stream of these inner slave-girls would come out. Each girl had to take care of five men, then another girl would take over. All these girls were parts who were inside me, who were me. The temple squeeze also told me to hold still and be silent. Even during the five deliveries, I had to bite on a stick between my teeth and be quiet.

When my parents visited, we talked about nothing but it was better to have them near me than being alone. They stayed for fifteen or twenty minutes, less time than it took to drive to the brothel. Then they got up to leave, walked out together and didn't glance back at me. They were robots walking away. They didn't know what they were doing. The masters had control of their minds, souls, and wallets. When they got home, they would think I was at a recreational camp. They may never have had a moment of truth. I had no one in the world.

In my mind, I flung myself from side to side against the walls. After they left, still in my mind, I flew to the side bathroom with a skylight, out the window and perched on its window ledge with the free pigeons, or I jumped to my death. If I jumped, maybe an honest person would find me splattered on the sidewalk and the workings of Brothel 8 would be known. No, honest people didn't hang out around this neighborhood. I would just be dead but I was ready. I could have stayed alive for my children but I will never know who they are.

The girls who were kept in the brothel were separated and weren't allowed to become friends. My body and mind were like locomotives racing across country, never stopping at stations, never slowing down at intersections. In sleep and awake, I rushed, sped, flying off tracks. Anguish ate up my pounds. I found no comfort except in the memory of Daniel. I saw his curls, eyes, felt his still smooth but becoming-a-man skin—some nights, I thought I felt his weightless ghost body covering my writhing-in-pain body and then the smell. Within the dusty, leaking warehouse, I would suddenly smell daffodils and wildflowers. A perfume filled my nostrils and sinuses even as my ears listened to other girls' whimpering, and the occasional horn honking outside.

“Eat or we will break your jaw.” A guard socked it. After that, I had some sort of contraption around my jaw. They fed me with only a straw. I couldn't open my mouth. They gave me milk shakes.

When I tried to sleep, I spun. The attendants held my arm and walked me to the bathroom or I would have fallen. I started spitting up saliva and retching. The attendant called the doctor.

They hooked me onto an IV. Another time, a crew rushed in after the attendant pressed the bell. They came with an IV, blood pressure cuff, and oxygen mask. That same bell rang all through the floors. They never sent us to the hospital.

I used to outline the Pleasant Hills apartment floor plan over and over again in my mind endlessly. I imagined walking from where my parents double locked the front door for the night, past the square gray foyer that we used as a dining room into the hall, past the elongated bathroom with scrubbed tiles, past our room where my sister had the bed closer to the windows with starched organdy curtains. I ran my eyes along the bumps and crags of the walls, came to the deep blue crevice of the corner and rested in its arms. I looked at the Victorian prints of ladies in hoop skirts and samplers stitched by children who lived one hundred years ago, went into the kitchen that mother had painted yellow and green, past the long windows of the living room, and back to the double locked front door for the night. I noticed that I didn't include my parents' bedroom in my mental outline. I wondered whether the girls who stitched the sampler had to go to a brothel.

We girls rarely saw one another except in the one large bathroom. We were all chained in our separate rooms. But we felt one another. We communicated in our minds and supported one another. I tried especially hard to contact my cousin Rhonda.

A hand has reached out to me in the twenty-first century. It has five fingers with nails and is covered with mud. How brave of it to reach for air even in this polluted world. I lick the mud off covering the self-importance, the deceptive specialness, I lick in between the fingers and pull and tug on the slippery skin. I will not let go. At last, I have found another one of my selves.

Breeder, 1954–1959

In the brothel, men in white coats had conversations in a foreign language that I somehow understood. In the hallway men said, “We have a big order. They want live newborns. We have an especially big order for half Jewish, half Asian newborns.” They calculated numbers. It would cost them less to keep me here chained to the bed during the pregnancies than for me just to produce fertilized eggs.

They found Asian men on the street who weren't the brothel's usual clients but were workers in the neighborhood, or men they imported from Canal Street in lower Manhattan. The Asian men were rounded up about twenty-five at a time. The managers of the brothel wanted to make sure I and the other Jewish girls got pregnant. These men were violent. They were there only for use of their sperm and the guards often stationed themselves by the beds with their guns drawn. After the clients attempted to impregnate me, they were handed money.

But when the brothel was closed down for the morning, the guards would put down their guns, loosen their shirts, and start unzipping their flies. One of the matrons would storm into the room and shout, “These girls are not for your use.” The guards would slink away because they needed their jobs. Most of me was out the window.

Now that they are remembering, the girls on the ledge talked to the girls left in the bed:

GIRLS IN BED: “Why did you leave me?”

GIRLS ON LEDGE: “We couldn't take it.”

BED: “You left me alone. You shouldn't have left me. You were selfish like Marlene, only caring about yourself.”

LEDGE: “That hurt.”

BED: “It's true, you were cruel.”

LEDGE: “We're sorry. We were not as strong as you.”

BED: “Ha.”

LEDGE: “Why didn't you leave too?”

BED: “Someone had to stay and protect. Everyone can't leave.”

LEDGE: “Why not?”

BED: “Then the body would be completely abandoned and unprotected.”

A short stocky man with an eager but mean face in a tweed suit, tie, and hat and a taller blond woman who had a page boy cut and sprayed hair, a fur coat in winter, a trench coat in the fall and spring, or a summer suit, walked the halls, peering in rooms, holding briefcases and clipboards—looking over the mothers, while planning on taking the babies. The matrons called them “angels of death”. Holding a clipboard and a box of chocolates, the blond woman entered my room when the clients finished with me. She had a tag on her jacket that read Rebecca P. Smith.

“We're from the Wyoming Family Aid Agency, and we're here to help girls like you. We specialize in placing beautiful babies from unwed mothers. We want to get these babies far away from the East Coast, into the clean mountainous air. Don't you want your baby to be raised in clean air and not here in a Bronx ghetto? Don't you want that for your baby as a mother? Your sister gave us all her babies. She wanted a better life for them. Don't you want to be like your sister? We have so many couples who tried for so long to have a baby and would give anything to raise your babies.”

Knowing she was lying, I said, “Maybe they should lie here—then they'd get pregnant.”

“They are very sad and you could make them happy. The Wyoming Family Aid Society specializes in earnest adoptions, meaning adoptions where the birth mother doesn't renege. We are longstanding partners with the Nebraska Aid Society that believes in mother and baby happiness. All little pregnant girls like chocolate candies,” the blond woman said as she shoved the box towards me. The attendants pricked up their ears, knowing I would give them the chocolates as soon as the vulture left. Sometimes they ate the chocolates on the spot, other times they brought the box home to their families.

After the adoption woman and her partner left, a sole Asian worker with kind eyes came in. He looked tired as if he had just come from work and had been rounded up. He wore a white shirt and loosened tie. Maybe he was a waiter or maître d' of a restaurant. He looked at me and his body curved backwards into an opened parenthesis, his fingers stretched wide and he stood frozen in the doorway to my room. Beads of sweat appeared on his face and his eyeballs bulged and receded. His white button down shirt became wet under his arms. His shocked face reminded me of who I was. My handlers had told me this happened to all girls and that I was special to have so many men who would pay for me, that what I was doing here was what life was about. But the man's face shocked me back to the truth. The skinny man with kind eyes looked at me chained to the bed, crying, struggling, and he turned on his toe to leave as he said “No, too little girl.”

“You have to or you'll be killed,” I called to him. He answered, “No little girl, no tied up,” and left.

“If you don't, they'll kill you,” I screamed. I'm not sure he was able to hear me because he spun around and ran. The guards wrestled with him. I heard noise and shouting. The men in the hall followed him. And then the silenced shot in the alley. The inside girls in the bed felt guilty even though they had warned him. If we weren't crying, maybe he would still be alive, they thought to themselves. The guards may have killed the one good person in the neighborhood because he knew what was going on inside and they didn't have anything over him. The basis of this kind of criminal security is co-opting. That's why they have the children of these groups kill so young.

In a fairly wild state, my father came to Brothel 8 on his own one afternoon, not during visiting hours. I don't know how he got in. He probably bribed the guards with cash. My father sat on a hard chair near my bed sobbing into his white handkerchief that Mother had ironed for him. He didn't say anything, just sobbed next to me. Two of the male attendants who patrolled the halls with hand guns came in, held a gun to his temple and told him to leave. He reached into his deep pocket. Twenties were on top. He peeled off two twenties, gave each man a bill and sobbed, “Don't hurt her,” and left without turning back around.

My first baby was born on May 17, 1954. The attendant-doctor held her up in the air, mucus and blood coating her perfect body. Beautiful toes. Then he quickly carried her out of the birth room leaving me on the table, my arms extended, longing to hold and sniff her. I never saw her again. My second child was born on February 23, 1955, a stillborn, they said. The people at the brothel whipped me for it but I'm not sure the infant boy was really dead. When a baby leaves a mother, even an overly young mother, it's as if a meteorite hits a farmland and leaves a crater, and the land will grow no more crops. When a baby leaves a child–mother, it may be even worse. I searched for a nice person in the world, anywhere. Daniel was always there with me, as a ghost always protecting me from the environment, grief, and sadistic workers. In between deliveries, I went home to Pleasant Hills. Sometimes my sister was home from college, with a sophisticated air of the outside world that intrigued me.

This year, I contacted agencies that specialize in trafficking cases and might have access to black market files, but none so far handles “cold cases”. I imagine they have enough trouble investigating current cases. I put ads in newspapers with the dates of my children's births, but so far I've had no responses.

SEVEN

Feast of the beast, 1955

The most important moment of my life started a cascade of punishments that would continue my whole life.

During this festival, a third brothel baby grew inside me while death was all around outside, in the same spot where the ceremonies took place every twenty-seven years,[1] in Prince Edward Island, Canada.

Until now, the executioner's hand or one of my handlers' hands had been over mine. It embarrassed the cult leaders that a designated queen of a county had not killed with her own hands. Even eight-year-old children in this cult had already sacrificed for their god. I thought that perhaps they wouldn't send me back to the brothel if I cooperated, but I didn't think they would let me keep my baby.

Killing with your own hands is how you become an adult in this subterranean world. I was walked to the altar at the stroke of midnight surrounded by all the swaying participants chanting, “Daughter of King Saul…royal bloodline…” I and everyone else wore black hooded robes. Two flags on long, high-up poles, higher than the tall pine trees, waved in the cool air. One said United Brothers of Israel, the other, the name of my maternal bloodline.

Red strobe lighting flashed. The masters swayed before and behind me. This was the moment I was to step into my prophesied role of queen of this county, which had been the fourth county and was now the first, the one endowed with spiritual importance. This county is composed of the United States, Europe, Canada, and Greenland. Thirteen geographic areas called counties make up the satanic world. Grandpa Max held a sparkling crown in his open hands. Since before my birth, he had been working towards this goal. Everyone present was pushing me to kill with my own hands without assistance, which meant my acceptance of my prophesied position. Even my mother and sister wanted me to do it. The dull hum of chanting suspended for a moment. In my mind, I heard Daniel speak to me, “Be as pure as the swans,” and saw Mr. Jacobs pray with his family in his apartment across the waterfall. His face and heart vibrated goodness and kindness to his children and the world. My spirit had become one of his children. When you are taken this deeply into the jaws of evil, you have to go one way or another.

The leaders had a drugged Caucasian male prepared to be sacrificed. He was probably thirty-three years old, according to tradition. He would be killed no matter what I did. I was only a pawn. If I killed, I could have an easier life on earth, with less torture, prostitution, and other illegal activities. These groups gave women two husbands: a poor choice of a husband for ordinary life, and a better matched husband for their cult life. My cult husband, Eli, was chanting and expecting me to join him and kill with my own hands. Rhonda was right behind me and watched, neutral. The executioner put the jeweled sword in my left hand. No one breathed. The air was like silk and the earth moist and mellow. The worst crimes take place in the most beautiful landscapes.

In my mind, Mr. Jacobs' hand went over mine, the hand that was over his boys' heads as he prayed in his tallit and as his emaciated wife fingered her rosary. Daniel breathed into me with the familiar breath that had nurtured me for nine years. Daniel, the swans, my parents' deeper unconscious, some place ancient in my bloodline, the strength from the bridge walk—something whispered to me. I would not do it. I passed the test. I failed the test. In this underworld, that is about as close to having free will as it gets.

The emblazoned sword lay on the ground as if bleeding. The chanting turned to a hiss. The strobe lighting ceased. After I dropped the sword, they chanted, “Fall on sword” and “Queen Philomena is a failure” as guards handcuffed me. The executioner stepped up to the altar, took Rhonda's hand, and killed the drugged adult sacrifice.

Grandpa Max wearing his Wiezenslowski mask, Joseph, and Mrs. Twartski whipped me in front of the participants. The other twelve counties performed successful 1955 Feasts of the Beast.

The last days at the brothel

After the feast, my father parked the car in the Bronx slum. My mother got out of the car, took my arm, and dragged me out to the brothel. She had probably been told that if I didn't return to the brothel, Marlene or I would be killed.

Run, run, I thought, but there was nowhere to run. Overflowing trashcans were on the dark corners. No one was around. Mother shoved me to Mrs. Twartski, who took me inside the heavy, squeaky door and pushed me up many flights of wooden wide steps. I looked frantically for an escape route. On the sixth floor, we went into a large dingy room with a cot, chair, and lamp that had a dirty lampshade. Pale green paint peeled off the walls. The filthy wooden floors rocked. It was like an oversized cell without a single comfortable or pleasant thing to look at. There was a hanger for my coat, a hook for my hat, and a dresser for my clothes.

My second daughter was rushed away from me on December 14, 1955. From the glimpse that I got, I saw that she was delicate, serious, and Asian looking. I don't know what happened to my children. I felt more numb when the other children were born but not completely. I suffered severe chest pains and waited to die from a heart attack, but it was just grief playing with me. I had given these babies all the pent-up love I stored in myself. They were purity among foulness.

Parts of my mind have kept records of everything that happened to me. These parts or personalities were self-created, not affected by the concussions, and my programmers didn't know about them. I think this self-recording started in infancy. I imagine all survivors of these kinds of abuses have this recording mechanism in their brains.

On the last days at the brothel, the supervisor took the girls to the basement. “When you get in your father's car, you will dissolve in a million pieces and no piece will know of the other. Once you are home, you will remember nothing of your experience. You will be a silent child, a quiet child. If you say one word, this is what will happen to you.” They showed us images of girls with black eyes and missing front teeth being thrown off a cliff, and crows and vultures eating them as they said, “If you ever tell even one little bit, the tiniest little bit, or give a hint, then this will happen to you.” They also showed us pictures of mountain lions devouring children. Sometimes now I awake in a panic attack with these images. “This program starts when you hear the bell ring for the next girl to leave. Whenever you see a yellow bow or any kind of bow, you will remember to forget us here.”

They checked us out by number. They returned our small valises and coats. We put on our street clothes, which we had arrived in. Sometimes the mothers brought different clothes from those we had arrived in to accommodate the season or growth. Psychically, I said goodbye to the girls. Trauma and abuse bind people for life. We all had the same experience. My father was waiting double-parked outside. Another man made sure my father was there.

“We don't want any trouble.” Then he told me to leave.

The man rang a desk bell for the next crippled girl to check out. The walls of evil crashed in on my child's body like an avalanche. No possible escape. The world was an empty abyss, and I was filled with terror.

I got in the front seat and my father and I didn't say anything. By the time I arrived home, I didn't remember anything. It was as if I returned from a regular school day or summer camp. When I got home, my mother either went into her own bedroom and closed the door, or frantically paced the small apartment, or acted as if nothing had happened and put milk and cookies on the kitchen table, either Mallomars or her homemade butter dough cookies with ground walnuts on top.

Back in the twenty-first century, yesterday, I began to feel particularly bad about not having a real friend. No close friend with whom I could share everything. Then I remembered Sally and understood my current grief. She and I had been friends about this same time. An emotional explosion often precedes the narrative of my dissociated memories. I remembered being at Sally Kraus' home in Pleasant Hills. I used to walk to Sally's apartment building five blocks down from mine, towards Enterprise Avenue. We were together in the seventh grade and close for months, before Mengele reappeared.

An only child, Sally invited me to a sleepover at her apartment. We ate meat, mashed potatoes, and dessert at a small table with her parents. The mother commented that I had a sweet tooth and asked me questions about myself. There was almost no other talk. The parents were divorcing. Sally and I got along wonderfully. I had not had a friend for a long time. Given that we were both programmed with mind control, it's amazing that we were able to be spontaneous and play. Then suddenly it ended.

Mrs. Kraus, whose first name was Dorothy, was one of the better mothers because she knew enough to divorce, but still she couldn't protect. When the father, Marvin, picked Sally up off the bed, he said, “You're next” to me. He paced back and forth as he carried my friend around with his penis in her. Sally's mother called from another room, “Marvin, leave the girls alone, come out of there, or I'm coming in.” Then she was at the door, knocking. I couldn't understand why she didn't just barge in. Mr. Kraus dropped Sally on her bed in the middle of the rape and left the room. Sally was crying and ashamed. “Now you know my secrets,” she said to me. We clasped hands, her left hand with my right hand, and lay there heartbroken. She had thought he wouldn't do it if I were there. Without television, I don't know that we would have ever found out that there was another way to live. The fathers in I Remember Mama, My Life with Father, and later The Brady Bunch never raped their children, or at least the television never showed it.

With our fingers intertwined, love passed between us, stronger, deeper, more permanent than all the electrical shocks Mengele and the Satanists could muster with all their elaborate machines. Two friends knowing what each other's nights and families were like and loving each other because of it. I felt our souls touch and our hearts take in what we endured. That feeling of communion is still with me today.

Maybe Sally reported to her handler that she had a sisterlike friend, or perhaps her parents did, or my mother might have told her own parents who told my handler, or it may have been my sister who told on me. Or one of the reporters in me may have told though no one inside me has confessed yet.

When Sally and I were holding hands, she still sobbing, we put our heads together with our temples touching and fell asleep like that, our heads like joined mind-controlled twins.

Almost every day, I walked the five long blocks on 108th Street under the cherry blossom trees from my apartment to Sally's apartment building. I took the elevator to the eighth floor, turned left, walked down the hall, and knocked on her door. Her mother Dorothy opened the door about two inches and stuck her eye out. Her knee was between the door and the doorframe. She dressed in street clothes, not the housedress my mother wore inside. “Can Sally come out?” I asked, thinking that if she couldn't, I could come in and see her.

“Sally can't play with you,” Dorothy said. I was too stunned to ask why not. She closed the door. I heard the double lock click in place. I began crying. I walked back the five blocks under the cherry blossoms trees sobbing, trying to understand what had happened. I hadn't done anything wrong. Sally's father had done something wrong. I knew something about them I wasn't supposed to. Were Sally or I not allowed to have any friends? I felt boxed in loneliness even as pink petals softly fell on me. This block was an Eden and a pastel loveliness caressed my sorrow. Without success, I called on Sally every day for about two weeks. My mother said not to, that either Sally was sick or her parents didn't want to let her out. I couldn't stop crying. My eyes stung without stopping.

In my normal, everyday life outside the cult, I had the problem of automatically transferring to any friend all the feelings I had for Sally. Most of those friends, of course, did not warrant such trust.

The last time I tried to call for Sally and was refused, while I was walking home with my eyes burning from sobbing, Mengele's big black car pulled up under the cherry blossom trees glistening in the sunlight. He hopped out and told me to get in. He called me Wendy and put chloroform over my nose. He and I were in the back seat as his driver and another man were in the front. I naively thought he would drive me home, but we went right to the programming quarters at Montauk Point, where Mrs. Twartski waited. My parents must have told Mengele where to find me. Now Mrs. Twartski and Mengele were friends and working together.

The assistants put me on a stretcher and wheeled me to the second floor. I was barefoot, naked, with electrodes on the soles of my feet, up the sides of my trembling legs, above my knees. They fastened on a helmet with inside spikes that especially hurt the soft spot of my head. I got quick shots of drugs in the right and left arms, and had to follow Mengele's watch moving back and forth hypnotically, with commands followed by brutal shots of electroshock. Mrs. Twarstski instructed, “You are not allowed to have any friends. Jewish girls have no friends. Any friend you have will be killed. You can't be friends with Sally Kraus, and she can't be friends with you.”

Sally was a great loss for me, but now the possibility of not having any friend was an even greater loss.

MENGELE: “Any friend you make we will kill.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “I thought you learned that when we killed Daniel.”

MENGELE: “We can see your every move. You cannot have friends. You are ours to do with what we like. No other people in your world. Only us.”

But Sally and I had already tasted the nurturing love of a friend, which they couldn't erase.

Polio, 1955

In front life, Aunt Eileen in the Bronx had called my mother to say two children in my cousin Rhonda's elementary school had come down with polio. She wouldn't let Rhonda go to school and she was sterilizing all their dishes. At the same time, Aunt Mimi in Flushing called and told my mother she wouldn't let her daughters outside, not even the older one who was younger than me. No one in our school, Public School number three, had it yet. We still went to school, sat at our desks, learned fractions, and studied countries, this time Hawaii with its luxurious blue skies and sensuous fruits and dances. But I knew my mother worried. She never let us take bites from other people's sandwiches or licks of their ice cream cones. My parents watched Dr. Salk on television. They worshipped the man who was saving children's lives.

“Dr. Salk should have been in charge of the distribution himself,” my mother screamed at the T.V. “Then the inoculations would be safe.” She had heard stories of children getting polio from the vaccine. “I'm not giving the children the injections,” she said to my father, who sat in his wing chair half dressed, dubious, placid. “If everyone else gets it, they won't have germs to catch,” Mother argued. Father, who was a professional arguer, didn't agree or disagree and he didn't argue with Mother, even though he was a trial lawyer. Was this a script for my punishment or how my mother really felt, I wondered.

A few nights later, my father and sister were in the small room adjacent to the living room, which was our foyer and dining room. My father had his overcoat on. It was after dinner on a school night, already starting to get dark outside. My sister had her green mid-weight coat on. My father wore his fedora hat, which he also wore to his office in downtown Manhattan. Lovingly, as if she would never see her again, Mother straightened Marlene's collar. She was fifteen; I was twelve. My father and Marlene left and I didn't know where they had gone. My father never went out alone with my sister because Marlene belonged to my mother, not him. I belonged to him, not my mother. Yet I was left behind with my mother. Where was he taking Marlene? Why didn't I go? Was it a doctor's appointment? Was something wrong that they hadn't told me about? Mother didn't answer. They closed the heavy front door to our apartment. Mother did not double lock the door.

“They'll be back soon,” Mother said nonchalantly and returned to the kitchen to finish washing the dishes. I went back to my bedroom, sat at my desk and finished my math homework. It was soothing to do math problems and have everything turn out right. An unknown that had an answer that was either right or wrong. It was an alternate world to the unclear one I lived in. Maybe they were buying my sister something big but not me. Maybe it was so heavy that my father had to carry it. A secret. When my sister returned from this outing, she wouldn't say anything. She just hung up her coat and got ready for bed.

The next night, a Thursday, when he came home from work, Father flung the folded newspaper on the dining room table in the foyer. Mother hated when he didn't put it on the small side table but he never did. He liked to aggravate her. He sniffed deeply the dinner smells. Mother cooked meat for him. He went into the kitchen to find her.

I studied Norman Rockwell's drawings on the cover of the Saturday Evening Post but didn't usually read the newspaper. But this night, something led me to the folded over local paper on the dining room table. I opened it slowly. On the front page, in the right hand column, was a headline: “Polio vaccine given out at Public School number three from 5 to 8 P.M. yesterday.” A photo of lines of children with their parents, both parents, was underneath. I looked at the photograph of many children, many parents. And there was my sister, her green coat a medium black in the picture, Father's Stetson hat a light grey. They stood towards the back of the line, the bigger figures in the photo on the table in Pleasant Hills. The small figures must have gone there before their dinners because they were first in line.

Mother called from the kitchen, “Wash up, get ready for bed.” Why did they want Marlene to have an inoculation and not me? I couldn't figure it out but felt silent arrows piercing my skin, first my heart then my brain. I didn't have the word for it yet but it was forming into a feeling of betrayal. Did they want me to die? This part of me had not known of all the times they showed that they would willingly let me die.

One afternoon, I returned from Oldtown Jr. High School and found Mengele sitting on our curved living room sofa, his legs tightly crossed. When I saw his dark, dry hair, I felt as if the floor had disappeared and I was standing on a huge spring. Mother and Mengele seemed like giant bats flying around the apartment, bumping into each other. I pictured all the stars as dull black and me in the middle of their evil universe. I wanted to run away but my legs had stiffened and there was nowhere to disappear to. He was smoking his brown filtered cigarette, sipping ginger ale that Mother had brought him in her good tall glass with hand painted flowers on it. In the living room, my parents called Mengele Uncle Charlie.

“Hello again, Wendy,” he said. His face folded in. His beady eyes seemed to dance with death. His large black shoes glowed with shine. I wondered whether he had slave-children shine them. His overcoat was open and his dark suit didn't have a single visible wrinkle. His skin still smelled of burnt and decaying bodies. His legs were stiff as if in a perpetual Nazi stance. His fingers were delicate like a woman's, though he used his nails to bite into people's flesh.

“I hear you're a big girl now, bleeding,” he said. I glared at my mother. I never knew how my body would react, and I peed through my clothes in the foyer. Barely surprised, Mother told me to change my clothes and began scrubbing the grey carpet as Mengele kept talking to her and as I eavesdropped with my heart galloping around in circles. “I just want to borrow her for a few days,” he said.

“I'll have to ask Morris about it,” Mother answered.

“Let me have this child on the operating table while you think it over,” he said. “I'll make it worth your while. I can start the experiment right here in your own building. No transportation necessary.”

I felt there was something so wrong and bad about me that my parents would hand me over. When these feelings reached a peak and I could take it no longer, I splintered into hundreds of pieces and floated above myself, shivering and ashamed. I had so much anger that some made its way out of the pieces of me and into the air in front of me. My body became a Swiss cheese with deep holes sprouting rage. I said to my mother, “Why don't you send Marlene?”

“No, not Marlene. Your father will decide,” Mother answered.

“She's just the kind of subject we want—someone who fights back,” Mengele said. “She's got spunk.” The air became sick with gaseous poisons.

My father must have given permission. We were underneath the apartment building in the second lower level, where the medical surgery took place. His surgery room with an operating table and IV drip was a square room off one of the tunnels. “Lie down on the table,” he ordered. He had a tape measure and took measurements of my vertebrae, and the width of my thighs, forearms, wrists, ankles, toes.

For the experiments with polio, Mengele wanted to be called Dr. Menkel or Merk. He called this sub-basement room his “laboratory.” He attached the IV drip into the vein in my right arm and said he was dripping the polio virus into it. He continued measuring me as the container of virus emptied. I filled with dread and fear and my body shook violently. This was death, I thought. I waited for death. When the container emptied, he unhooked me and it was over. My Aunt Gertrude and another person came into the “laboratory.”

They dressed me, then pushed me up the shaft-like tube that ended up in one of the basement rooms on the ground floor, off the hallway. She knocked on our front door in code, one, three, two knocks. My father opened the door. Mother stood behind him. Their faces were emotionless masks, not a snicker or sneer.

“Don't let her eat or drink anything for forty-eight hours. He wants the virus to settle in,” Aunt Gertrude said. So my parents knew what Mengele was doing to me, I thought. Of course, they sold me to him. I felt too weak and spent to think about killing them at that moment. Half of my top lip curled.

“She'll need something to drink sooner than that,” my father said. “This isn't a concentration camp.” It's worse than that, I thought, because my own parents did this to me.

“I'm just repeating what he said,” Aunt Gertrude said and walked away in a huff. It seemed that Aunt Gertrude had become Mengele's assistant.

I didn't know whether they pretended to give me polio or whether the virus was real. I still don't know. I felt as if I had the flu with more severe pain than usual. I did have polio around these years, and my back and legs changed shape. I was most unhappy because I loved to run and dance and walk to Queens Boulevard to buy a loaf of rye bread. I ate half of it as I walked home. I didn't want to be a cripple. I preferred to be dead. And I preferred to kill them before I died. Until I started my recovery, I hadn't remembered about the polio though I knew about the curvature in my upper back, my skinny legs, and extreme sensitivity to physical pain, heat and cold.

In the middle of the night, my father brought me water. “I don't care what he says,” my father said. I gulped the water.

Sometime later, after the inoculation period, Mengele reappeared in our apartment.

“We have to do a second round. I need more advanced equipment,” he said. “I need to take her to the main offices.”

“When will you bring her back?” my father asked.

“Tomorrow,” Mengele answered.

“Take good care of her,” my father said. I added my father to my list of people I would kill. My mother stayed in her bedroom. Marlene was not home. At that moment, my hatred rose stronger than my fear. I didn't feel anger. I became anger. My rage, like a locomotive, swept through my life. I enjoyed the fantasy of killing people. I vomited in the foyer, outside hall, and Mengele's limousine. I had to control my anxiety and depression or I would be ruined and they would win. My depression made me passive and hopelessly heavy. I figured out that if I could think of something pleasurable to look forward to every day, I could survive. A piece of chocolate, the smell of a flower, the breeze on my skin—all these could keep me alive. Montauk Point was always flooded with children. Maybe I would see someone I knew. That anticipation kept the octopus of depression off me, which allowed me to keep fighting. But the injections Mengele constantly gave me in my upper right arm blunted my ability.

I had to leave myself Hansel and Gretel breadcrumbs to get back to my mind and retrieve myself. I knew Mengele would starve me but when he had finished, I would eat again. That would be a pleasure. I would drink water. When I returned home, Mother would squeeze oranges. And she would cook Wheatina in the morning and make it lumpy, the way I liked it. My lips would be chapped and it would feel good to put Vaseline on them.

At Montauk Point, I became a demonstration model as Mengele lectured to a medium-sized audience of handlers, scientists, and specialists. He pointed to a diagram of the human body on a stand, while vials of his poison dripped into me as he kept me on stage in a hospital bed and sometimes a wheelchair.

“She's a good subject for polio,” he taught. He pointed to a large screen filled with illustrations of body parts. In front of everyone, Mengele injected the top side of a tendon below my knee and fastened an IV drip on my arm. I don't know whether fake chemicals came out of the IV both times, or whether one was real, or perhaps both.

I returned from Montauk Point with braces on my legs. I felt determined not to be a cripple but hadn't realized what a huge disease I fought. I lay on my back and made cycling motions with my legs. The second my legs got tired, I stopped and slept. Then I started again. I did this all day and night despite the pain like swords going through me. I dragged myself to the toilet. Eventually, I got rid of the braces and walked.

Months passed, and I returned to school. I had no strength and could hardly lift my arms. The pain felt like a cluster of nails being hammered into my vertebrae. Every time I took a step, the ground fell away. I couldn't stop crying. I couldn't remember my name. I didn't know my address. Mengele sent his Nazi-trained assistants to re-assess me.

Mengele telegraphed, “Close her down.”

“You will remember nothing that we have put in this vault. You will never approach this vault. If you ever touch the door to this vault, you will be electrocuted. You will tell no one of this vault. You will speak to no one of your life. You have never heard of Mengele, Dr. Black, Dr. Schwartz, Dr. Green, Merkel, Merk, or Uncle Charlie. If you remember anything about your treatment under Dr. Mengele, you will explode on the spot.”

Using drugs and electroshock, they sealed this storage unit. The inside girls Mengele worked on remained in the subterranean tunnels within these vaults. They stayed in the middle of a chronic nervous breakdown until I found and rescued them.

Ordinary life, 1956

When I was home from the brothel, and before I was sent to the monastery, I remembered nothing about my real life. I attended regular school and thought that the reason I didn't know anything was because of my stupidity and limitations. I looked for ways to win Mother's love. We were in Manhattan and she admired a gold bar brooch in a jeweler's window on West 47th Street. Later that week, when I was alone in the apartment after school, I made my way to Enterprise Avenue and took the subway downtown, bought the brooch for eight dollars, and gave it to her. My mother most likely did not remember that the child she had left at a brothel and sold to Mengele and whom she was about to send away again, that that child spent her life savings trying to please her. Mother wore the brooch often on her crisp white blouses.

In my parents' ordinary life, they loved avocados and hated to see anything go to waste, not thrive, or die. They bought a thin book on how to grow avocadoes from pits, and learned to place an avocado pit held up by three spaced toothpicks in a jar with water. When the pits sprouted roots, my father transplanted them into a clay pot with dirt, and my mother inspected the textured, bright leaves regularly. They delighted in the growth, and every sunny windowsill had these plants in various stages of development. But I went to waste, my life.

The monastery

The Mafia got its grip on children with the sole purpose of making money. Its leaders were not interested in the spiritual dimension of depravity. But the Illuminati group imposed on the same children its archaic, twisted religious beliefs about extending the rule of their deity, Lucifer. One aspect of these beliefs was that there was a royal bloodline that would birth their rulers. A prophecy had told the Illuminati leaders that my second-born Illuminati child was supposed to rule over our county.

Mother of the heir, 1956

For these Illuminati pregnancies, I had to take up residence away from home. Before I was sent away, I had mind-control sessions to persuade me that I was going to la Madeleine church in Paris, that I was being honored, and that I owed it to Lucifer to obey. They programmed me to believe that I was flying Air France, but instead of driving to the airport, my father switched me to another personality and drove me to a church or monastery in a middle-class section of New York. That's where I would live, with Father Anthony, who dressed like a Vatican priest, and the Brothers. Not until I put this memory together did I realize I had never left New York.

My father parked his car and walked me to the front entrance. I carried my own suitcase. An expensive, engraved sign by the arched wooden door read “La Maison aux Jeunes Filles Perdus”. I was thirteen years old and had already learned some French in Junior High School. My handlers hadn't thought to program me not to learn in a foreign language, and I absorbed its grammar quickly. My brain experienced unimpeded learning. It felt like cold, salty ocean air. At the church's front door, I immediately spotted the mistake in noun agreement, that “perdus” was missing the “e” and should have been spelled “perdues”. The sign meant “lost young girls” and the “e” was needed for feminine agreement. I thought this clumsy mistake should not have happened in France.

Brother Gregory answered the door. He wore a long brown cloak with braided cords and decorations around his neck, appeared chubby and had a forbidding, musty smell to him. A West Highland terrier rushed down the steps and flew to the door. Pow Wow sniffed my feet and never left my side for the rest of his life, except for the times when they sent me home. I would not have survived without this spunky dog.

One of the robed brothers walked me past the entrance to the large kitchen, up the side stairway and to my attic room. My father did not follow, but Pow Wow did. My father did not say goodbye and I didn't say goodbye to him; I just followed the pretend-friar in the robe. My sterile room had a cot with a white enamel head and footboard, a wooden dresser, sink, closet, table, and chair. Its windows were barred. Pow Wow jumped on the bed, and I was able to take in a bit of air and even exhale partway. The furnishings were minimal but much less grim than in the brothel rooms. Father Anthony brought in a bowl of water for Pow Wow, which I thought was a kind gesture. He must have figured out that Pow Wow had become attached to me. All the friars seemed fond of quirky Pow Wow. I sat on the bed relieved not to see pamphlets scattered on the floors and the sharp mumbling of auctions as background noise. It appeared quiet and clean, but I held my head in my hands.

Later that night, a man and a woman entered and told me to undress. Before I left home, Mother had scrubbed me like a bathroom and had given me starched and ironed clothes to wear. I laid my clothes neatly on the cot. Mother yelled if I ever left my clothes crumpled and scattered.

“She's too thin,” the woman said. She was solid, stocky with dyed blond hair pulled back in a bun. She looked like an actor playing the part of a villain in a movie. I had noticed that overweight women always hated my skinniness. The thin, white-haired man with a puffy face and eyes wore a hospital coat. “It doesn't matter,” he said. Apparently he was a doctor. “We'll inseminate her tomorrow.” He poked around my naked body. The woman, whose name was Bertha, came back with a bowl of rice pudding with raisins and a blob of whipped cream on top. I put on my pajamas, bedroom slippers, and bathrobe, sat on the hard chair by the table, ate the bowl of rice pudding and fell right into a heavy sleep—they must have put drugs in it. A round clock on top of the dresser said it was about ten minutes after five in the morning when the team woke me up and examined my body again. “She has shingles,” the doctor said. He went away and came back with pills. He said he had never seen shingles on someone so young, and he couldn't impregnate me until the shingles had run its course, which took about ten days. He said the delay would not affect their schedule. I had no idea what schedule they were on. They discussed whether to send me home or keep me at the monastery. I wanted to go home despite loyal Pow Wow at my feet. They decided to keep me there. I remained a prisoner in this room for ten days with nothing to do, and the burn and sting of shingles around my waist. I missed my mother and sister, even though I had no mother or sister.

Bertha used the time to give me mind-control sessions. “You are at the Madeleine church in Paris, France. You are a queen; everyone loves you. You are special and important. Your babies will rule the world. You will rule the world through witchcraft,” she said as she showed me pictures of Paris, the parks around the church, my room in the church, and Pow Wow. I only went out when she took me with her to test the new mind control. I had to believe I spoke French and ate French food. She took me to the deli, and I had a salami sandwich with mustard and chips with ketchup.

“You are eating a crêpe and croissant,” she said. “Whenever you hear English, you will think you are hearing French.” When I had a bagel, I had to think brioche. The neighborhood seemed somewhat clean and family-oriented, but not stylish like Paris.

Too soon, the doctor said I could be impregnated. My body didn't explode from anguish as it had when the shingles appeared. First I fasted for three days and was only allowed to drink water. A technician shaved my whole body—scalp, eyebrows, arms, legs, pubic area. I can still hear the sound of the electric razor. In the basement tunnel, they started the preparation rituals, calling on Satan, demons, and in particular Lucifer to open my young womb. Cult artists drew black and red ink occult designs over my naked hairless body—lots of swirls and spirals, upside-down crosses, broken Swastikas—then poured blood, semen, and urine over me, while the chorus chanted prayers and invocations, and incense burned constantly. I felt nauseated, and doubly naked without hair. Black candles flickered. The popular 1968 movie Rosemary's Baby captures a bit of the atmosphere of ritual preparations, drugs, devil worship, cannibalism, sacrifices, double binds, and enforced pregnancies, as well as co-opted outsiders.

The church's basement held operating rooms. The doctor used my assigned cult husband's sperm that they had flown in from Israel. He started the artificial insemination, and the Brothers punctured tiny holes around my vagina. “We are conducting spirits into your womb that will accompany and influence the fetus," they said. They claimed test tubes contained my ancestors' spirits and showed me a whole wall of them. The Brothers believed wholeheartedly in the demon and spirit world.

"Tilt the foot of the bed upward. Raise her legs. The sperm has to stay in."

"Keep stimulating her. We need her womb to pulsate."

"Now lower her legs. Let her rest."

"She's cramping. Give her an injection." They gave me morphine.

The workers wore masks, like oxygen masks, while they operated on me. "Clean her up. Put her to bed. Keep her in bed for two weeks. All meals in bed. She can get up to go the bathroom. Every few days, she can walk around the balcony. No bending or lifting. Clean up the dog shit. It creates germs." The last part reminded me of my mother and grandmother, caring about a speck of dust when the whole picture was filthy. My grandmother only let us have machine-made ice cream cones that "no human hands had touched" because she was afraid of our catching germs from strangers.

Puppy mill bitches are made to breed over and over until either they can no longer produce good litters or they die. The doctor took his gloves and hospital coat off, picked up his black bag and left. They determined I was pregnant through urine and saliva tests, and when it grew back, smelling my scalp and pubic hair.

After a few weeks, the Brothers in gray or brown hooded robes let me go downstairs to the kitchen, where I met Rosalita, the Italian cook. She was a pleasant, almost wholesome-looking woman in her forties who liked to mother people and had been an outsider. She always wore her apron, was buxom and comforting. Her smile filled her whole face. Her hands were soft and warm. She stroked my head and rubbed my belly. My young skin was tight and hurt. Rosalita had taken this job because she needed money. She was one of the immigrants they employed and made dependent on them. She would not have known of all the criminal activities going on, but she would have sensed them. Once the Brothers get you in their grip, it's almost impossible to get out even if you weren't born into it. If someone like Rosalita ever talked, the Brothers would have killed her or had her deported.

The Brothers insisted I only eat human flesh. My body screamed for raw fruits and vegetables, and the more human flesh they forced me to consume, the more I wanted to eat raw natural crops. I told Rosalita about my food cravings. When the Brothers weren't watching or at night, she snuck me large tossed salads like my mother made. She made the dressing with balsamic vinegar, olive oil, and mustard; my mother used peanut oil and lemon juice.

As I began to hang out in the kitchen, I became less lonely. I sat at her kitchen table for hours with soothing Pow Wow at my feet. During the day, she snuck me leaves of lettuce and chunks of apple. There was no kindness in the suburban monastery, except for Rosalita in the kitchen. She risked her life to bring me salads. My days were spent finding a way to eat real food, hanging out with Rosalita, making voodoo dolls, practicing the witchcraft my mentor Joseph, who was an advanced wizard, taught me, and soaking up Pow Wow's steadfast love. I could also reverse the witchcraft into white witchcraft and do good, when they weren't watching me and reading my mind. These were years when my non-cult contemporaries learned more advanced math, science, history of civilization, geography, literature. I learned only witchcraft. I had no tutor for academic subjects or even books.

The leaders decided to use my craving for fruits and vegetables to coerce me to do more psychic work. They started to withhold all food. They put spiders on my naked body. All I could think of was how to stop it. “Just kill me. Let me die. No one could live with this,” I said to them.

“Just go through the door,” Joseph said. “Go through the door into the map room. Into the nice map room. The Council is waiting for you there. Oranges, clean clothes, salads that Rosalita prepared herself—better than your mother makes. All you have to do is go into the map room and give us your intelligence.” The Council, what Joseph called “the leaders of your division,” were disguised men wearing robes, plus one woman. They wanted me to discern with my hands where they should strike.

The map room was ice blue and located on the top part of the monastery's tower. It had ornate wood panels, globes of the world, and world maps on the walls. Each session started with torture, putting needles in my gums as I lay on a leather couch and then spinning me in a leather desk chair. The spinning left me feeling as if I had a concussion.

“You will sit here and with your considerable sensitivities, you will tell us which parts of the world are most prone to accept Lucifer as their master.” The woman spoke English with an accent, but I couldn't tell which one. “Put out your hands over this map and tell us where we are succeeding and where we should go.” The men in ice blue robes nodded. I couldn't see their faces. I was required to put my hands over the globe without touching it, and I had to feel where the most spiritual energy came out, and tell them. They had divided the globe and flat maps into the thirteen satanic counties. One county might be huge; others such as Haiti were tiny. The population of a large county was not attuned to the spirit world, whereas people in the tiny counties were more spiritually alive. In terms of spiritual acumen, it would take thousands of Americans and Europeans to equal one individual from the Virgin Islands. The Philippines had two counties. They wanted to know the thirteen worldwide hot spots, which could be cities or whole countries. These spots were always in flux, so they tested them over and over. Going to the map room was a monthly task.

Illuminati babies

These cults operate by destroying what is natural and whole. They want children whose minds they can shatter. A necessary condition of shattering a mind is creating an unbonded and unattached infant. They wanted an unbonded newborn from me but not one addicted to drugs or with brain damage.

Their plan was to shock the fetus through my skin and torture me at the same time, to ensure that I didn't stay emotionally and spiritually connected to the fetus. They put my feet in ice cubes. The medical assistants felt for the fetus' head and avoided it. During the shock, Philomena, who was me, had to go away, leaving the baby. I would not go away. With prenatal electric torture, if the mother stays connected, the mother–child bond is still intact despite the torture. They could not tell whether I left my baby or stayed connected. These were the moments of fighting them with everything in me.

“If these babies are born wrong, we will kill them in front of you.” I was spun in a chair, and a vise squeezed my head. Did I want a baby who would have the same life as mine or worse, or did I want a baby who did not belong to the cult? They upped the electricity. If my children were born bonded and thereby deemed unprogrammable, they could be given a different role, adopted out, or killed. I could feel the babies growing inside me, kicking and being real. With them, I felt I would never again be alone and I could take care of them and give them the love I learned about from Daniel. If I didn't know what to do, he would come to me and teach me. I would fight to protect them. All the electricity in the world could not keep me from my children. Queen Philomena, this pregnant part of me, did not know of the babies we had already lost.

Melissa

One of the first memories I had when I started this trek into re-associating my tormented life came in a dream. In this dream, my one living child took my hand and led me over the hills to a grassy field. I thought the field was in Israel because of the programming, but it must have been in this suburb. There I saw a baby girl in a cradle surrounded by a circle of hooded chanting figures in charcoal gray robes. While I still lived in New York in the 1980s, this dream drew me to remember my four Illuminati infants. The first one, Melissa, looked like Eli, my cult husband. She was delicate, self-contained, and intense. Her soul shone through all her pores. After that breakthrough dream, I stayed shocked for a long time.

When my baby was born, the programmers still could not tell whether I had left the prenatal child emotionally during the electroshock torture. About a week after delivery, they tested the infant. They pricked the baby's left foot to cause pain, then tried to comfort the infant. If the baby accepted comforting, it was bonded. If its body stiffened and turned away in rage, it was unbonded. My Illuminati babies accepted comforting.

It was the first time the parts of me had someone to love since Daniel's death. I trusted the babies, they were all my insiders had, all I would ever have. And the babies trusted me. I didn't leave them for a second, not in the womb or outside. We were good mothers and loved our babies the way Daniel had loved us. We would gladly die for them. We put them on our heart. Their body weight pressed some of our pain away.

All but the third of my Illuminati babies were conceived through artificial insemination, and the first two were born on December 24th in consecutive years. A white-haired, thin man with a puffy face and eyes, in a hospital coat, performed the artificial insemination for each Illuminati pregnancy. His face looked as if he were drowning. They had me copulate during rituals but first they impregnated me with what they said was my cult husband's sperm. I was induced each time and given no painkillers during the labor. My cult husband was usually present for the birth rituals and was kind during the deliveries. He held my hands and head during the hard labors. An adult man was sacrificed during each ritual in which a child was delivered. They wrapped each newborn in the liver from the sacrificed thirty-three-year-old victim and paraded the child around to show to each member of the coven.

My firstborn was delivered on December 24, 1956. The ritual for Melissa's birth took place outdoors, probably in the enclosed back yard of the Holy Brotherhood of Priests. I had been so drugged, I didn't know where I was. The friars passed her around one to the other and put drops in her eyes during this consecration. They wore gray robes with yellow sashes. I wore a white robe with a pale blue sash. Afterward, they told me she had died and implied it was from the drops they administered because she was bonded, because I disobeyed. I never saw her again. It's possible that she was sent somewhere. It's possible that she is alive somewhere. They bound my screaming breasts after they took her away.

The Brothers sent me home for three months, and I attended school, but felt distant from the other students. While I was away, I missed energetic Pow Wow and compassionate Rosalita. At home I was not close to anyone. People walked past me as if I didn't exist. Outside, neighborhood passersby averted their gaze. Perhaps they knew.

Baby Daniel, the heir

My father took me out of morning math class at Oldtown Junior High School just before lunch. I hadn't expected him. My mother had a lunch ready for me, a tuna fish sandwich on wholewheat bread, carrot and celery sticks, a glass of milk made from Walker Gordon non-homogenized milk, and two Mallomars.

I changed out of my plaid skirt and put on slacks, a shirt, and a jacket. The doorbell rang. My father answered the door. Two men in overcoats entered, one carrying a black satchel. They took me under the arms, sat me in a dining room chair in the foyer. They filled a needle and plunged it into my right arm under my rolled-up sleeve. The gray walls spun. The ceiling hit the floor and the floor floated out the window and over the waterfall. Everything grew dark as my parents seemed to rise along the walls.

I didn't know how much time passed but I woke up, fell back to sleep, woke up, fell asleep. I felt bumped and jostled. My elbows hit wood. I felt a helmet on my head and noticed myself wrapped in a blanket with my knees up to my chest. It comforted me to hold my body so tight. I realized then that a box or a crate contained me and that I seemed to be in an airplane. The drugs wore off too soon. I shouldn't have been up. I overheard something about landing in a foreign language. No, I knew the language, French. They were shipping me back to France. I wondered whether my parents were happy that I was gone and whether my sister would miss me. My parents must have been happy because they let the men in. I must have fallen back to sleep, but my head banged as I landed. The men held me under the arms again because it was difficult walking after being cramped in a box.

I was in a limousine surrounded by large men, who gave me more pills to swallow. We were in Paris. I recognized the elegance of the streets and wildness of the traffic. The car pulled up to la Madeleine church. Looking back now, I am not sure whether they did virtual reality programming or only hypnotized me to believe it was Paris. They must have had crates in a warehouse and an apparatus to simulate a bumpy ride.

Joseph Jacobson, my familiar trainer, and Rosalita escorted me into the kitchen, and Joseph sent the two thugs away, allez-vous-en. I buried my head in Rosalita's bosom and shivered. I smelled the food on her apron but was grateful for the comfort.

She appeared happy to see me. Joseph gave me hot chocolate and croissants but I felt too blurry and nauseated to eat. I asked for an orange. Rosalita gave me a cold orange and kissed me. We heard scratching at the door to the basement. Joseph asked if I wanted to see my dog. Pow Wow raced to me, jumped on my lap, and licked my face. I cried and Pow Wow licked the tears from my cheeks. Until this moment, my heart had been a cold stone buried in a coal mine.

Rosalita led me to the small room upstairs. The bed had, as usual, very starched sheets that scratched. My elbows had blood on them. I slept a long time, a drugged sleep. I didn't yet know how long I would be there and still wanted to go home. Pow Wow jumped on the bed and slept by my side, molding his small body to my thigh, then hip and torso as he inched nearer my head. My arms remained crossed over my heart, in the same position as in the crate. I slept more.

As an adult remembering nothing of my past, whenever I passed a Westie on the street, a sense of love and joy exploded in me. Until now I didn't consciously understand why I was so drawn to this breed. Perhaps it's the big round eyes, I thought.

As soon as I was pregnant, I returned to normal school until I began to show. I couldn't concentrate in school or listen to the teachers. My mind was preoccupied with how to survive and keep my children alive. And all my induced learning disabilities remained active.

Much of this Illuminati group's imagery is a warped takeoff from Judaism and Christianity. For example, their targeting the second-born child to be the heir of the "kingdom" may be a reference to the Esau–Jacob story. The religious divisions of the cults believe in demons, spirits, prophecies, and worshipful rituals. But their god is Lucifer and/or Satan. Some religious groups worship one or the other. The group I was born into may have been the umbrella for the various occult religions, since this group worshipped both deities at different times or simultaneously.

My second Illuminati child was born on December 24, 1957. He liked to cuddle. I held him constantly. He slept on my heart, and affectionate Pow Wow was always stretched out by my side. These were excellent days for me. Daniel had dark shiny hair, not curly like the original Daniel, my friend. This infant had the prophecy on his head. The prophecy declared that the second-born Illuminati baby would grow to rule this part of the satanic kingdom. I didn't want that for him.

During the labor pains and delivery, my wrists were tied with rags to the headboard. Father Anthony stayed in the room, and one monk was on one side of the bed and three monks on the other side. No drugs were used. They didn't believe in painkillers. A monk said "Here it comes," and the baby and then placenta appeared. A monk held my baby upside down, and hit his backside. "It's a boy," Father Anthony shouted. One of the monks untied my wrists and another placed Daniel on my chest. We lived happily like that for eight days.

Daniel was the age when babies are circumcised. His consecration to Lucifer took place on a balcony inside this church. The Brothers wore white robes with red embroidery and cords and a black sash. I wore a white robe with red embroidery and a yellow sash. This was considered such an exalted ritual that they wanted some of the bloodline there. My parents wore black robes. The Brothers passed Daniel around. I didn't want them to touch him. The Brothers looked at him adoringly and patted him gently. They acted like new mothers. Some kissed his forehead and chanted softly under their breath. With their fingers they put an ash-like mark on Daniel's forehead, and little crosses all over him. Incense burned. They passed him around from person to person and chanted “Consecrated into our Brotherhood…”

I didn't want my parents near him and felt as tense as a snapped twig. My father handed him to my mother clumsily. He had forgotten to support the head. My mother held Daniel well; her eyes became wild and she said, “This baby should be Marlene's, not hers.” My mother held the baby more tightly and suddenly threw him over the railing. A long way down. He splattered all over. His beautiful head separated and kept rolling away. All the mothers in me rushed together, all the bereft mothers, including the ones who had given birth to the babies in the brothel, whom the Illuminati mothers didn't yet know about. Even the mothers who had had their eggs scraped out ran there in that second. All those mothers gathered and flung themselves over trying to reach their Daniel. We threw ourselves over the railing of the balcony. It happened in less than the opening and closing of an eye. My head was aimed towards my Daniel, but then my body wasn't going forward but backwards. The priests grabbed my legs before I plunged all the way and drew me back up by my ankles. Milk drenched my white embroidered robe as if to nurse the dead. I ran down the side wooden steps and threw myself on top of the pieces of Daniel, his bones, blood, organs, tissue. I rubbed it all on me, smeared his blood and guts all over my face as if my skin could bring him back to life. An eyeball rolled to the side. I put it in my mouth and would not spit it out. I grabbed and held onto one of his leg bones, the femur. The pitch of my cry could have shattered the stained glass windows of Jesus healing children. That was the end of the scene for me but in the balcony, I heard rumblings and my mother screaming, “This baby belongs to Marlene!” as they took her forcibly away. My father at some point pontificated, “This baby was not allowed to be killed. We'll have to go before the Council. There will be trouble.”

I hadn't wanted my children to live. I didn't want them to have a worse life than mine.

The priests who had caught my ankles pulled me away into the kitchen. Rosalita cleaned me up and I never saw the baby Daniel again. The Brothers had to tranquilize me.

Suppose you are in your car going to work and the car's upholstered seats start unraveling, and the frame crumbles, its motor self-chops into little pieces, its steering wheel cracks, and all its windows shatter as its gas spills onto the road. That's what rage that eats the insides of one's body feels like. They coerced me into doing voodoo curses on the vulnerable countries and had prayer teams of false priests chanting for Lucifer to sweep the nations. I didn't care about Korea or Ethiopia or the United States, the country that abandoned me, or even unfeeling suburban residents who strolled through the park without concern. I hated my parents and Joseph, and spent my adolescence planning or trying to kill them.

When I came to after being tranquilized, the Brothers were still in a tizzy. They had all changed out of their ritual garb and into their brown everyday robes. In the two years I was at the monastery, this was the most commotion I heard among the monks. They went from one private meeting to another. I overheard hushed debates about whether to execute or sacrifice Mother, but they worried that since I was missing for six months or longer at a time, it might raise suspicions about the family if she disappeared or died.

They had injected me in my own bedroom, where they kept me prisoner. When I came to, Rosalita brought me freshly squeezed orange juice, warm buttermilk biscuits she had just baked, and café au lait. They still pretended I was in Paris. When I sat up, I felt something hard under the mattress. Someone had put Daniel's femur there. It must have been one of the friars or maids. I still possessed complete memory of the night before. I placed his short, thin bone on my left hip under my underpants, got dressed and put on my coat, and went into the enclosed garden to a spot hidden from view. It became black like evil outside. The earth was cold and hard and I began scratching at it with my nails. I scratched for hours and my fingers bled into the grave and mixed with my tears and breast milk. The friars must have been watching me from a side window, but they left me alone. I kept scratching, bleeding, leaking, and drooling. Then I began humming. Sanity rode its sleigh slowly and kindly back into my fragmented, tortured mind. Halfway down, I found a rock and used it as a tool for digging. When the hole was deep enough, I slipped his bone in vertically and filled the grave with winter dirt. I did not place a marker but memorized where Daniel's bone lay. With the first light, I went back to my room. Later, I heard Christmas carols sung throughout the monastery. They invited the neighborhood to an open house that day. Rosalita had to bake cookies and make punch and eggnog. I cried in my room. Rosalita came in, washed and bandaged my hands, and bound my leaking breasts. I did not leave my room for two weeks. I sat in a chair crying, rocking, grieving, meditating on murder. Rosalita sometimes cried with me, which helped.

There were many discussions after Daniel's death. Joseph thought about sending me home for a while. The international leaders, who were involved in solving the problem of Daniel's having been killed, gave detailed instructions to my handlers about how to close me down. Until the close down, I remembered everything about those last days.

I have recurrent dreams of walking on a narrow path on a cliff that spirals up a mountain. If I lose my concentration for even a moment, I will fall off and plunge down the mountain. I think this is a dream of my fighting for sanity.

It felt like my heart poured out of my body but my heart had become coals, tar, and dust.

In 1968, I visited my mother in New York City when Ned was one and a half years old. Ned is my ordinary-life child, a cult baby but not fathered by one of their higher ups. Todd, my ordinary-life husband, had coerced me into conceiving so that he could avoid the Vietnam draft. I didn't have the electroshock torture during this pregnancy. During the visit, Mother took baby Ned to the open window in her bedroom, and both Todd and I feared she would throw him out. Todd didn't know the history unless he had my black book, and I was not conscious of my life at that time.

The leaders decided to hide the fact that their heir had been killed and wanted me pregnant again fast. They decided against getting a substitute baby and pretending that baby was mine, because they were quasi-purists and believed in prophecies. But they didn't order more of Eli's sperm because they didn't want the international community to know of the murder of the heir. So they let the Brothers impregnate me live. The Brothers lined up outside my door dutifully and reluctantly. Some of them were not able, but I became pregnant and delivered the infant privately, not in a ritual. Because she was deformed, they gave her away.

Then they sacrificed my last Illuminati baby, a boy, whom I named Matthew. The eighth day after his birth, the altar was prepared for Matthew's consecration. I sat at the round table in the kitchen with Rosalita. Joseph took happy Matthew into a side room and tested him. He returned and said something like, “Il n'est pas programable.” The ritual began with the chanting, prayers to Lucifer, incense. Only several priests were present. My parents hadn't been invited. Joseph lifted his left arm that held the sacrificial knife. I lifted mine and aimed my knife at Joseph's heart. He caught my arm midway, let go of his knife, and plunged my knife into Matthew who was in the middle of running with his chubby legs in the air while lying on his back. He plunged the knife into Matthew with my hands trapped under his. Matthew looked stunned and confused, and died instantly.

The morning after my fourth Illuminati baby was killed, I felt something hard under my mattress. I felt around and pulled out a bone, thin like Daniel's but about an inch and a half longer. It must have been Matthew's femur. One of the Brothers must have dissected it and brought it to me. That same morning, Rosalita let me keep a breakfast spoon. If the Brothers knew, they could have killed her for just this one thing. After midnight, I crept into the garden and found the memorial spot where I had buried Daniel's bone. This time, I dug with my spoon. I dug all night. I lay his bone parallel to Daniel's. I had made two graves for two brothers. I sat there all night and felt a force from above rock me softly and horizontally, back and forth, side to side. Sometimes this force stroked my spine. Slowly sanity slid back.

The cult world got wind of Daniel's death. Immediately my county plummeted in its standing in the international world. We were considered a county that had lost its power. A smile snuck onto half of my face. The right side of my lip curled and tears came only from one eye during my incessant crying. This half smile is the victory moment of these years.

The sacrifice of Matthew is one of the early memories I had in New York City about twenty-five years ago. In the 1980s, I got a coveted appointment with a therapist in this field, Sandy Flowers, and traveled to Virginia to discuss this memory with her. I didn't know whether it was true. Before I just thought I was a regular somewhat depressed and anxious person trying to get noticed in the big city. Now I was finding out ridiculous horror stories that couldn't be true. Or could they? I was sure they weren't true, but why did they pour out of me with recurrent themes and real emotions that came from a deeper place than my front person had ever known? What did I have to benefit from these memories? There was no benefit, only hardship.

Hatred

While at the monastery before my babies were born, I looked for help. During the day, I managed to take a walk outside. I still thought I was in Paris and tried speaking French to people. "Voulez-vous m'en aider?" They didn't respond. Then I noticed the street signs and realized I was in America. I didn't know I was in a suburb, but that didn't matter. I was used to their tricking me and making me think I was somewhere I wasn't, even on a different continent. I called out, "Help, help, I need help." People looked away and crossed the street. I might as well have been speaking French or Greek. They could tell I was pregnant. In the morning, mothers and children were in the park. I was weak and hadn't eaten for about twelve hours, a long time for me. I should have asked Rosalita for a stash of food. "Somebody please help me with my baby." One of the women called a policeman, who returned me to the church. My hatred of people grew. The Brothers locked me in. I sat in my room rocking myself for a long time, holding my breath, not swallowing. No mother in me knew about the others, but all the babies were present with me. The rage turned to grief and whipped around me as if I had a prehensile tail.

Pow Wow

Valentine's Day brought a ritual. The executioner started skinning Pow Wow alive with a small knife. There was nothing I could do to stop them. They tied me on a wooden chair, and wouldn't let me close my eyes or turn my head. He whimpered and tried to get close to me, leaving bloody paw prints in concentric circles. Finally, he died, ending his merciless agony. It was a terrible end for the most compassionate and loyal of dogs. Shortly afterward, they sent Rosalita away. They lied and said she had committed a crime. I don't know whether they killed or deported her. Either they figured out that she had aided me or they wanted to torment me further. Or perhaps they got wind of a possible investigation. Honest police could have made Rosalita talk. She wasn't a mind-control victim. I lost what sanity I had left. My severe closedown followed.

A current friend who has a hard life but with no cult abuse says she would never write a memoir because she doesn't want to relive her life. If one is dissociated, one has to relive the events in order to get all parts of the brain to recognize one's life and one another. One has the choice of dying in denial or living with excruciating truths. One has to decide whether knowing oneself and the truth about one's life is worth it. If there is a hunger to find oneself and take one's mind back from programmers, if there is a thirst to know one's life no matter how brutal the knowledge, then even a flash of freedom and knowledge is worth it. I have chosen to spend most likely the last decade of my life in this search. Knowing about my life lets me have compassion for myself.

A false memory, 1980

The memory appears early in my attempted recovery when I live in New York City. A nail sticks up out of the wood floor in my apartment near Amsterdam Avenue. I pound it with my hammer; rage pours out and a memory vaguely comes into view. One night after Joseph had killed my babies, he was enclosed in his bath. One part of me stole a hammer from the tool shed, another snuck down the halls and into his bathroom, and others pounded on his head. I hit him once with the full force of my rage. He became unconscious or died after my first strike.

Only rage could have made that force. Once you release rage, it keeps pouring out. Afterward, I feel a peace. It is as if the sea has opened and allowed me to kill. The memory is still hazy. By the time the nail is flush with the wood floor, I remember killing Joseph, but the memory is in pieces. I see a print of the 1793 oil painting “The Death of Marat” by Jacques-Louis David, and the impression of killing Joseph comes more into focus. In the painting, Marat lies in an old-fashioned bathtub much like Joseph's. Someone has assassinated him. He lies as if in a pietà, with his arm draped to the side like Michelangelo's “Pietà”.

In 2013 I tell Alison about killing Joseph. She is shocked at my lack of remorse, and says my response doesn't match my reaction to my other crimes. When we investigate, it turns out that I don't have remorse because it never happened. Finally my internal system flashes up the truth about killing Joseph. I see the scene. I was in the monastery cellar; the Brothers projected a slide of David's “The Death of Marat” from their slide projector. Marat, just assassinated, was in the bathtub. His arm hung to one side. The Brothers then projected a slide of Joseph's face, then a white closet door, a hammer, and a knife with a black handle, me walking in my long white nightgown, Joseph apparently dead in the bathtub. In my bedroom, my nightgown with splotches of wet hung on a hanger. “This is what happened.

This is what you did. Link the pieces," the Brothers said. They played off my rage and sorrow about my children being murdered.

In my deepest mind, a core belief about myself formed: I believed I had killed him. The Brothers gave me the signposts in the slides. It was classical "false memory" programming, with the purpose here of making me believe I was a natural murderer. It turns out that I couldn't kill. When they started chopping ankles off one of their designated sacrifices or skinning someone alive, then I could, but only to prevent worse and inevitable suffering.

Chronic shock defines those 1980s days of breakthrough memories. I have to digest that I am a prostitute, breeder, murderer, bereaved mother. All that means that I am not a regular girl from Queens, or a regular dancer trying to create in Manhattan, or a regular person in any way. It means I am a freak of society and somehow have to come to grips, get a grip, swallow it. I fight with these memories, but don't even approach in consciousness anything about also being a kidnapper of babies.

Before I remember much, I go to Shakespeare & Company bookstore on Broadway and 81st Street and gravitate to the fiction, poetry, and self-help sections. After memories begin, I find myself looking at the true crime books. In the college I attended, no one reads true crime. It is like watching television and considered gross. But there I sit on the floor in the bookstore, examining these books that have more to do with my life than any of the highbrow books. It is winter because my long black coat flares around me on the floor like a pool of darkness.

Ordinary, middle-class Jewish girl from Queens finds out she is a forced member of a secret, evil cult, that her parents, consciously or not, sell her into slavery. How do I do an about-face and accept who I am? Gradually. I combat shock and exhaustion. I decide somehow to stand by myself, no matter what. All the while, they torture me into submission and program my mind to forget what it recovers. This is truly a dance of one step forward, two backward, hand stands, tight ropes, and somersaults. But in some people, the need to know the truth can carve a path in ancient stone, can become a mountain stream in forbidding land.

Mrs. Twartski, Mengele, and my other programmers had put mind-control programs in me at an early age to perform certain tasks such as prostitute, accomplice, thief, and kidnapper. It was easy for them to call out the personalities who performed these roles, and for me to go into a robotic state, do whatever I was told to do and have no memory of doing it. It's good to know who one is but if one has had a life like mine, remembering can also eat one's bones up. I think one reason the cult leaders contaminate lives to the extent that they do is to encourage the victim/perpetrators they create to choose not to remember. They also up the torture to ludicrous degrees so that outsiders would not believe these stories—the same method the Nazis used. I have heard memoirists say they enjoyed writing their life stories. Writing this memoir is not enjoyable.

The Mafia side of the monastery

Assassinations

These “Brothers” must have been part Illuminati and part Mafia because we had to do many illegal activities, the kind of crimes the Mafia is known for. I had two cult accomplices, or rather I was their accomplice. One was Eli, the cult husband whose sperm fathered three Illuminati babies. The other was the man they would marry me to and who would father my child in regular life. As I approach these memories, the dental pain is severe. Every time I get close to a memory, I feel big needles going all the way down into my gums. The torture was to reinforce no telling, no remembering.

Eli and I were stationed near the church in a bar that had extensive wood paneling and rooms off to the side. I was between thirteen and fifteen years old, and wore very high heels that I could never walk in now, a red dress, and black underwear. I crossed my legs and swiveled from side to side on a bar stool as Eli played the crowd. Eli, four years older than I and a good manipulator, went around getting men interested in having sex with me and paying him in advance. Then he went up to a previously designated man, slapped him on the back and said “You go first.” I proceeded into the room on the side of the bar with the targeted first man and once inside, started stripping slowly. Eli secretly entered from the other door. When my dress was at my feet, Eli stabbed the designated target in the back. Eli and I raced out onto the street before anyone knew what had happened. I had trouble running in my shoes, and he didn't wait for me. Separately, we returned to our hideout, the monastery. Another time I was already in the bed placed in the side room of the bar and with the designated victim on top of me, when Eli walked in and stabbed him.

After the men were murdered, we had to report to the police chief in his headquarters. There we received extensive programming not to recognize faces. A lineup of men sat on chairs and wore brown paper bags over their faces. The paper bags had a flap that opened and closed. Someone opened the flap so that we could see the face. A man in a police uniform asked, “Can you remember this face?” We answered, “No.” “Is this what the face looks like?” was the next question. If we answered “Yes,” we received two shocks of electricity. When we answered incorrectly, we received none. Eventually, we were too confused about the truth to answer at all. They demonstrated later with white sheets of paper, and graph paper. They repeated this quiz until we recognized no faces and saw only brown paper bags or white sheets or graph paper.

Drugs

The monastery was also a cover for a drug ring. We delivered packages of drugs to a nearby schoolyard. For the drug sales, the cult used my to-be husband in ordinary life, Todd. Todd had grown up in Flatbush, Brooklyn and lived with his parents. He was also generational cult and one year older than me. The dealers put vials of drugs in my socks and in Todd's coat pocket. Somebody waited at a schoolyard for the drug packages. Sometimes Eli was used as well. I had a role even when my pregnancy showed a bit, usually in my fourth month. The male collected the money. When they had a huge shipment of drugs and an order, we took a baby stroller with a blanket covering it. I would pretend to be distracted and leave the stroller for a moment. When I returned, the stroller would be heavy with drug packages placed underneath the baby blanket. We pushed the stroller back to the monastery, where Father Anthony received and unloaded it. After that, I was not involved until the next delivery of drugs. These exchanges were somewhat less dangerous than the assassinations because no one got killed, and the planning was less extensive.

Kidnapping

Father Anthony, or one of the Brothers, showed me out the door. I left the monastery with the blanketed stroller. I wore a loose coat and a big floppy hat, which made me look older. A man was with me, Todd or Eli, occasionally a different Mafia gangster. We walked with this empty stroller. We passed a policeman who was in on the plan. We crossed the street by the school, and continued walking up the path and circling into the pastoral park. The man pretended to be my husband. We reached the water fountain. We passed somebody right near the water fountain—my cue. I said to the pedestrian standing by the fountain, “Could you watch my stroller for a second?” I went to get a drink of water. After I counted fast to ninety while drinking water, I returned to the stroller. When I came back, a baby was visible in my stroller. I proceeded with a heavier stroller, around the park and back the way I came. The male I was with took the stroller into the monastery. Sometimes I heard a baby cry. Father Anthony said to me “Go to your room” as he lifted something out of the stroller. Five times it was a baby. The other times, drugs were in the stroller.

I don't know where they got the babies. Either they stole them from innocent people or the babies were bred to be sacrificed at rituals and the parents were given money.

Knowing about these episodes crushes me the most. It would have been better if we were all killed. I will never know what happened to the babies, whether their parents searched and grieved for them, or what kind of life they were deprived of.

Closedown

Late in my recovery process, I remember this closedown. The awareness starts with body memories, stabbing and aching upper back pain that at first I think the rainy weather causes. I have headaches and a burning under my facial skin that I mistake for sunburn.

I lay stretched out, stomach down, on a stretching rack with my hands and ankles tied. The Brothers stretched me and threw babies and dolls at me. My upper back took the hit and my cheeks burned with shame and humiliation. I vomited as they stretched and spun me because I was already half unconscious and overdosed. They called out my most vulnerable part, Baby Jane, who could tolerate very little. During the worst of this abuse, God or a compassionate force took me away from my body. He held me far away while the Brothers kicked and punched me and it felt good to be with Him or It. I was to believe that I had attended Oldtown Jr. High School and Pleasant Hills High School all these years, and that I was an average student and didn't have a boyfriend and wasn't looking for one. My sister was special and I was ordinary, my sister was beautiful and I was ugly. My parents loved me and I loved them. To make me believe these lies, the brothers tortured me. The methods of torture had been set up in the pathways and in Mengele's towers. The new programmers built on those and added stretching me on a wheel, whipping me as they spun me and peed on me.

When they poured blood over me and told me it was my babies' blood mixed together, some got in my eyes, and I screamed, breaking me out of the trance. They threw me on the spinner, tied my wrists and ankles, and spun me. God or a force of good came to me then and put itself between my spun body and dissociated parts. It said, “My beloved daughter.” It felt like a field of wild flowers and I was not alone. Sunlight streamed into the damp dark basement tunnel. But does love keep you alive for a life like this?

As the memories emerge, the parts who hold them feel rage, then exhaustion during the day that turns into heart spasms during the night. Depression and anxiety hook elbows and dance in my brain.

They expelled me wearing only a loose old coat and no shoes. My father's car waited outside. He got out of the driver's seat and opened the door to the back seat. He told me to put some clothes on in the back seat and he held a blanket over me. The clothes were too tight and the bra didn't fit at all. My mother hadn't realized how seven pregnancies in a row changes a teenager's body. I lay down on the back seat. My body had scratch and whip marks despite the Vaseline. My breasts leaked Matthew's milk.

My father drove to LaGuardia Airport instead of home. I had to go to Air France, walk back, pass a store, and buy a pack of Dentyne gum. The gum signaled to my chopped up, crushed brain that I was back in the States from France. I walked through the airport like a robot. It was before the days of strict airport security. I chewed the gum. My father then drove me back to the family apartment. I remembered the apartment and the hill it was on but nothing else.

I entered. My mother and I nodded to each other. I went to my bedroom. My sister's bed was empty. Her clothes had been removed. My father said she was at college. I was alone with my parents.

Once I returned home, a phase of my life ended. I remained a prisoner in their apartment until they moved to Long Island and I went away to college

The closedown the Brothers performed was so severe that I remembered nothing from this period of my life until I had a massage from a gifted physical therapist in New York City around 1992. She pressed on a swollen tendon on my left side of my breastbone and out came my fourteen-year-old head resting protectively over a small head. I burst into tears that were sealed away for about thirty-five years. I felt a baby's head nestling into me. He had black straight hair. I could smell him and knew his name was Daniel. I couldn't stop crying. Were it not for this tendon, I may not have ever rejoined in memories my babies born to the Illuminati and the kingdom of evil and shame.

NINE

I have absorbed emotional and cognitive impressions from the infants in me and am translating them into words. The adults in me are endowing what the infants and children communicate with some perspective. I will try to tell this inconceivable story more or less chronologically.

My handlers designated the thirteenth infant in me, who was really the fourteenth split, to be the queen of the Illuminati and transfer demonic power to world leaders. They used spinning and electroshock to split parts off from this original, pitiful infant. These splits live in rarefied air and are only for certain people to have contact with. Some of this mind control took place in one of the programming rooms in Pleasant Hills. Grandpa Max showed me the color ice blue, but its feeling was black. He put a tiny crown on me, and as I grew older, gave me a globe and a scepter to hold in each hand. The leaders' goal was to maintain the seed of power, and rule a new world, all for the glory of Lucifer.

As soon as I tell Alison these “secrets,” I think I will be stricken dead. I am now lying on her black leather sofa, with her black and white dog that offers comfort at exactly the right moments at my curled-in feet. I have a visual of Lucifer extending his black claws. They showed many trick pictures during the programming. “These could be my last words,” a child part in me says out loud. Lucifer extends his black claws. I am always stunned by what comes out of my mouth. Alison's dog raises his compassionate head. She replies, “Did you ever see Lucifer?” I say, “They showed me pictures of things like big black claws and dark smoke.” She answers, “Just as God doesn't act in the world except through people, neither does Lucifer.”

These memories did not slip out like a malted drink from a straw. A feeling would sting deep and hard. A dream would turn into a haunting nightmare. Body memories flicker in and out but are as severe as pain in real time.

My grandfather and uncles drugged, spun, and shocked me. I vomited. Somebody said, “She's going to be a government baby. She's going to get our monarchs to help us.” My neck hurts. They had a vise around my head, squeezing it. My grandfather yelled, “You have to get used to a crown.” He must have tightened the vise, because as I remember this initiation, my right eye feels like it's popping out. I have other body memories of chills. “We have to get her used to the freezer,” and they wiped off all the goo from my body that they use for electroshock and put me naked into a little, old freezer. This second bedroom programming took place regularly.

I was in the back seat of a limousine. My grandfather held me in a white blanket. It was a long drive, and I slept most of the way. He folded the knuckles of his left hand and closely examined his polished fingernails. He had his usual self-satisfied, sticky smile. When we got to our destination, we went underground. Shadows were on curving-above-us walls and gray darknesses. Someone carried me a long way. It was bumpy; I thought the bumps were fun.

Once we arrived, it went quickly. Men took my clothes off even though it was chilly and wrapped me in a black blanket and put a crown and blue cape on me. A man sat tied up in a metal chair that rolled. He was slumped over, asleep, and almost fell on me when they put me on his lap. He felt soggy. Two men held guns to his temples, one on each side, even though he was asleep and didn't know what was happening. A third much older man unzipped the seated man's pants, took out part of his body, and touched it to part of my body. He performed this task very politely as if he were serving lobsters at a dinner. “Long live Lucifer. Long live his kingdom.” Other men said words out loud in a language I didn't yet know. Then they gave me back to my grandfather, whom people congratulated. He held me under my chest and thighs and flew me around the room as if I were an airplane, then he held me under my shoulders and legs and flew me again. It wasn't fun. He could have dropped me. Maps of the world hung on the walls I flew by. Everyone applauded and shouted, “Long live Lucifer, long live his queen of the twentieth century.” Other men who wore white gloves dressed me, and my grandfather and I exited to applause, as if we were on a stage in a theater. We passed long lines of grownups; many had children with them, who were waiting to be blessed by the Illuminati leaders, who were the royalty from other counties. This county wasn't number one until the 1950s.

On the way out, we passed blond children in cages. They all had that Doris Day look—eager, scared, almost dumb, and pretty. We went past all the dark rooms with very low ceilings. Someone crawled as he held me. We drove on the bumpy road, onto the smooth road, and the bright stars, pale moon, and highway lights shone during the long drive home. Why do they shine on me when no one cares? I wondered.

The next monarch, 1945

I was much older when I returned to underneath this official palace, and which we were later led to believe was the White House. I was about two years old. We followed exactly the same path in a black limousine. When we got to the man in power for whom we made this trip, they placed me on his lap, like the first time I was there, but he was not asleep and slumped over. He didn't feel soggy but hard and tight. He sat still, but was looking around alertly. I was surprised by how plain looking he appeared. I wore a crown and pale blue cape. Part of this man's body, the part that came out of his zipper, touched mine that was normally in my underpants but it had to be an exact spot. I didn't understand why we should have to drive a long distance for that. Men put me on a slab. Someone poured sticky stuff out of a silver pitcher over my front as other men said words in different languages. They rubbed it up and down me. Someone else told me it was semen and blood. I cried because the stuff they put on me burned my skin. Some leaked into my eyes. The pain of the skin irritation reminded my body of my Bear Mountain birth ritual. I had the same loop in my left nipple. The prayers asked for owning and conquering, world dominion. I must have been washed before the buggy ride, but my front still burned from what they put on me. I think they put a vise on my head again and turned the screw. If I ever told, they would make it very tight on my head and kill my parents. I also had drugs and felt woozy.

Queen or death

The torture for me, the master programmer's grandchild and the designated hidden queen of the Illuminati, started young to force me to choose between being queen and death. The fact that I am still alive might make you think that I fought for life, but I did want to die. I didn't want my life. No one would.

Earlier, and twice today in September 2013, I heard screaming and crying inside me, then it felt like a breakthrough and release. My left and right big toes hurt. Grandpa had put the needles in straight to the bone. He concentrated very hard on the torture, as if he were a painter and not aware of anything but his canvas. When Mengele tortured, he was aware of the people around him, craved an audience, and was exhibitionistic. Mengele created dramas and liked to work with groups. Grandpa only worked on individuals in contained environments. He was a womanizer and a dandy socially, but when he worked he was entirely focused on his methodology.

This memory is coming in slowly. It drags its feet against my brain. I know I had the spinning, drugs from injections or rags soaked in gas or both, freezing, torture with a band around my head, and needles to the bones, but I don't know yet what more the queen had to do.

Grandpa Max asked my internal parts whom he made from the thirteenth infant, “Which one of you is going to be queen? I need a queen. We will keep doing this until you die, or agree to be queen. Everyone bows down to the queen bee. The queen killer bee. The child queen killer bee. The princess queen killer bee.”

At exactly midnight, when I was three and a half, the queen's training began. Relatives gathered in the living room for my initiation. My grandfather took me into the second bedroom of his apartment. He started by shaving my head and drew sections on it labeled with numbers and letters such as A3, C6, J25. He hit specific parts deliberately with his hammer. Most of his pounding was on the right side toward the center.

I had to wear a head covering until my hair grew back. Then Grandpa spun me in the spinning chair, put needles in my feet, and whipped me. Afterward, I had to aim darts at the dartboard on the back of his door. No matter how dizzy I was, if my dart did not hit the target, he said, “You have to try harder, do better. If you don't get it this time, we'll starve you, shock you. Maybe this hit on the head with the hammer will make you aim better.” Sometimes he used a rubber tipped hammer. When I was older, we had archery competitions to perfect our aim. Chaos thrives during rituals, but the leaders are supposed to be precise and accurate. Grandpa was preparing me for my role as a psychic killer. I had to reach the correct target. I had to be able to aim even if I had alcohol in me. Some of the killings would take place at political parties. Accuracy and security were always prominent in mind-control training.

In my grandparents' living room, the relatives enjoyed one another's company. They laughed, joked, told stories, imitated people. The air was electric with exciting energies. After I appeared, everyone was quiet in the living room. I could barely walk after the tortures. My grandmother directed me to her kitchen table. She showed me two tarot cards: a skeleton riding a donkey on the left, and on the right, a sun with a crowned woman sitting on a throne and holding a scepter and globe. I didn't know the word “tarot” yet and thought of them as picture cards. Grandma sat in a chair by mine and leaned over me, placing her weight on one elbow. “Which do you want?” she said as if I were choosing between an oatmeal and a peanut butter cookie. She explained the meaning of the cards, though I think I could have guessed it on my own. The sun and globe meant we would have world dominion. The crown and throne represented my role as queen. The skeleton warned that I'd be killed if I told or misbehaved. Even as a small child, it was clear to me that she asked me to choose between being queen and dying.

“Then we'll redo the torture until she changes her mind,” he called out from the second bedroom. Blurry though I was, I consistently chose the death card. There were sighs of disappointment from the living room. My mother said that I was a disappointment, and now the family would think poorly of her. Grandpa said Mrs. Twartski would have to do some of the programming, that my grandmother wasn't productive enough. “He's just interested in having another affair,” the adults whispered. My grandfather took me back to the spare room and hit me over the head to “clarify” my brain, but I kept choosing death. The needle in my left lumbar spine said, “You must be queen.” Needles penetrated my feet, the torture for the program “You must never run away”. The people inside who held the emotional pain, which stings deepest with clawing nails, suffered the worst.

The future

My Uncle Richard, the movie producer, took me into one of the programming rooms and showed me films of what he said were future events in the world. He claimed the prophets foresaw these events. Some of the events were ones that have now occurred, but not exactly as the films depicted. Since it was the 1940s, the films were black and white, and the buildings, cars, planes, and clothing were of that era. A few examples of the events are: a man tipping his top hat while being driven in a motorcade; a man in a different motorcade sitting doubled over, dead; a rifle sticking out of a window; buildings blown up; planes crashing into a building which looked like the Empire State Building; tall buildings crumbling and falling; a limousine crashing into a serpentine tunnel. There were other scenes that concerned more politicians, movie stars, and the financial districts. The people's faces were blacked out with a rectangle.

The film's soundtrack had commentaries such as "…and this disaster will occur…" while Uncle Richard made comments such as "It will be called 9–1–1." He didn't pronounce it "nine-eleven". This was before 9–1–1 was the emergency telephone number. Some of the events depicted, such as a stock market crash, have not happened, or have not happened yet. Uncle Richard insisted that they all would take place within my lifetime. At the end, the film spoke of "these accomplishments". Either the Illuminati prophets were particularly gifted, or the group actually planned some of these treacheries years ahead of time and caused them to occur. I didn't free myself of the belief in the Illuminati prophets' magical abilities until I retrieved these forbidden memories. Uncle Richard said that some of their prophets had predicted that I would be a traitor. In this, at least, they were correct.

Don't cry training

It's pouring outside today, and it's pouring inside me, but I have not been able to shed one tear. The program not to cry is that strong. When I was three and a half, I cried all the time, and overheard a conversation between Mrs. Twartski and my grandfather:

GRANDPA: "She's too delicate. We should have killed her when she was an infant."

MRS. TWARTSKI: "We couldn't because of the prophecy."

GRANDPA: "We can stop her crying, but I don't know what to do about her soul."

MRS. TWARTSKI: "She's a delicate flower. We already gave her the pillow suffocation to stop her crying."

GRANDPA: “We'll have to do the bathtub drowning.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “Where?”

GRANDPA: “Here.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “With who, me or her?”

GRANDPA: “You.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “What temperature?”

GRANDPA: “Lukewarm.”

Mrs. Twartski filled the tub about one-third up. I saw her fingers feeling the water coming out of the faucet. Grandpa had a stopwatch.

GRANDPA: “I'll time it. Watch if the bubbles in the water become less. I'll be looking at the watch.”

MRS. TWARTSKI: “Any time you cry, you will go under the water.”

GRANDPA: “And one time we will forget to bring you back up. So don't cry too many times.”

Mrs. Twartski undressed me in the bathroom. She put me in the tub and on my back, pushed me under the water. I couldn't breathe. I wanted air. Terror made me fight. She lifted me up. Eventually, I cried, and they did it again. They must have done this about ten times, but on different days. When they had finished programming me, Mrs. Twartski dried me off and dressed me in the bathroom. Grandpa told Grandma to give me some cookies.

“Feed her yourself,” Grandma said, her blank blue eyes like knives as she slammed her bedroom door. The pictures on the wall shook. I didn't know why she was angry, but thought it might be because of me.

The sound torture's scratching siren blocked out memory. “No one will remember this event” was its purpose.

Some of the torture in Grandpa's second bedroom prepared me to be the masonic queen. Some divisions of the Masons are under the Illuminati, but Masons in the other divisions have no knowledge of these practices. He blew tiny hard black balls at me through a straw. They woke me up when I drifted off into sleep. Grandpa drew the masonic staircase up my spine, step one, two, three and so on to the crown on my head. He said, “The queen has to climb all these steps. You can't lead your people until you have achieved the highest order.” He blew the hard little balls so that each one hit a certain vertebra in my spine that corresponded to the masonic step he worked on. “If you want to be queen, you have to kill with your own hands. It's an honor to kill and be queen. That's how you help your people. If you can't kill, you're no good. People who can't kill are good for nothing. You can't walk up the steps without killing. You have to climb all the steps. The top three are the Illuminati where you belong. Your mother is only at the middle. Your sister is at the bottom with your father, but you belong at the top, like me.”

I notice that when I write about the masonic structure, my handwriting goes from large to minuscule.

Grandpa's face became almost all mouth, moving wide and rapidly. The clear brown skin, beady dark eyes, fierce concentration like a diamond cutter before the first strike—his concentration on pulling apart without tearing, and inserting without rupturing—all loomed. Maybe my mother objected so strongly to my dark complexion because it reminded her of his, though his had an undercoating of yellow and mine at that time had a foundation more of pink. Or perhaps Mother was just a common racist, like so many of her generation.

I feel hollow now with gashes of pain. Nothing hooked me to life.

The strongest split

I see myself climbing on the bathtub edge, opening the medicine cabinet, looking for a razor blade. I was three years old. Such a despairing child could attract attention. They used the old standby of trickery to attempt to strengthen me.

In the Pleasant Hills tunnel programming spaces, I saw six little dolls projected onto the wall before me. My grandfather and his projector were behind me. He said, “These parts all came out of you. I saw them leave. Let's see how brave each one is.” He started at the right hand side and stuck a pin in the first one. I saw his very large hand projected on the wall. I heard a scream but didn't know where it came from. He did this to each projected image of a doll, with screams, and said, “I'm taking you,” to the fourth doll that he said appeared the bravest. With his projected, enlarged hand like a monster's, he pulled that doll towards my body and threw away the other five dolls. “You'll never get them back, but you don't want them back, because they're weak and they cry. Whenever you cry, you'll lose another part of yourself.” He squeezed my waist and ribs and said, “Now we've got the strong part in you for good.” He put a cape, crown, and scepter on that imaginary fourth split, gave it a globe, and said, “Here's our county—this is what we have to rule.” I was sucking my thumb.

“Now you don't have to die, because you have a much stronger person in you. This is the bravest, strongest part of you. Do you believe it came from you?”

“For that answer, you will have to go back in the freezer.” When I was gradually freezing, it was as if a large pendulum swung back and forth within my whole body about to erupt and shatter me into frozen chunks. When he let me out, he asked, “Where do you think that part came from?”

“That's good. That will be your strong part, who will go to the monarchs and serve our lord and master.” He kept building on an illusion, as all mind control does, but I couldn't stop crying. Uncle Sidney said, “We should give her a bottle.” They did.

Grandpa considered himself a visionary, always charting the changing world and monitoring the density of evil. He believed or pretended that he could sense evil from that distance. World maps with colored pins covered the walls like in the basement programming spaces and in the monastery. Red ones indicated the countries these groups aimed at; black ones were supposed to be already dominated by evil.

The blue angel of mercy leaped into my mind like a loyal puppy. I could get away from all of this if I just had the angel with me. But despite all the suicidal programming they hounded me with, they wanted me alive. Perhaps that is why they sent Daniel to me at this moment. The tricks with the camera and projector couldn't strengthen me, but he could. My grandfather continued to do what he called work-ups. Twenty freezers were in the secret cellars where the endowment of the important men took place. He kept increasing my time in the practice freezers in the Pleasant Hills hidden tunnels to build tolerance. When I got back home from the basement tunnels, my mother offered me tomato soup with rice in it.

It surprises me that the Nazis treated their families tenderly as they destroyed many millions of others. The family knew what happened in my grandparents' spare room, as civilization knew what happened in the concentration camps in Eastern Europe. My grandfather travelled the world turning children's minds into fallow fields. He must have accidentally killed many, as he did in his hometown.

Refrigerators

It was a year later. I'd had a year of Daniel's love before they killed him. This scene happened after he was dead.

“Rosie, do you have the fridge empty yet?”

“It's almost empty, Max. Just a second.” He dragged me into the kitchen. Grandma had the contents of the refrigerator sitting on the oval kitchen table near the window. “Look how you're inconveniencing your grandmother, making her do all this extra work, when she should be cooking dinner.” He lifted my rigid body into the empty fridge, and closed the door. It was black and freezing. For a long time now, I had been used to the state of no comfort. My bones felt stiff and hard. There was no air to breathe. If he didn't let me out, I would be another one of those tragedies found on the sidewalks of Pleasant Hills, I thought. Every now and then, there was a child who died in our neighborhood. They were found in discarded refrigerators left out on the streets. The explanation adults gave was that the children played in them, the door closed, and then they were locked in and suffocated. People got fines for not taking the doors off their refrigerators. No murder charges. Whenever I heard those stories, or passed a discarded fridge, my heart would freeze. I passed out in this fridge. When he took me out and revived me, he said, “You must be one of us. You can't run away from being one of us. You have to be a slave like all the others.”

“I don't want to be one. Let someone else be one. Let Rhonda be one.”

“You both have to be one. I'm going to teach you a lesson until you want to be one.” He kept freezing me until I relented. Grandpa timed me in the ice box. He went up to eighteen and nineteen minutes, but when he opened the door, I was unconscious, so he knew he had gone too far. My fingertips and ears were like glaciers. Grandma put earmuffs on me, but that made them worse. I thought my ears would fall off like icicles. My grandmother put cold compresses on me to thaw me out. My grandfather told me he wanted me to punish babies, to kill babies. If I didn't, they would kill other children by putting them in the ice box. That was one of the queen's "duties". What should I do, Daniel? My heart squeezed together just like it had when I had a heart attack on the sidewalk after Daniel died. If I kill babies, babies will be dead. If I don't kill babies, children will be dead. "You must kill babies, or you can't be queen. Our family depends on you. Our county depends on you. You must do it. Do you agree?" Grandpa Max asked.

At the masonic rituals, I had to kill. Blood splattered on the pastel walls, and on the black and white patterned floor. A man with leather gloves gathered my hands, and we stabbed. I made up a song:

> "Hush little baby, don't you cry.
> Even though you're about to die.
> I'll stab you quick, I'll kill you fast.
> I'm the only one who'll have a pain that lasts.
> Hush, little baby, don't you cry.
> I'll never never let them skin you alive.
> You're the lucky one who's going to die.
> You will go to heaven with dry eyes.
> When I look up to the sky, I will have to cry, > because now I belong to Satan."

The victim babies were not strangers to me. I was left in a room with them before the slayings. Daniel had breathed a conscience into me. I don't know whether I was born with one. I wondered whether my grandparents had had a conscience when they were young. Life for resisters within these groups meant trying to find the way of the least evil.

"I could always make another"

For several days, I have been feeling my vaginal wall. Then the physical memory returns. I was a four-and-a-half-year-old in the second bedroom, strung up in front of his dartboard, my arms tied to hooks on the door, ankles tied to a chair. Grandfather, who must have been in a particularly primitive mood because he wore his costume and devil mask, held a wand that conducted electricity. He placed it up my vagina, and I screamed from the shattering pain. He created internal Itchy-face-Frank, Change-subject-Sally, and Frozen-fear-Nellie, who would distract me should I approach remembering who I am.

My grandmother rushed in. “She has to bear children. What are you doing, Max? She's the Illuminati princess. You're going to kill her…the neighbors.”

“I could always make another one. I could always make more,” he shouted through the door. My mother, who sat in the living room, screamed, then wailed. I was still strung up, but I heard a blow. Later Aunt Eileen told me that my father had hit my mother. He was allowed to do that when she became hysterical. Something had really shaken the family. An invisible barricade broke. My sister kept saying, “What does that mean?” My grandfather left the room to yell at my grandmother. “You keep interrupting me. Now everyone has to be programmed not to remember this.” Rhonda was two years old at that time, and the family discussed whether she could possibly know anything, and whether she needed programming.

I visualize what was going on in the living room. I see all my relatives sitting in Grandma's comfortable chairs aghast. I hear clearly the word that he could make more of me, or of what? I had thought my father was my father. Who would want such a vicious, horrible man to be a father? If he was my father, then I am a double freak. Wasn't that against the law? Why would my mother have let out that scream? Such a piercing, tormented sound. Sidney and Richard restrained my grandfather, who was wild and out of his mind. They pulled off his devil mask, and made him sit in the stuffed corner chair in the second bedroom. His eyes went to the side, and he looked troubled and distant, as if on the continent where he had been born, as if watching something in a dream.

My father and uncle unhooked me. My father shuddered when he saw me strung up. Didn't he know how my grandfather treated me? My mother put my coat over me; my father carried me out over his shoulder. I sobbed “Daniel, Daniel.” People on this fifth floor stuck their heads out their front doors. My father said, “She fell off a chair,” as my mother said, “She burned her finger.” In the elevator, I turned my head around and saw my father give my mother an exasperated look. My mother looked down, as if she had done something wrong. I wondered whether my father blamed my mother for her father, as I blamed my mother for mine, or whether it was something deeper. Children with knowledge of sexuality and violence pick up the innuendoes of adult life, but I didn't understand what passed between my parents in the elevator. Marlene clung to my mother. We walked home. My mother went right to her room, and my father put me to bed. My sister stayed with my mother. I thought as I lay in bed shivering, shaking, still calling Daniel's name, that my grief for Daniel made my grandfather crazy, that all my sadness intoxicated him. And in bed, I cried out to God after having lost the only love that I will ever know. I cried out to him in the heavens who might or might not have been watching, “I cannot take a whole life of this.” I felt Daniel rise from the newly dead, and lie beside me. He placed his hand over the opening to my frayed vaginal wall that steamed with the ravages of electroshock. We breathed together, and I slept.

These criminal groups think that victims need to make the choice to be evil even though they are coerced. A little while ago, I went into one of those faint-or-sleep states. I lay down and this memory leaped out of nowhere. When I was eight, my mother walked me to my grandparents' apartment. She had the keys. We entered, and I went ahead to the second bedroom. I was supposed to be there for a programming session. I had ballet twice a week; speech, piano, and mind control once a week. I looked in the second bedroom door that was open about one foot. My grandmother, who would have been in her forties, was strung up from the ceiling. My grandfather had his shirt off and held a whip. He waved the whip at me and said, “Get out of here.” My mother grabbed my hand, but she had a slight grin on her face similar to how my grandfather chronically smiled. Being hung and stretched was hard on a child's body. I think it would have been unbearable on an adult's body. My grandmother, while hanging, though she had her feet on a chair, looked at me with her shallow blue eyes and said “He's doing this to me because you won't choose to be queen.”

That night we had a ritual in Old Pleasant Hills. I was in the center of a circle, and people threw pebbles at me saying things like “You're aggravating your grandfather,” “You're making your grandmother be punished,” “You're making us ordinary.” I think that's when I said I would choose to be queen, but it wasn't a real choice. I just didn't want Grandma tortured though she was happy enough to have me tortured, even gratuitously and of her own doing. That's how children are. They love and protect anyone who gives them a homemade sugar cookie with an egg yolk glaze. I was that stupid.

The monarchs' slaves

Several years after they murdered Daniel in 1947, while my grief was still at its crest of desperation, my grandfather began splitting and layering to create and program slaves within me for servicing the monarch-type leaders. He created a line of white and black naked slaves, their supposed ages almost fifteen to twenty-six, although developmentally they were really young children. They wore iron necklaces around their necks, which were chained together. In mind control, the programmers create homes and locations where their newly created parts reside. They can't have personalities floating around like homeless people who won't go to the shelters. Grandpa constructed an internal well by just telling me it was there and torturing me into believing it. He put the electricity circuits on the soles of my feet. I was wearing an everyday dress, strung up on the ceiling, and when it hurt too much, he said “Who wants to come out and be a slave?” No answer. “Then you'll have to have more electricity.” Internal people volunteered. He showed me pictures of African slaves all tied together. Was I willing to be like that? No. Electricity. Then yes.

In 2013, I dream that devil's horns grow out of my feet; I feel serious chest pains. In the morning, I wake with this memory: I was an older child, eight to ten or twelve or most likely all those ages. Grandma put me under her sunlamp in the master bedroom and said, “Now you are Negro.” My skin became very dark. Grandpa and Aunt Mimi walked me into the second bedroom. Mrs. Twartski was there. They spun me in the spinning chair and injected me. Grandpa started to put a rag with gasoline over my nose, and Mrs. Twartski said, “Don't overdose her.” I was relieved not to get the rag. They put me on the single bed by the window, where Grandpa often slept. He put a ring in my left nostril and another on the left side of my tongue. Mrs. Twartski asked why he passed over the nipple and vagina, and Grandpa said, “She's too prone to infection. No one will ever know.” She put rings on both big toes and many very thin bracelets up my left arm. Grandpa handed her curved horn-like white pieces of bone. She glued them to the metatarsus on each foot. “These are your devil's horns, so that people know you're a devil-demon. You'll have to be very polite to the men who believe they will profit from the use of you. Turn her over. We need to darken her backside.” Grandma paced the hall, banging things and making angry noises. Grandpa continued, “This is your costume. You will be dressed like this for eternity, even when you sleep in the well. Whenever you are bidden, you arrive wearing this costume, behave well, and do whatever they ask. Unless you are called out, you are asleep at the very bottom of the well. No one must know about you."

Through hypnosis, I had to walk down a rung ladder to the bottom of a well. The well went below the foundation, past Mengele's spider web, into the deepest part. My grandfather pushed me physically into the imaginary well he built. He pushed on the top of my head, pressing my neck down until my neck became a hand fan that could no longer open. "You have to go down, down deep into the structure; I am drilling a well right now. Now one by one go down there." The black slaves went by groups A, B, C, D… the white ones by alpha, beta…Greek letters. Each letter signified a different function such as sexual, criminal, blotting out memory. I imagine the programmers personalize the functions to the role of each of their victims. The white slaves in me existed to be used by elected officials, and the black ones were for top world leaders, also mostly elected. These men felt more comfortable degrading a black female. "Now you live in the well, and I and very official people will call you up when we need you, and you all stay down there unless we call you." When Grandpa tapped his foot, leaving his heel on the floor, seven times, or when Mrs. Twartski tapped a glass with a spoon three times, the black slaves would emerge. There are thirty-five of them in clans of seven. Grandpa would decide which one(s) to send by limousine or airplane to these important people. He tried to match the slave to the personality of the leader. The slaves were so well behaved that the handler didn't need to be present.

The monarchs who were part of this criminal group had the opportunity to order sex slaves from my grandfather. The butterflies were all female, but the sex slaves were both male and female and were designed to be older than the butterfly girls. The abusers' belief was that a true woman was a child in a woman's body. He advertised: "We create specimens who are pleasing to monarchs…who can do any sort of trick for a monarch. Our specialty is form-fitting monarchs. We have girls in yellow, pale pink, light blue, green, violet, white. You choose the girl you want and we will form her to fit your needs."

For the female slaves, he pretended that he was supplying women's and junior's dresses. Customers could order size five, six, seven, eight, nine, and so on. Each size represented a certain sexual act. Various pastel colors also translated as code for an assortment of sexual acts. The assistants to certain monarchs ordered them in advance.

I don't know whether my grandfather invented this industry or whether he inherited it from a predecessor. He must have travelled the world creating these sexual slaves for monarchs. During a therapy session, we found these parts of me hidden internally in the corner of Grandpa's second bedroom. They huddled in shame and did not feel like human beings. Once we discovered them, they had a bit more trust in humanity than before. They no longer think all people are bad.

I read the word “brandy” in a book, and the slave parts got a craving for Harvey's Bristol Cream sherry and scotch. I think they're alcoholic. In the dressing rooms at this important American place, we were routinely shot up with something like cocaine to make us more energetic, numbed, and cooperative, and to help us bear the disillusionments and assorted pains. We never knew what drug they put in us.

My grandfather created an alternate black book that no one knew about, including Mengele. He said all of this was family business. He called two of his secretaries, who were his middle and youngest daughters, to record. My aunts left the second bedroom each holding a different “top secret” black book. Because of the torture, I had to give over my imagination also. Mind-control programmers usurp all the movements of victims' minds.

Transferring demonic power to world leaders

These groups flail about in archaic beliefs. One is that the queens pass on demonic power through their genitals. They hypnotized me into believing that drawers in the walls that resembled old-fashioned library card containers held “demons”. They pretended to insert them with a long skinny rod, and told me I would always be demonized. The demons looked like black puffy smoke with blues in it, and had a bad smell like burning rubber. When they took the demons out of the drawers, their shapes were already fully formed, and appeared solid. They became looser as they entered me. They burned but not so badly as when my father put cigarettes out on my skin. The queens were sad and shamed, because they believed that they had demons in them and they had to go into a separate room with the monarchs. Unbelievably, my mother, sister, and some of the monarchs' wives were jealous of my position.

I had to remember how I entered these hidden rooms. You don't just breeze in. A long way from this underground suite of torture rooms was an entrance to a paved tunnel with sparse lighting on its walls. After the equivalent of several blocks, the road became unpaved. The drivers parked the limousines. Other men transferred the captive to an open car, like a buggy, and we proceeded on packed dirt roads. The tunnel became tighter and lower as the open car crawled along. After about another six blocks, I had to get out and climb through another tunnel using flashlights for light. Eventually, by crawling, I arrived at the secret ceremony district. World leaders and their wives, butterfly girls, and servants were already present. A trio of leaders of the worldwide Illuminati organization stood waiting.

Some of the butterfly girls were in cages, others hoisted on a conveyor belt. When the girls were strung up in hanging machines, sometimes upside down, the politicians serviced themselves. The “monarch” could choose which ones he wanted to play with sexually.

One time, while I was in an adjacent room, a monarch's voice boomed, “Flying girls, I want my flying girls.” His wife was there holding a whip—a refined whip like people use on purebred horses. “Now don't make me whip you, gals. Don't make me hurt you pretty young ’uns.”

Another time, a wife of a monarch did not have that down-to-earth ambiance. This one lined up the girls who had to “fly” by putting her right index finger inside the right side of the mouth of each girl, and pushed toward their right. She wore a plastic glove on each hand, because she didn't want to touch the air they breathed.

Escorts ushered me into the dressing room, where pleasant women prepared my body and hung up my travelling clothes. Wearing my cape, crown, and loop in my left nipple, I entered the alcove that held the sacrificial body, a baby, child or a thirty-three-year-old male. The three heads of the Illuminati and an executioner already filled the tight space. The executioner held my hands and killed the sacrifice as the men sang prayers in an inflamed manner. The executioner left and other workers entered to excrete blood from the corpse. I had to sip a thimbleful, then the three men drank. All during this time, my feet floated above ground and I looked down on the scene from the low ceiling. The three men spat on me as I exited and walked down a pathway to a world leader. They spat because they considered it shameful that an Illuminati queen would not kill unaided.

The workers had gathered the blood from the corpse or pretended to. I had to stand in it as the world leader took a sip from an ornate goblet, which reflected his role in the universe. We both entered a tiny chamber the size of a phone booth, where there was a transfer, Old Testament style, from my clitoris to his penis, of what they considered demonic power. These groups had bizarre, ancient beliefs. Outside the booth, a man dressed in robes like a Vatican priest recited prayers in a language that sounded like half Hebrew, half Latin. I couldn't speak it, but someone in me understood:

> Hear, my children of divine majesty
> Hear O angels of the silver world
> Hear demonic forces of the golden world
> Lucifer's angels are gathered herewith
> All his children have their feet on the earth
> And their toes in Jesus' blood

A river runs through
Channel his power into this mortal man
Channel Lucifer's force into this endowed leader
Channel Lucifer's heart into the soul of the country
Lucifer's queen is endowed with powers
Lucifer's blessing is on this official of his own sovereignty.

Then my job was done, though I remained in a dense trance, part from drugs, part from shock. During these assaults, when I was a piece of cloth, with no rights or being, a veil descended from the heavens and blocked their claws. They took possession of my body, but my soul hid insulated in a non-tangible substance that kept me from utter despair. The leader proceeded to the butterfly girls on the conveyor belt, and I returned to the dressing room.

By the time I was a young adult, they brought in another queen, but kept me at these initiations. Now there were two booths for the transfer of power: one for the new queen, Laura, whom they believed would cooperate, and one for the degraded me. “You're saving yourself, but now Laura has to do all the work. You care for yourself, but you don't care for Laura. The reason we have a bad leader is because of you.” They put me on a little stage and the audience booed me. “You're a good-for-nothing queen, a blemish on your heritage, a stuck angel, a namby-pamby fallen angel.” To be called “namby-pamby” in this vicious criminal world was meant as a huge insult.

Some of the leaders would not take part in these Illuminati rituals. One was drugged and kidnapped, another made a brief, angry appearance, others refused to participate. And some of the leaders wanted to be part of these grabs for power. Sometimes only the wife cooperated. The leaders of the hidden criminal world became nervous if a leader did not come from their organization. About such a leader, the visiting heads of this whole evil organization said to me, “We have another namby-pamby who's encroaching on us. This is all your fault. You punctured one of Lucifer's membranes. One of the seals isn't working, and it's your fault. You have interfered with our divine plan. You have not endowed our future. You have failed.” The torturers threatened the world leaders who didn't worship evil and world dominion with killing their children if they didn't cooperate. Other men shook and strangled me. “If you ever tell what happens here, you'll be dead.” As I go through these memories, the internal babies feel terrible anxiety. I have to hold the babies' heads close to my heart and rock them tenderly as I go about my day, and my life. “Ah, ah, babies, don't you worry, I'm here with you,” I say to my selves.

This all happened in the forties, up to the nineties. My main goal in life was to make Daniel proud of me. He would most likely not have gone to college. He would have been a worker of some kind, making one woman extremely happy and teaching his children to be good citizens and spread love in their worlds. But the love that he gave me, the physical comforting during which I passed through catch-up developmental stages, his acceptance and understanding of me—took me out of this web of perversity and transplanted me. Almost seventy years later, my heart can still feel the thump of each beat of his heart, and the silent breath between them. One morning recently, I woke remembering his smell.

Government offices have their own closedown crews who performed the usual procedures expertly and extensively. The men didn't pump up their muscles like open peacock wings but were slim and tight in dark gray suits, white shirts, and skinny black ties. I wonder what these men dreamed about and how they treat their families.

The government cellar had about twenty spinning chairs in one place, and the men spun the butterfly people all at once. Projectile vomit flew like the fluttering wings of the butterfly girls. The government servants administered electroshock and tightened a head vise simultaneously, which made the tension level in the body enormous. Also we had to hold still or the guns that they held flush to our bodies might “accidently” go off. I heard shots through the corridors and in adjacent rooms. I don't know whether people were killed or whether they tried to scare us. Then came the whipping, kicking, needles in our teeth, more electroshock, always with guns pressed to victims' temples. In addition, they administered a series of six injections of mind-numbing drugs to help the brain not hold information: when entering, going into the booth, coming off the whipping stage, before closedown torture, after it, and as I returned to normal life. When they put me in one of their freezers, I had to vow not to tell anyone, or they threatened they would kill any children I ever had.

Back to the normal world

When I was a child, the government men returned me to my parents' home in Pleasant Hills, and later Long Island. I remember three other dump-off locations when I was an adult. In the 1960s, I was discharged at Hiram College, Ohio, where I was a student. Young women in the dormitory accused me of spending the night with a college boy. “Which one?” “Do you like him?” “How far did you go?” “I was here, I was right here,” my front person said to my dormitory friends. I couldn't understand why they accused me of missing last night. I saw their several peering faces, but a universe parted me from them. People without skin cannot communicate with those who wear skin.

I smelled a faint odor of Vaseline especially around my wrists. I didn't want water touching my body, the assault of water on decaying skin, but I had to make my odor vanish. I walked into the bathroom, away from my gaping dormitory friends, used one in the line of sinks, showered. The water hit my skin, pounding it to meal. I couldn't kill, it wasn't killing. It was murder. I couldn't do it. The Angel of Mercy scrubbed my back. Its giant golden wings filled the shower stall. “Come with me, my child.” Yes, yes, I will. I sleepwalked half wet to the bottle of pills that only a few people inside knew about. There were only two left. Not enough. Someone must have been swallowing them during the night.

Everyone in the dormitory was rushing to class. I felt them swooshing past me. I had clean clothes. The pre-instructions were to make sure I had clean, respectable clothes for the next day. They were in my drawer. I needed food. I made my way to the cafeteria and sat at one of its wooden round tables. “Yes, I would like two eggs, bacon, and toast.” I wolfed it down, as if I had never eaten. The children wanted juice. My throat was sore, the chills rampant. My front person thought I had a fever. No one in the dormitory was sick. I made my way to math class; almost vomited in biology; fell asleep in French, my best subject; gazed out the window in religion. The professor talked about the prophets. I had a stirring feeling that there was no civilization, no hope.

After the classes, I floundered back to the dorm. Someone in me took the last little pill. The rest of us didn't see. Another inside person threw the bottle in the large can in the bathroom. I fell into a sleep of the dead. I felt the Angel's wings over my narrow bed by the window. A sophomore yelled to me that I had a telephone call. I kept sleeping. She said she'd tell them I was asleep. Some internal part of my mind knew it was their check-up call and that message would suffice. I thought I smelled blood, but almost all of my mind answered that was impossible. I began ripping hair off my body.

The wings. Highway lights. Tunnels. I entered a deep, drugged sleep and dreamt of thugs beating me.

In the 1970s, while visiting my parents, I was dumped at their Manhattan apartment at 90th Street and Madison Avenue. One of the muscular escorts held me tight under my bent arm with our hips touching. I could feel his gun through our clothes. We went up the elevator to the eighth floor, and my father opened the front door. He had been playing solitaire at the dining room table. The escort immediately disappeared. I went right to my bedroom. My mother had put a fresh nightgown on my pillow. Touching, I thought. Some awareness must still have lingered up front in me. My father came in and asked me if I wanted something to eat. I had not eaten for a long time. The government doesn't feed you when they torture. My father brought me toasted corn rye bread from Merritt Bakery, and a glass of carrot juice.

In the mid-eighties or early nineties, an escort deposited me at my co-op on 108th Street and Amsterdam Avenue in Manhattan. The doorman who talked loud and incessantly was on night duty, but didn't seem to notice anything unusual. The escort held me in the elevator, opened my front door with a key he had and left. I was alone in my apartment with a head that already had forgotten everything. By morning, I would be another person returning to ordinary life, with my government robot switch on off.

PART II

THE WAY OF THE LEAST EVIL

CHAPTER TEN

Wife and mother

The last Pleasant Hills ritual, 1959

We all looked up at the stars. The night sky was black. Someone called out “Big Dipper,” “Little Dipper”. You would have thought it would make everyone humble. My clothes were cold. I couldn't stop shaking, sneezing, and yawning. I had spent hours here in the outside ritual site in Old Pleasant Hills. The ground was laid bricks, which looked hundreds of years old. They knew so many stories but kept their stony silence. The area was deserted. Even during the day, hardly anyone was here, blocks away from the busy Enterprise Avenue with its subway stop and shops, housewives buying, commuters rushing.

I came early with the set-up crew. Early but past midnight. My father walked me here, then returned home. He and my mother, sometimes my sister, walked here a few hours later. No reason for my mother to stand around in the cold when she had so much to do in the apartment. No one forced my father to come to these rituals the way they had to force others. He wanted to worship Lucifer with his whole heart. Mother didn't like the killings but enjoyed the sex. She always complained about father's being impotent so she needed the rituals to get satisfied. I hated all aspects of these rituals, which they also called worshipfuls.

My Uncle Richard used his organizational skills to get everyone going. Like my grandfather when he made women's dresses, Uncle Richard loved detail and exactitude. Every switch, plug, light had to be just so.

Mrs. Twartski talked with the other handlers of the neighborhood. They were comparing notes on how to structure people's minds. My cousins and school classmates arrived. Incense was lit. I hated the smell, others inhaled it lovingly. The altar was arranged. They used a low, stone wall that was part of this site and had been there for hundreds of years. That night there would be a sacrifice, a real one, not pretend. This part, plus the orgy, especially terrified the children. Sometimes an adult was killed but often it was children, both boys and girls though the group preferred boys, white ones. If such a child could be killed, any of us could be next.

I had a new job. I had to draw the designs that Lucifer craved on the bodies. Sometimes the person was already dead, and during the ritual they killed that person again for show. Sometimes the person was heavily drugged and would be killed at the ceremony or would wake up and be let go. Ever since my teacher said I had talent, the organizers had assigned me this job. Lucifer liked swirls in black and red, lines that never stopped zigzagging and curving. We only decorated the top part of the body and the parts that were exposed, such as the toes. The leaders said the designs enhanced the spirituality of the sacrifice to Lucifer.

Uncle Richard told me to hurry up. He said, “You are taking too long. You are dawdling.” I was not dawdling. I tried to work in designs that dedicated this life, this body, that night this six-year-old boy, to God. On TV I had watched a contest. They gave you a form or a letter and you had to make a whole drawing that included that shape or letter in an unrecognizable way. That was when I thought I could write “God” on the bodies. I formed the “G” around the belly button and camouflaged it so that no one could tell. If they discovered what I was doing, there would be two sacrifices and with no drugs for me. All the leaders had it in for me since I hadn't produced an heir. It wasn't my fault that my mother had killed baby Daniel, but they were angry that he and the others were born bonded.

Uncle Richard glared at me suspiciously. He didn't know why I was taking so long. He already wore his black hooded robe and eye mask. And the crowd was arriving. There were the Smiths, Joneses, Callaways, the Sheins, Olsens, Johnsons. Some of the teachers from Public School Number Three and Oldtown Junior High School arrived. There were the druggist and one manager of the grocery store, our dentist, and many women from Grandma's beauty parlor with their husbands and children, plus the women Grandma played canasta with. My parents and grandparents had just arrived.

The ink dried instantly and the carriers moved the body to the altar. A six-year-old girl who was being initiated stood there. It was her turn to do the sacrifice. The executioner stood behind her ready to use her hands. After her hands were used to kill, she would probably feel trapped, that she could never be free to leave. She would be so ashamed that she would stay in the only place where she would be accepted and where everyone was the same.

The lights blinked, the dagger went in, and lights on the side showed a soul being clutched in Lucifer's hand. The soul tried to slip through his fingers but couldn't. People watching believed in this afterlife even though it was clear that we were watching a movie on a screen. Uncle Richard directed it. Sometimes the adults were more naïve than their children. A robed figure stood to the side on the brick wall. He moved his left arm down sharply, which signaled that the orgy should begin. The orgy always began thirteen minutes after the only or last sacrifice. People were naked under their robes. They threw naked children up in the air and penetrated them. My father had an erection. He can only get one around children. My mother was looking for men.

Human flesh hors d'oeuvres were passed around. They had human meat in the kind of containers chicken salad comes in. Everyone had to have a chunk. It was not optional. We picked it out of the container with toothpicks. You had to chew it. You couldn't spit it out. It was cooked and had seasoning. Even if you got a piece with fat, you had to chew and swallow or you would be whipped right in front of everyone. The meat was stringy and lean. I hoped they were just pretending it was human meat.

About three in the morning, a whisper flashed through the site. A muted call sounded the alarms from the outer trees all the way into Uncle Richard's ear. The handlers stretched up their necks. The lookouts, who were perched in the tree branches, formed concentric circles around the site. The outer ones had a view of the nearby busy avenue. The most responsibility was on the lead outer person. The lookouts were usually older teenagers and young adults. They had to be able to climb tall trees, stay awake and balance for several hours on branches, and imitate bird calls that they had been learning since early childhood. They had to perfect low whispering because birds were asleep in the middle of the night. Just the cats prowled and owls were awake. That training was one of the fun parts of this life we all led.

The shutdown signal was given right in the middle of the orgy. If it had happened before the sacrifice, the child would have been killed anyway, probably in the truck. The robes were tossed into a large bag, and people scrambled back into their street clothes that they had placed carefully and in a deliberate order on the other side of the low, stone wall. Men quickly moved the corpse, paints, ritual dagger, and drugs into the parked truck. Everyone dispersed silently. We had rehearsed this time and time again, and this night we disassembled in seconds. Our secret religion depended on speed.

The first position lookout had spotted a lone police officer in uniform carrying a baton and wearing a gun in his holster while patrolling within blocks of our site. He was not one of ours. He was a new man on the beat. How had the police chief let this happen? He was supposed to let only our own patrol this neighborhood at night, especially on arranged ritual nights. He might be losing his authority. Our ritual site was wiped clean, but we could never return now. That is a fundamental rule: once a site has been invaded or almost invaded, never return. Fail-safe security is all-important. This event contaminated Pleasant Hills, as I had contaminated my coven and county's reputation.

When we arrived back in our apartment, my father was agitated. He was making phone calls and tapping on the table, more restless than usual. He couldn't even calm down enough to play solitaire. Within a week, extra programming began in the back programming room. My handler showed me pictures of a lone police officer walking. She said, “If you ever remember this ritual, you will go crazy.” She shot me up with electricity and drugs. “If you ever report it to the police, you will present yourself as a babbling fool, a mad girl.” They did this programming for months. All the drugged, spun children were shot through with electricity so that they would never remember and tell, even if cross-examined.

Meanwhile, my parents quickly bought a house on a wooded, hidden lot on Long Island. To walk near the wooded part, a police officer would have to walk on private property. For years, their hobby had been to take drives and look at houses on Long Island, where the middle class was moving. Now suddenly, they acted. They met with the builder every week while the house was being built. The Pleasant Hills clan dispersed and was absorbed by other neighboring groups. A new Long Island coven formed. The lone police officer never knew how close he came to being killed. Only the leaders discovered what had happened to the police chief's authority.

Marriage as punishment, 1964

Right before I graduated from Bard College, the young women in my dorm were breaking up with college boyfriends, getting apartments in the city, and jobs in large corporations like Pepsi Cola, continuing on in graduate school, planning on roaming around Europe. No one else was getting married and pregnant, and certainly not to a man she hated. The committee that controlled me found a male who was the opposite of me. We had nothing in common and opposing values, but we both lived in New York and my father was his father's lawyer. My grandfather as Wiezenslowski, a new woman who had taken over as “Mrs. Twartski”, and some international leaders made this decision during my sophomore year of college. They ordered that I change colleges to be closer to my selected and future husband and next handler. I was twenty-one and wanted to romp through life on tiptoe, not be saddled with a taker.

Right before the engagement party in Todd's parents' backyard on Long Island, I stormed around my parents' Manhattan apartment, ripping my clothes and refusing to attend. My father gave me hand signals that got me into their car and to the dreaded celebration. I must have switched into another part when I arrived, for I danced under the canopy in his backyard by the pool that only my parents and I swam in. The lindy was in style then. I turned and spun and my dress flared. My mother whispered with other females including my future mother-in-law about my recent temper tantrum. Driving home, my mother said, “You wore the wrong slip which showed when you twirled around. You're wearing a polka dot slip and should be wearing a solid color. You made me feel ashamed.” I wore an emerald green summer dress that had bold red and yellow flowers. A red slip would have been nice underneath. My mother had no way of snatching me and running away.

If only I'd had a protective part to help me escape or if only my front person had perspicacity, I might have changed my name and social security number, run to another country, and started a real life somewhere. I was twenty-two and didn't have the belief in myself or enough independence to make decisions. I had no memories or suspicion of my trapped underlife.

During another engagement-time trip to Long Island, I fought like a crazy cat not to marry and not to marry this man in particular. I was in a car with male programmers. They wanted me to marry Todd. Todd was six foot, thin, with medium brown oily hair, and pasty skin. He had a large nose, diminutive chin, and hazel eyes not unlike my mother's. A deadness and greed flowed from his eyes. He wore thick glasses that slid down his nose. He used the middle finger of his right hand to push them back into position. I screamed that I wouldn't, couldn't. Through drugs, hand signals, and threats, they subdued me and made me cooperate mindlessly. Even my mother noticed that this fiancé would try to keep me down. He was my punishment for not being one of them. His agreeing to marry me came with the deal that he could control me and I would support him through graduate school. Later they tagged on my having to have an ordinary-life child to keep him out of the draft. But the larger reason for this conception was so that my love for this baby would keep me compliant. Run, Wendy, run before you give birth.

The vanity, 1966

I pushed back the side mirrors of the painted vanity placed in the large bedroom with low windows that overlooked farmlands and the pond. The fields of this tiny rural town outside Rochester were filled with white, yellow, and purple wild flowers. Honeoye's soft hills felt like a melody and made me happy to be alive. I was twenty-three years old, teaching French in a country school, married to a graduate student. In the second year of our marriage, I still supported him while he sat in a recliner studying and daydreaming in the living room and picking the hair off his right arm with his teeth and spitting it out. Though more ambitious than bright, he was preparing for a career in academia.

In the bedroom, I sat before the mirrors on the vanity which reflected back droplets of scars on the sides of my navel, not really scars but marks, whitish jagged colorations that looked a little like miniature people rushing to the subway, or the tips of waves about to break, or jagged clouds in the sky. I pushed the side mirrors in a quarter of the way, then back out a little. First they picked up the yellow flowers of the wallpaper on the side wall, cheerful and old fashioned. As I changed the angles, the mirrors reflected hieroglyphics even wrapped around my hips.

I stood in front of the painted vanity with movable side mirrors, wearing only my black bra. I had never before taken a good look at my belly, but that evening a curtain lifted or something shifted inside and someone younger inside me looked at my flesh and saw stretch marks, more on the right side of my body than on the left. I adjusted the side mirrors and looked at the stretch marks from different angles. How do you get stretch marks that look like the skies after the rains? From pregnancy or obesity, I answered myself. As far as I knew, I had never been pregnant. Or fat. I was skinny but loose skin girdled my lower stomach and hips, too loose for me to wear a bikini. When I attended Bard College, my friends and I had made a day trip to nearby Vassar College, and we had all tried on the bikinis in its campus store. Only I had loose skin hanging over the elastic. I was maybe nineteen at the time and a dancer. It didn't make sense.

I stood stunned, looking at my stained belly, stretching my neck as if it were a microscope to see the swirling lines. Dark theater curtains of my mind opened for a moment and I saw beautiful Paris and glistening babies and red. I saw Paris, not the Bronx. Or Brooklyn. Decades would pass before I would realize that Paris represented a programming ruse. My face and the pores of my skin became immobile, unfeeling, but underneath a torrential storm began. Who was I? What had my life been? I could not form the question of whether I had given birth to babies I didn't know about. I could not ask that question yet, or where they might be now. My heart spiked and receded, my brain spasmed, my breathing quickened. It looked as if the clouds on my belly would break into lightning. Perhaps I had a moment of lucidity because my husband was pressuring me to have a baby. I closed the mirrored vanity and my mind. My husband in the other room closed his book and wanted dinner.

I went into the small kitchen off the living room. We were living in a couple's finished attic, cheap, student-like housing. I warmed up franks and beans for dinner. Over the sink, a small table lamp stood on a shelf. Its cord went around the sink to a plug in the wall. No overhead light was in the kitchen. I leaned over to switch on the lamp and electricity shot through my body. I had another flash of Paris, and then I held my arm and realized an electric shock had ripped through my body.

“Why can't you be more careful?” Todd asked as he stood in the doorway to the kitchen. “I told you not to lean over the sink.” In my awareness, I returned to Honeoye.

He began the refrain that had become his habitual dinner conversation. “If you are pregnant, they will not draft me. If you're not pregnant, they will draft me. They are drafting students, right now.” My mind ricocheted between anger and guilt. I did not want a baby. Was I just a breeder? To have babies for his benefit? If he were drafted and died in Vietnam, it would be my fault. Once I repeated to our landlady what he had said. “Why does he think he is better than anyone else?” she answered. I had lucidity for one moment before the conscious part of my brain folded into the programming. I raced around town, even asking the family doctor where I could get an abortion. This rural physician looked at me as if I were a shrew. Instinct led me, not conscious awareness. And how could I have explained? My mind was scattered like dead people's ashes. But unlike ashes, the natural, organic electricity in the brain can bring it back to life.

Somewhere in the recesses, I knew. I knew what had happened to my sister and me.

The “expendable” child

Most of the experts who write about this abuse avoid the subject of the required sexual abuse of one's own children. Or perhaps they don't know about it because survivors are too shamed to disclose it. It's impossible to understand the full devastation of this planned destruction without acknowledging it. Writing about it makes me want to retreat to an island and never see anyone again.

The universal method of these groups is to let one child survive so that the mother can be controlled. This boy of mine who survived started out with a crisp, shining mind. He was born frowning though they hadn't given me electroshock during the pregnancy. He must have absorbed my emotions. As a child, his face lit up like a Frans Hals masterpiece, so full of life was he. His father was what they called a “commoner”, which means not of a “distinguished” blood line, so my child was considered “expendable”. I did what they told me in order to keep him alive.

Is it better to have your child slowly, tortuously killed or for you to rape him or her? They would not have killed us both together. I would have lived and he would have died. He was my eighth child. The others had all been murdered or abducted.

Their instructions were specific. All members of this kind of group had to abuse their children sexually at home and in rituals. Programmers don't call it sexual abuse or incest. They say, “You have to do this,” and demonstrate. I imagine some parents were strong and wise enough not to. I wanted my boy to be alive.

My covering “front” person at that time knew nothing of this other life. Now I have many front people. They try to accept that I was a perpetrator but the despair is larger than they are. As one of them slips into almost suicide, another takes over. That's how I stay alive—by frequently changing. Why do I want to stay alive? I don't, but I must tell this story. These atrocities have to end.

My front person didn't yet know to talk to my insiders and find out about her history. She knew her boy had started out with an inordinate amount of devotion. My young son had looked at me with an idealizing, adoring kind of love. My inside people could hardly bring themselves to tell the others what had happened to this vigorous child. He had dark shiny hair that people wanted to stroke when they passed him. His hazel eyes were enormous and intelligent. His skin had an apricot tint. As a toddler, he concentrated as well as any adult. I sent him to a Midwestern university's school for gifted children. Their intelligence tests couldn't measure his aptitude for conceptual thinking. He could explain anything brilliantly. And he was so perceptive. I never knew what he would say and his comments took my mind to new places.

Once I took him to the planetarium. It happened that an exhibition of Taurus was showing. Just about everyone in the family was born under that sign. I asked him who the characteristics of Taurus reminded him of, thinking he could answer his parents, or half of his grandparents. He answered “Mayor Daley”. He played the flute with such a perfect pitch, it made me want to start dancing again. He had empathy. We visited young adults in their first apartment. “They're lonely,” he said. I had only noticed a vague uneasiness. When his father, Todd, from whom I was separated, told me he was living with someone and I cried, Ned put his head in my lap and said, “You're heartbroken”. He had a logical, philosophical bent. One afternoon in Lincoln Park, I fell asleep. When I woke up a short time later, he was still sitting next to me. I said, “I fell asleep.” He answered, “How do you know you were asleep?” He was six.

Why?

Why do parents have to abuse their children sexually? Some explanations are: to destroy bonding, to teach children that they are objects for others' use, to give them overwhelming physical and emotional feelings, to create familial triangles and rivalries, to teach them that they have to do what was done to them.

In addition, children at the mercy of groups like these have to be prepared for rapes that will take place during rituals, as part of programming. Trainers instruct parents in how gradually to stretch their children's orifices so that there will be a minimum of damage and tearing. Some parents cannot bring themselves to do this preparation to their offspring. Official trainers then step in. Ned's father was willing to stretch him so he wouldn't be injured. I couldn't, but they didn't let me off free. As punishment, I still had to abuse sexually, as did his father.

Sexual abuse punctures a child's relationship to the world and his or her own body. It teaches him that his body isn't his own, and that he is at the mercy of anyone who wants to violate him. It robs that child of the air and space around him. It cuts into his soul because our sexual life and the life of our emotions are intertwined and interwoven. It takes away the child's right to discover an enormous movement in his own time and way. When children are stripped of their sexual being, they are stripped of finding out who they are. A life-giving impulse is drowned by shame and discomfort.

We need water, air, food, touch, sleep; and we need boundaries. Boundaries to know where our limits are, to know we start and stop like countries. These groups destroy our boundaries before knowledge of them begins. They swallow our limits along with our concept of truth. Children in these groups live in a gray haze.

If my son hadn't been corrupted, he would have been one of the loving people in the world.

I hate genetic narcissism, the fact that people care mostly about their own, an extension of themselves. I fell into that same trap. These cults know that in the end what matters is the blood connection. We are wired for the preservation of family.

One of the mothers inside said to my front person, “I wouldn't touch Ned when he was born. They want the sexual stuff the second the child is born and I wouldn't do it, and then my sister wouldn't do it, and then another of us and another. Finally, the shocks became too much, and we gave out when they said they would start shocking him. Maybe they would shock a newborn, maybe they wouldn't. There's no way to trust them. We just wanted you to know that we tried.”

If they would electroshock a fetus, they would shock a newborn. “Sister” refers to another part or personality within that section. In my journal, I wrote to the parts that knew of the sexual abuse of children. I wanted to know why they couldn't just fake it. They wrote back:

A MOTHER: “They did question Ned. They would have killed him if he didn't answer correctly.”

ME: “We don't know for sure.”

A DIFFERENT MOTHER: “I know for sure. I was there three or four times when they sat him on a chair and asked him whether his mother or father touched his penis, for how long, whether anything was put in his backside. He answered ‘yes’, he didn't know for how long and ‘yes, things were put in his backside, fingers and sticks and toys,’ he said. They asked, ‘Did they pat your behind at the end?’ ‘Yes.’ ‘Did they tell you to lie and say yes when the answer should be no?’ ‘No.’”

ME: “Where did they question him?”

A MOTHER: “When I was there, it was in the apartment on Oakdale, in Madison Park, and before then on Everett Place.”

ME: “Could we have taught him to lie?”

THE FIRST MOTHER: “No.”

ME: “Why not?”

THE MOTHER: “You would have had to use more torture on him than they did.”

ME: “Would they have killed him if he said no?”

THE MOTHERS: “Probably.”

Ram in the bush, 1972

In 1972, we were living in an apartment in the Midwest. Hours past midnight, there was a break-in, but someone had the key. Todd, who had recently left me, and two other men opened my door. I sprung up and heard Todd say, “Get the boy.” My mind raced. Do they mean Ned? I thought. How am I going to get to him? How will I fight off three men? I should have a gun! As my panicked thoughts swirled, one of the men put a cloth over my face and I lost consciousness, but also heard the back door to the apartment close. Its thump sounded so final, inescapable. I was unconscious, but a part of my mind recorded, and witnessed. Even when put under anesthesia for major surgery, a part of the mind-controlled brain watches. I didn't know where my child was or what these men would do. I couldn't completely black out, and I was aware that it was right before his sixth birthday. Small Feasts of the Beast were being celebrated in towns across the world—not the twenty-seven year international ones, but still rituals to contend with. My bedroom clock said eight minutes after two. I was drugged and mostly asleep but still watching, remembering, calculating. It hadn't dawned on me yet that it was my thirtieth birthday. The men stood me up, held me under my sore armpits, and dragged me down the metal stairs. In remembering this, I wonder how many men have invaded my armpits. How many fingerprints are there?

The light on the steps looked mellow as if something sweet and festive were about to occur. We bumped into no one. I heard Todd say, “Lights out” from my apartment. He wanted me to hear him. He wanted me to think I would be killed or Ned would be killed, and terror swept me. I thought I heard him switch off the hall light and close the door. The rough men doing a job they were most likely paid to do pushed me into a black car still running its engine. Where is my son? I thought as I tumbled into the back seat. The mules in me rose for a moment because of the familiarity of this scene, but I was not aware of my inside parts and could not have identified them then. Todd had disappeared with Ned. They had killed Daniel's sister when she turned six. The drive along the water took less than half an hour. Few cars were on the road. The car sped, lights danced on the road like fairies. The pale moon and flat stars shone on the molten lake. Even when calm and mellow, the city has a razor edge. We parked in the grassy fields around the mammoth sculpture of robed figures. The men parked in the bushes close to the area where about one hundred hooded people had already gathered.

At the entrance to rituals, wardrobe assistants take your clothes and hand you a hooded robe. A woman at the entrance said, “Everyone has to be naked underneath for the movies.” Those last words brought out an actor in me, one who was used to performing for cameras. I hadn't seen Ned since he left the apartment with Todd. Even the actor looked around for him.

Everyone was rushing about, mumbling, dancing, chanting. I made out some of their words, “Ram in the bush…” Black and white candles surrounded the ritual site but lights from cameras let me see well. Cameras shot the crowds and often panned on my face. It felt like a rape, even to the actor.

I saw the sharp outline of parallel altars, pale children placed on top. The altars had brought out a mother in me, which made the actor disappear into my depths of being. I thought I recognized Ned's profile on an altar. The moonlight and camera lights lit his body. I became certain that he lay on one of the two prepared altars. My heart froze and dropped. It was worse than my worries. He was motionless, probably not dead. A bomb of hatred filled my body. For a drop of prestige, his father would sacrifice him, like one of those Greek heroes. The other altar had a beautiful boy. People near me said it was John Lee, an Asian boy who lived in the same neighborhood as me. I did not know him. He was probably a better person than me or my son. The boys were naked; I wanted to cover them even with my black robe. The stars and camera lights glistened on their young limbs. Was John's family present? Were they members or had he been abducted? Flashes of Daniel's sacrifice ripped through my ribs. Daniel had been thirteen. There had been no escape. Decades later, there was no escape.

A tall man came up behind me, and I jumped. The crowds chanted “Choose who you will slaughter for Lucifer, praise his name.” The Luciferians wanted the corruption of the soul; the Mafia, a snuff flick to circulate and sell. The man pushed his draped knee into my back and legs and walked me to the center of a circle. Hooded figures swayed and chanted. The candles flickered but the camera's lights projected harsh yellow. The robed man behind me drove with his knee. John screamed “Don't let them choose me, don't let them kill me,” crying, gasping. I felt impressed that the child wanted to live. So many didn't. I hadn't. Daniel hadn't. I became paralyzed. I don't even think I blinked. Then I sobbed. The suspense built for the crowd as they chanted “Happy birthday to you, you have reached the age of treason, now all you have to do is kill your own boy—you don't even have a girl—or use your ram in the bush—a yellow-skinned boy. Happy birthday to you, you have reached the age of misfortune, now slay the ram and become of use, miserable queen, unfortunate queen, slay this ram and rejoin your fold.” I couldn't choose. Ned screamed, “Just choose, Mom.” His “Mom” made me break down further. They began torturing both boys, twisting their arms, shoving their heads back. They took out a razor as if to prepare for skinning alive. Ned must have known what was about to happen. He must have witnessed these scenes before. Someone inside me said, “Just take him,” pointing to John. Ned screamed, “Don't do it.” This child started out with great compassion. I heard Todd's voice and saw his face in the camera lights. He was talking to the camera and with a snide expression said, “I knew she'd do that.” The crowd desired the torture.

I hadn't known this was a significant ritual. Little rituals took place at every holiday, at least once a month. They always found an excuse. The man standing behind me and pressing into me covered my hands within his black-gloved hands, and walked me over to the altar where Ned lay in agony. My heart felt as if it had a knife in it, the pain rippling to my arms and jaw. The man lifted my arms over my son, whose eyes were wild with fear but clear, not drugged. That gave me hope, since they usually drugged sacrificial victims. The cameras rolled furiously if silently, close-ups, panorama shots. The executioner's movement jarred me from ruminating. His right arm squeezed my intestines, his left knee jutted between my legs, as his left hand pressed a knife in my left hand, closed his hand around mine, and lifted my arm. It happened in a fast swoop. The masses chanted and hummed. The executioner abruptly as if following my mental order walk-dragged my limp body away from the altar where Ned lay as if dead, and toward the one where John lay as if dead. Someone shouted “cut,” and the lights went off. It was black except for the flickering candles. The crowd continued chanting, “Ram in the bush.” The wardrobe mistress entered from the side and slipped a crown on my head. In the breath between seconds, with his gloved hands wrapped over mine, right after the blackout of lights, the executioner plunged the knife into, I thought, this beautiful boy John. Even now, I can feel the resistance in my arms, especially the leading left one, as a body memory. In the blackout, I felt a puncture of something soft but solid. I thought my hands had been taken from me and used to kill.

Blood spurted, the crowd cheered, and I felt a sinking fall as the crowd began its off-and-on orgy. When the ritual knife came down, my mind divided into two. One part was not sure whether John was dead and whether I had killed him. That part stayed in perennial searching for him. The other part saw that during the blackout, the stage crew removed John and replaced him on the altar with a raw sirloin tip roast. I fainted and vomited in my faint onto the meat. Part of the faint was relief. The snuff flick would be circulated. Part of my dizziness is from internal spinners keeping me from the memory, and part is from the anguish of realizing who I am.

I gained some consciousness, and the camera lights came back on for the next scene. When the crew's lights shone, casting a greenish hue on the hungry faces in the crowd, I noticed my parents for the first time. They lived in New York and must have flown in for this ritual. And I saw my grandfather who strutted about like the vain emperor with no clothes. He wore his Wiezenslowski mask, and smiled knowingly at the camera.

He was programming Ned after they removed him from the first altar. My grandfather held a gun to Ned's temple and said, “This boy is not allowed to love his mother. You will always despise your mother, and whenever you see her, you will remember how much you despise her. Go over there and tell her.” My parents said, “Good boy.” My mother kept turning her head over her shoulder to smile at the cameras, and tilted her head up. Her hair was newly dyed. Todd was about to be granted freedom from the marriage as long as he agreed to become “conscious”.

A presence like a compilation of inside parts rises and floats above this scene. She is nine and a half years old, stretched out lengthwise on her side, leaning on her bent elbow and wearing one of the blue and white ruffled dresses my grandmother had brought back from Florida for Rhonda and me. She says over and over that she wants to die. She is comprised of many betrayals and was created when I was four and a half. Parts have to be established in the years before nine to hold their form. She is always there but not always visible like a cloud, a fox, or a suicidal thought. She guides me to the ritual site. The blackout occurred. John was removed from the altar. They lifted me from my faint and vomit, and placed me on the same altar that John had been on. Ned had been programmed by my grandfather. Now I was on the altar and they brought in a birthday cake for me on a silver platter. A dagger stuck out of the top of the birthday cake with black flickering lit candles. The crowds like a prophetic Greek chorus chanted, “I hate you, Mom, unqueened…” This leaning figure of parts of me pushes me forward. She will not let me stop writing. I want to have my dinner. “No,” she says, “keep writing. Write.” The executioner pushed Ned forward, lifted his arms with Ned's small limbs captured between them; the knife high, it started to move down—another blackout. The dagger had a rubber tip and was collapsible. It plunged into my heart that had already felt it had another kind of dagger in it. I was still alive, covered in my own vomit. Terrified, I was ambivalent about being alive. I should stay alive to protect my child, but I cannot guard him, I thought.

Ten days before the memory of this coming-of-age ritual presented itself, I felt exhausted and started thinking about a boy named John. I had a flash of myself drugged—the body memory of exhaustion may have been the drugged feeling. In the memory flash, I wore a black robe, was held under the arms, and dragged down a building's front staircase by two men, one of whom was my estranged or ex-husband.

My nights were filled with insomnia. Finally, the memory crept out of my mind.

After I fainted on the second altar, they gave me smelling salts to bring me back. The camera panned on Ned's pained face, and John's terrorized but relieved face. Ned repeated as taught, “I hate you, Mom.” He spoke his scripted words in that mind-control monotone. I felt myself crumble as if I had lost everything, and could never get any of it back. I felt that in my life I had just misery and hopelessness, and a child pressured to hate me who would eventually hate me. The chorus chanted, “He hates his mother,” the cameras licked the words.

Taking advantage of this vulnerability, my grandfather in the center of a circle said “You think you have spine and are so fine like Bordeaux wine, here's what will make you shine,” as he kicked my body, and invited the chorus to kick me. In the recall process, for four days, I have muscle spasms that I think are from lifting my dog too much. When I retrieve this last part of this memory, my back stops hurting. It is the beginning of October 2013 now. The real event took place in the fall around 1972. The mind has inner workings that push up anniversary memories, even forty-one years later. Afterward, in my ordinary life, I did not remember this ritual. But some part of my brain kept looking for John on the street, in the neighborhood.

After the ritual, when the two thugs dragged me back to my door, and dumped me in my apartment, I saw a bottle of pills—white round ones—that did not belong to me, spilled on my night table. Todd must have dumped the pills before he said “lights out.” I took it as a message that he wanted me to kill myself. I became more depressed than usual. By now, my conscious mind didn't know a thing about John Lee, but my hidden mind thought about him constantly.

During these years of rituals and when they actively programmed Ned against me, only severe hunger would drive me from bed in the mornings. I would buy a fruit that I particularly desired and when the hunger pains mounted, I would drag myself out of bed and eat the persimmon or mango. That is how I stayed alive. Some of these feelings came back as I wrote this chapter. It felt as if my bones left my body. I had painted a mixed media canvas in the 1980s. I attached a doll that wore a starched white dress to a canvas of pasted-on strips of canvas in various shades of greenish black. The doll's bones were scattered over the canvas, though the doll maintained its prenatal position.

Rituals take a few hours, and mind-control programming sessions about half an hour, so the majority of one's time is spent in ordinary life. I had made one of the bigger accomplishments and one of the more significant mistakes of my still fairly young life in normal life. I sent my son to private school. His mind started working as if it didn't have programs in it. The true self is what the criminal cults want to obliterate. When my mother died and my program not to create was destroyed, I began writing and choreographing. Two real selves, my son and me. We had to be stopped. The long series of calculated moves to separate us intensified. Our hearts bumped and fled, knocked and hid, scarred bleeding hearts—hopelessness turned bitter.

When my son wasn't on altars or at rituals, he was a perfect student; I was a scholarship graduate student working toward a PhD, and taught modern dance classes to support us. Those parts functioning in the world knew nothing of the rituals and mind control. Absolutely nothing. We thought we were a regular person. The programmers used portable electrical gadgets to make us forget. “This ritual never happened. You weren't here. You were home asleep the whole time.”

They sent away the parts of the brain that attended, and called out the unknowing, functioning personalities. With their electricity, they could accomplish almost anything concerning the mind.

There remained a bridge between Ned and me, but it was built of coolness, temper tantrums, and defiance. The programming remained hidden inside, unknown to the personalities living normal life, but affecting all actions and feelings. And underneath the programming was the abiding love that I have for my child, and I believe that he somewhere still has for me. On the surface, however, he opposed whatever I said, and I couldn't like him.

Alison said he opposed what I said because of programming, and he was afraid I would be hurt if we were close.

The rift, 1979–1982

This criminal group wanted Ned away from me permanently. A thug, an electroshock expert, and Todd had Ned and me sitting on two hard chairs that they took from my downtown loft. Tied to parallel chairs, we received electroshocks. Me, him, me—he screamed, “Let me go, Mom.” One of their standard methods is to impersonate a parent so that the child thinks that parent is torturing him. They either use a look-alike adult or show a film and tell the child that the villain is his parent.

To get him away from them, I would send him to an excellent private school, I thought. I found a Quaker school that seemed wholesome. He would escape somehow. They separated us, but they didn't have to keep him. But the next week, his father took him away. I sat in the kitchen numb and immobile. I had turned to stone. Even electricity could not melt me now. While Todd packed up Ned's belongings, I did not think of my other stolen and killed children. These awarenesses were barricaded in recesses and caverns. I did not hear my son's logical, clear scream, “Let me go.” It was not worth the struggle, we could not win, he was saying. I thought of my mother sneaking into my bedroom when I was three, or four, or five. She held a down pillow and placed it over my head. I turned and struggled. My sister in a parallel bed screamed, and my father rushed in, and pulled Mother away as I gasped for air and knew my mother truly wanted me dead. I wished she had succeeded.

My son knew I did not want to give him up. He knew I had tried to find a better environment for him. Meanwhile Todd kept being promoted in academia, until he landed a national position. This kind of cult acquires positions like these through corruption and money, and rewards its most compliant members with prestigious high-paying jobs. It is one reason we find so many incompetent people holding positions of power. I was just a dancer and teacher. My son would be sent to power and money.

It was during the 1982 Feast of the Beast on Prince Edward Island, when the leaders tortured and pressured me the most to accept my role as queen and become fully conscious, that they cemented the rift. I was on a rack being tortured for my refusal to cooperate, when the slaves took Ned away. When he returned, he was thoroughly mind controlled against me, and probably fearful that if he was loving toward me, that I would be killed. That barrier never broke down. A tone of constrained disdain crept into his formerly loving melodic voice. Now he was on one side, and I the other. Never would he have chosen to be in this position of his own free will. One has to go through a life-threatening struggle for free will. It has not been a birth-right for us who were conceived within criminal groups like these.

ELEVEN

A mule's life

I sat in a big airplane. I didn't know how I had got here. Panic seized my throat. I receded, and another person came forward. In the time it takes to swallow or less, a person can emerge and recede. This new person was assured. She had instructions. Similar people came out with her, so she was not alone.

I was the one who emerged. I was a courier. We carried drugs and political documents from one continent to another. I walked through customs without expression. The inspectors did not look up my vagina, or into my rectum, or in any of my bras. I went by different names. I had been travelling since my late teens, two trips per year, probably a total of twenty-five.

Paris to Pakistan, 1972

The alarm clock rang at 3:45 a.m. I rolled over, pretending to sleep through the noise. Todd sat up in bed and shut off the alarm.

My clothes for this run were laid out on a chair: black trousers, new underpants, a brassiere slightly small for me, white socks, black loafers, a brown shirt. He must have gathered them after I fell asleep last night. He stored them in the narrow broom closet in the kitchen. The travel clothes would not attract attention. A “run” was when the internal couriers took something illegal from one country to another. I had many couriers in my system, but my other personalities didn't know about them. Todd pulled off my nightgown, and tried to dress me. I tried to bite his hand, but he waved four fingers on his right hand in front of my face. Something clicked in my brain, and I could not bite, kick, fight, or flee. My father had given him my hand signals as part of my dowry.

“That's good, darling girl,” my husband said. “Just you lie there.” He put on my clothes piece by piece, as if I were a child or a doll.

“Lift your arms through,” he said. His voice went up and down, which meant he was not in a robotic state like me. I lifted my arms as if I were a marionette, just there to flop around according to someone else's wishes. Life can be taken away from you just like that. The childhood, teenage years, and now this expanse of adulthood. I lived it, but it did not belong to me.

My six-year-old ran into the bedroom. He wore his blue pajama sleeper, and cried. He ran to me, and Todd said, “Help Mommy on with her shoes.” Ned pounded on my feet. He was a bright, intense boy who readily had temper tantrums. His mind ground out thoughts constantly.

Todd put on my brown parka that I wore only for runs, zipped it up, and put on my gloves. He forgot my hat and scarf. It was the Midwest in the winter, which meant brutal coldness. The building heat hadn't started yet.

I remained dazed, but parts of me floated above myself, and watched. These parts of my mind didn't like to go too far away from my body and the others. My son cried and needed his mother. So much of me wanted to spin out of this program, pick him up and tell him I'd never leave, but Todd waved the fingers, my brain pinched, and I stayed in the part of my brain that had been tortured into being a courier.

“Go back to your room,” Todd told Ned. Ned didn't challenge Todd. Then Todd slipped his arm under mine, squeezed my arm through my parka, and walked me down the three flights of the row house in Old Town. I stepped over children's bikes parked on the steps. The new neighbors who had moved into the first floor let their children leave their bikes all over the public places.

I was sleepwalking and dull. Deeper in my heart were terror and grief that I had left my crying child, so connected to me that he woke from a deep sleep when I was forced to leave him. The robot part of my brain persisted, but the feelings from the other parts formed a halo around my brain and clamored. Some parts recorded the action so that one day I could tell what happened to me and at least thousands of others. I did this for the other mothers forced to leave their crying or sleeping children to make runs for pimps, runs that they would not be conscious of doing and have no memory of having done.

Two sedans were double parked in the street outside the row houses. They glistened in the dark like wet goose feathers. A man with a shiny leather jacket and a cap put his gloved hand under my free arm. For a moment, I was sandwiched between the betrayer-husband and the hired kidnapper.

“She's a wild fire. Don't trust her,” my husband said, slipping his arm away, and turning quickly to go back into the warmer building. He wore his bedroom slippers. He knew the transfer would be swift and efficient. The front door to my building closed silently as the man opened the back door to the car, and pushed me in. I ducked my head, and he slipped in beside me. He pressed his hip into mine, pushed my back forward, clasped my gloved hands behind me, and handcuffed them. My heartbeat turned upside down. Sweat soaked my gloves even though it was freezing outside. He reached over me and pulled down the shade. I quickly looked up to my dark, shut third floor home, and my heart dropped. The man whose name I didn't know pulled down the shade on the other side. He told me to put my head down as he shoved it down. He pried open my mouth, and shoved a pill under my tongue. I felt ambivalent about the pill. If it brought me oblivion, it might not be so bad. He pulled out a handgun, and pressed it into my right temple.

The man cocked the gun and said, “I hope we don't have any big bumps or crashes.” When I was a child in bed gasping for breath through my sobs, my mother had stood in the doorway and said, “If you don't stop crying, I'll take you into bed with me.” I started to wheeze.

The car drove carefully through the narrow, dark streets. I imagined it went at exactly the speed limit. The street lamps glowed, but I couldn't read the corner signs. The program in me not to know my location was active. I fought to stay awake, but fell deeper and deeper into unconsciousness. Sometimes my head jerked up. I thought I heard Ned crying.

We arrived in the city's desolate outskirts. The driver shut the car lights off, but continued to drive. We crept slowly. Two men dressed in black, lean and quick, ran out of a warehouse. The man with the cap jerked me out of the sedan. The winter air splashed my face, and made me more alert. The two men from the warehouse grabbed my arms and walked me roughly into the warehouse, as the second sedan pulled up. Two men got out of the car. I felt the round head of a gun in my back. Even though a gun pressed into me, I could barely stay awake. My head plunged down and popped up.

Men lifted me onto an examination table. One warehouse man ripped my black trousers off. “Don't tear anything. She has to wear these clothes home," the other one said. They didn't plan on killing me then. He took the rest of my clothes off roughly, but didn't tear them.

A small, well-wrapped package sat on a side table. The leader man attempted to insert the package in my vagina. He couldn't get it in. I felt a faint pride that I had won that battle, if being naked in a warehouse and having dope inserted into you meant winning.

"We'll have to use the ass," he said.

Nearby a police siren blasted. The men froze, their muscles tensing like a mother deer spotting hunters. They darkened the room, swept the packages and clothing into a bag, and pushed me into a back room. Two men went in with me. They gagged my mouth, and held a gun to my throbbing head. My eyes looked around wildly. I feverishly wanted the police to find me, but even without the gag, I couldn't scream. I heard no knock on the door, or doors opening. The tendons on my neck jutted out brutally. Men outside whistled. They must be lookouts. After a while, the gun still held taut, a man outside whispered, "All clear."

They dragged me from the back room into a dirty, streaked bathroom. It reminded me of gas stations' bathrooms.

"Get on all fours," a man spit out. His saliva crossed the room. He appeared angry about the delay.

"She can't. She's in handcuffs," a chubbier man said.

The first man unlocked the cuffs, made a sudden, artful karate spin, and kicked me in the ribs to the ground. Another man filled the enema bag with water, and plunged the prong into my rectum. I then sat on the freezing toilet seat, shivering and having diarrhea. They used washcloths and towels to clean my legs, inserted the package in me, pried open my mouth, and forced me to swallow another pill with water from the rusty sink. They put a brassiere on me that had papers in between the material, and fastened a second bra on top of the first bra. They walked me into a wardrobe room. Closets stacked with clothes in the same style from sizes six to eighteen, and bras and underpants overflowed. Some had fallen to the ground. They chose a sturdy, inconspicuous outfit for me, similar to what I wore to get there. Hundreds, thousands of women must have passed through here. A men's division was on the other side. I felt like a cockroach.

They gave me a size eight. They tried on different pairs of shoes. None fit right. I had to be able to run if necessary. They let me wear my own shoes.

Birds outside chirped. I thought of mothers sleeping in their husbands' arms. Soon they would awaken contented, brew coffee, and boil oatmeal. Did I hear my child's crying?

The worker-man folded my clothes and put them in a black bag. He put my white socks on top and tagged the bag.

I became a mule in black pants. If I returned home and was not killed or jailed, then I would return to being a wife of an academic, making dinner parties for faculty from Mastering the Art of French Cooking, and the mother of a first grader, and a graduate student on fellowship. I remained so sleepy-doped that I could barely tell which man was which. They all scurried around as if a bomb were about to explode. The driver and my escort left. Other warehouse men controlled me now. They dragged me into an identical black sedan. Still dark, it probably was not 5:00 a.m. yet. Two men flanked me; each had a gun in my ribs. I felt them through the black coat they outfitted me with. With their guns cocked, these desperate men readied to shoot. Do not do anything rash. Go along with them. What's going on here is bigger than one woman's protesting, I said to myself mantra-style. Daniel had told me not to bring too much trouble onto myself. Other victims must have tried to escape. Why else would they use two guns?

A woman sat up front, next to the driver. I wondered how this middle-aged woman got lured into this business. What could she get from it, or what was she preventing? She must have a child at home also. We drove for a long time, though I kept falling asleep despite the guns. I had a vague sense of their giving me an injection in my arm as they dressed me in my uniform of another identity.

I saw light flickering in the distance, and signs for an airport. The car followed the signs to “International”. Lights shone gaily. Midwest International Airport. The limousine pulled up to the drop-off section for Air France. The man on the passenger side took a small suitcase out of the trunk, and stood it on the sidewalk. He handed me a purse with my passport and ticket inside.

“You're on the 5:08 a.m. flight to Paris, France, flight 538. Our people are in front, behind, and on the side of you. Don't try anything. In Paris, you take another flight. We're watching your every step,” the passenger-side man said. I walked toward customs and noticed a woman by my side, a man in front, and another behind me. They seemed to trail me. I opened my passport. My name was Sheila Richardson today. My photo was current. I couldn't remember when they had photographed me. My small suitcase and purse passed customs easily. They didn't search my body. I wanted to collapse right here on the airport's floor and go to sleep, but if I did, one of my stalkers would shoot me and flee. I believed that if I stated my correct name they would kill my child or me.

I started to come to when the woman by my right side waved four fingers on her left hand. The hand signal meant I had to stay in my stone-faced trance. The woman wore a pleated skirt and jacket. It looked like a dog trainer's outfit, the kind you saw on television during the Westminster dog shows. I passed through. I said nothing. I boarded the plane, and took my seat on the aisle.

One of the men had the aisle seat directly in front of mine, another man right behind me. I didn't know where or when the woman flanking me disappeared. Later I got up to use the bathroom in the back of the plane, and the man who sat in front trailed me. I closed the bathroom door, and noticed some of the enema had formed a skipping pattern down my leg like ants carrying breadcrumbs into a hole. I used paper towels and airplane soap to clean it, then pulled my pants back up. You would think these men would supply pads. I heard a tapping outside, not on the door but on some part of the wall. Two long taps, four short. My signal to hurry up. If I was late because of cleaning up my enema, would they kill my son? At least I was wearing trousers this time. When they dressed me in tights and a skirt, it was harder to clean myself. I opened the door, and the waiting man tipped his hat to me, which meant trouble. He rushed in, probably checking to see whether I had discarded the contents of my inner bra, the one with the political papers. I couldn't take the chance, though were it not for my child, I wouldn't have minded provoking them to murder me.

I felt something desperate, or reckless and wild rise in me, something of my original spirit perhaps. A few hours had passed since I had received a hand signal, and I must have been coming out of my trance, slowly, leaving the world of mindless, programmed robot and re-becoming flesh and blood.

A nice man with a round face and soft eyes sat in the window seat on the rear left side of the plane next to an empty seat. I rushed into it. The nice man looked up surprised, as the man who sat behind me came over, bit his nails into my shoulder and said, “Miss, you were sitting over here. You got confused.” He took me by the arm, jamming the nail of his thumb deep into my arm muscle. Squeezing my arm more and more tightly, he led me back to my original seat, smiling pleasantly at the passengers who watched him.

The next day when I was home again with my child, I would look at my arm and see a sprawling black and blue mark like an octopus shooting out feelers, seeking help. The guard-men were not supposed to use force in public, or leave marks that could jog the memory. I have to thank this bruise for getting me to this memory over four decades after it occurred. A present-day bruise with a similar shape led me right to this forbidden awareness.

Back in my seat, I wondered why the nice man with soft eyes didn't suspect something foul. Couldn't he at least have reported a problem to the flight attendant? "Miss, may I help you with your bag?" the front man said. The men formed a team, but from their dress and manner, one would never guess. The back man acted like a businessman with his gray suit, tie, and briefcase. The front man seemed like a hippie in his blue jeans, cap, and wrinkled shirt. I got simultaneous hand signals from front and back—"Stay in trance, don't speak, don't attract attention, one wrong move and we will kill your boy."

We proceeded to baggage claim as an unknown man in casual clothes approached. His skin was dark, and he didn't seem to speak English. He handed me another valise, and slipped a purse onto my left shoulder. I felt myself fold flat.

The two men kept aiming me down the jammed corridor with noisy people and foreign language signs that looked like dancing scrolls. They sat me down in a waiting room, the new purse on my shoulder, and the valise by my feet. I received a hand signal to look inside the purse. I found an American passport with a photo of me—for this leg of the trip, Sandra Daniels was my name—and tickets to Pakistan. Just then a man asked in foreign English if this seat was taken. He sat down, and I knew he was my next escort. Formally dressed, he had an inconspicuous manner. The other man sitting across from me wore gray chinos, and a blue open shirt.

I didn't have to think. They pulled the strings. The casual one waved his four fingers, thumb tucked, and I plummeted back into the trance I had just begun to emerge from. I noticed a Pepsi next to me. It must have been for me to drink. Drugs must have been in it. I would rather not know what would happen next, so I swallowed it. The man across smiled slightly, the man next to me sighed with relief. Pretty soon I would be at home with my child, figuring out how to kill my husband, if I returned.

An announcement was made in what I thought might be Pakistani, then in English, to board the plane. I didn't recognize the names of its destination cities. I didn't know where Pakistan was. In trance, I boarded the plane to Pakistan. A suspicious-looking, all-covered-up woman sat across the aisle, and eyed me through her peripheral vision.

After we landed, I stood up to get my coat, but a different coat occupied the overhead compartment. I took it, and carried it over my arm.

“Have a nice day,” the cheerful flight attendant said to the guard in front of me.

He nodded his head and tipped his hat.

“I hope you enjoyed your trip,” she said to me.

“Thank you,” I answered sweetly.

“Have a nice day,” she said to the kidnapper behind me.

“And to you,” he answered, and turned stiffly.

I saw that one man carried my first coat over his arm. He stopped, and emptied the pockets. Later he threw the coat in a garbage pail.

The men flanked me, but pretended they didn't know me. My head wouldn't stay steady. Everyone thought of Todd as a hero. He was chair of a department, and he sold his wife into slavery, and told my agents not to trust me because I was a spitfire. When I get home, I could castrate him in his sleep, or put poison in his hamburger. Couldn't these people tell how drugged I was?

I walked obediently as if in a dream into the trap of customs. I pulled my body through the airport as if it were a reluctant dog on a leash. I felt a rumble of terror like the sounds before a thunderstorm peaked. I could move, I could walk, but the terror played a roll call under my heart. I didn't think that I could contain it. It crescendoed when the officers took me into a back room and closed the door, click, click, double lock. I didn't know the nationality of the men who followed me and were now locked out. Inside here in customs, they were all Pakistanis. The men wore official uniforms, the woman a purple silk robe that brought out the blue highlights in her heaps of black hair. She translated into a distorted English.

They left my loafers on.

Right now in the present as I remember, my inner skin turns red.

They ripped me open the way eager adolescents tear open their Christmas gifts.

“Look for the bra,” the woman translated.

They ripped off the inner bra with document padding.

“Get her off the table,” the woman translated.

The men talked fast, sometimes at the same time. The woman in silk didn't translate everything.

“Maybe we should keep her. Why send her back?”

“She doesn't have a contract.”

The fear I'd had since my first run took hold of my throat. Worse than killing me, they could keep me as a sex slave. “Look at the boobs, big,” the woman translated.

“Nice boobs, bigger than our women's.”

“No, they have stretch marks.”

“We don't like stretch marks.”

“We could do better. American boobs could be better.”

“We have better right next door.”

That poor woman, I thought.

“She's no good.”

They slapped my face with the outside part of their hands, punched me in the stomach, kicked me until I buckled in two. This dialogue must have been scripted.

“Let's see if we got everything out. Maybe she's hiding something from us.”

A familiar loneliness seized me. I couldn't live in this world, with people. I thought these four men, smelly, unwashed criminals in uniform costumes, on government payroll, planned to re-explore me, but that was their signal for rape. The smell of fermented urine and dirt rose. Once I started vomiting, I could not stop. It was as if the vomit became my anger.

Behind the rape room, the men pushed me through a hidden door in a brick wall. It opened onto another square room with a familiar-style black chair. They threw me on the chair, and tilted it back. A man who wore a turban traced the blue veins on my throat with the tip of his knife. These men wanted something more from me. There was a reason they would not let me pass. A man with a turban began: “Who would think there was bright red inside these blue veins? It's as if the blood were wearing an overcoat. If we took the coat off, a lot of blood would come out—that would be a shame. That's what will happen if you disobey again. Like when you sat in the wrong seat next to that man. You don't want us to kill an innocent person. Some nice, innocent person. You don't want to force us to kill that person. If that person had helped you, he would now be dead. You don't want to force us to kill your little boy, who is at home now wondering where his mother is. It would be a shame if you didn't return to him, wouldn't it? All you have to do is behave. Sit in your right seat. Make the deliveries on your own. Go where you're supposed to go.

"We are going to give you the opportunity to redeem yourself. We don't usually do this."

Was this all they wanted, I think, just to punish me? The man with the turban started using hand signals. He said: "You will go on your own. You will travel all over the world being our mule, our puppet. If you ever disobey, remember, or tell, we will kill your boy that day."

This was what they wanted, for me to travel without the plants. I burdened their finances by needing escorts. They wanted more from me: "You will take another flight, change planes in Copenhagen. A man will take you by your left arm. You will not look right or left, just straight ahead. You will have different names. They will be on your ticket and passport. You will get your new purse when you land in Copenhagen. You are our courier girl. You have to regain our trust."

They electroshocked me as they gave me the information again about flight numbers and names. A series of songs ran through my head. I heard the melodies, but not the lyrics. As they electroshocked my nipples, they said: "It would be a shame if we didn't let you return home to your little child. It would be a shame if we had to keep you here for ever and ever. But maybe you would like living in Pakistan in one of our clean brothels, or maybe one of our not-so-clean brothels where the girls have many diseases. You can live a year or two with syphilis, before we put you out on the street. We have Americans in our brothels. Big, powerful America, and we have their girls. We could keep you here. If you disobey again.

"We would not want to have to kill him, take him out of his private school if you disobey." So they knew where he went to school.

"If you try and escape, don't do your assignment, remember or tell. We would hate to have to kill him, your boy." They spun me, then stopped the spinning abruptly, jarring me, and shook me roughly. If that happened to me at the age I am now, my bones would dislocate.

The female translator cleaned me up. She made my hair neater, and told them that I needed a new coat to cover me. The customs men had torn my clothes.

I was released from Pakistani customs. Then I could escape, but where to? Where to in Pakistan? I might have tried something in France, but not here. I would end up in a brothel, which would be full-time work.

My first run came in 1962, when I was in college. After that, I made one or two runs per year. In 1966, when I was twenty-three and pregnant, my controllers used me again. Todd walked me to the gate at La Guardia Airport. I was wearing a medium blue dress with a large bow on the bodice, the pre-feminist maternity style of the Sixties. I had a container in me within a leather pouch. Someone in me ran into the bathroom. That part didn't know what was about to happen, but knew she had to stall for time. She couldn't figure out a way to escape, so she started tweezing her eyebrows in front of the bathroom mirror. She stayed in the bathroom for a long time, tweezing. When she emerged, Todd said, “You took so long. I almost came in after you.”

During the later runs, my anticipation to be home was ecstatic. I would see and hold my child, even though he squirmed and hit. I could eat fruit and a salad without fear of moving my bowels and being killed if I could not retrieve all the dope. I could shower and wash feces off my legs, and practice sanitary ways of cleaning. I could breathe in fresh air with the windows open, and not the braided smell of urine and semen. I could go back to school, and fall into the role of an ordinary person and faculty wife. Perhaps Todd would be repentant. Other abusers offered a short-lived consideration phase. I craved being soothed and sanitized.

After one of the runs, when the limousine with my driving escorts pulled up to my home, I got out of the back seat. The front-seat man handed me my original purse and keys. He separated the key to my front door, so it stood out like a telephone pole. I walked up the three flights of steps, opened the door, and walked past the marital bedroom. It was early morning dark, maybe 4:30 a.m. Todd was in bed with a woman, probably one of his students. The girl had long, straight, blond hair, the kind men love. Her skin was anemic-looking, and she was ultra-thin. She was probably a freshman at the university. Todd was on his side of the bed with his hands folded under his head. He smirked and pretended to be asleep. I walked past this bedroom, down the hall, through the kitchen, into the back bedroom where my son was in too deep a sleep. I felt his pulse, and put my ear on his chest. He was alive but drugged. I lifted his arm, and it fell heavily. I lay next to him and held his pudgy hand with long fingers. Todd's fingers. How to escape? Was there a way to save Ned? I couldn't kill my husband tonight because of the poor used girl next to him.

It is a typical night in 2013. I sleep for a few hours and awaken with a thrust, my jaw clenched, my teeth notched like antique drawers. Another memory arises in my consciousness. An older courier went through customs stone-faced, and no one suspected her. No one peered up her vagina. She said that she took a plane with her body empty to a stopover country, which could have been Holland, France, or anywhere. She went on command into a bathroom and a woman, a native of that country, in the next locked stall, climbed underneath into hers and inserted a package of dope that had a white string attached like a tampon. If customs searched, they would think she was menstruating. The foreign native woman climbed back to her own stall, unlocked the door, and exited.

I feel my inner face underneath my skin turn scarlet. The parts of my brain, the personalities within, turn scarlet with shame. It is one thing to be a willing criminal. It is another to be an unwitting slave.

After another run, when I picked Ned up from school, Sharon the teacher said, “We missed you yesterday. Ned was upset, and not getting along with the other girls and boys.” I didn't know that I had missed a day. Ned ran up to me and pounded my legs, then bit me through my gray flannel slacks and socks. I started crying. What have I done to my child? I thought. I sat down on the floor, pulled my knees to my head, and cried. Perhaps it was the teacher's kindness that set me off, someone who seemed to care. I didn't know whether I was having a nervous breakdown, or just crying out of hopelessness. As children, my sister and I would cry only when someone was kind. My back was pressed against a bookcase filled with children's books. Toys were scattered on the floor. The teacher Sharon never would have believed where I had just been. Sharon said something to Ned, and I was able to hold his hand and take him out.

When I got home, if I got home from a run, I could tell the woman who had a child my son's age. I could tell her during one of their play-dates. I would then never hear from her again, and Ned wouldn't have the play dates. There were others I could tell, and never hear from again. So my life was surface normalcy interrupted by criminal activities that I didn't remember, and if I happened to remember enough to tell someone, I would be marked as crazy. The world colludes with crime.

Courier training

Being a mule wasn't punishment for disobedience. My training started young, in the bathtub. My father, with his hand on my left shoulder, said: “Let me see you be the little girl who spreads her legs.”

“Let me see you be the girl who lifts her behind. Let me see you be the girl who has packages put in her poupee and behind.”

While my father bathed me, first he pulled out different parts by talking, then giving hand signals. We rehearsed this every Saturday night. This was not part of the sexual training. It was the training to be a mule, what they called a courier.

I would come out of the bathroom after having been run through my exercises, and my mother and sister would be busy with something in the next room. Neither one of them would notice me. My sister would go back to our bedroom without looking into my eyes, or even at me. My mother would be like an invisible person for the rest of the night. My father looked flushed with accomplishment.

“Now we're going to create an idiot girl who people won't think is very bright. You don't have a mind, you're just a body. You can't think, you just follow directions. Whatever anyone tells you, you do, no arguments, no kicking.” Mrs. Twartski and Wiezenslowski spoke to me in the room behind the laundry room in Pleasant Hills. I wore a helmet, and sat in the black programming chair with electrodes over my naked body. They spoke to my part named Mary Jane, who was created when I was five. Mary Jane wore Mary Jane shoes, and white anklet socks.

“If we say go here, there, you don't fight or complain. Whenever we press on your nose, you're a windup toy. When we press your nose down, your job is over.”

When I was seven and three-quarters, drugged on the black chair with electrodes over my naked body, they called Mary Jane out by pressing on our nose. I had to walk little steps with a bottle in my vagina.

“Walk over there, turn around, sit down, Mary Jane.” They spread the cheeks of my backside and fit a package in it.

“Do you like the way that feels?”

“No,” I answered. They shoved it further in.

It is 2013 and I drive to the airport and experience an eruption inside of fear. I ask who feels such terror, and find the mules. They are afraid of airports. Later they will have to go through customs. We who have not been mules rush to them. We travel because we want to. We have no drugs or political papers on us. The mules agonize. The rest of us console. We will care for you, protect you.

The little boy

Ever since I started remembering decades ago, I had an impression of my entering a doorless department store with a wind wall at its front. I saw myself in my twenties, my hair in a French roll. I wore a leather skirt, like a rich American. I thought I was in Paris. The store resembled Bloomingdale's. As the years went on, the memory filled out. I had the impossible impression I had gone into the store to find a child. I was on the main floor, where they sold perfume. A little booth was to the side of the counters and a man in a robe, similar to the Brothers at the monastery, handed me a seven-year-old white boy with freckles, greenish eyes, and red hair. The man's hands were darker than mine. The signs in the store used a different alphabet; it looked like figures dancing. When I told her about this, Alison pulled up examples of South Asian languages on the computer. I recognized one of them, Urdu. I took the boy's hand and walked him out to the waiting limousine. Men sat in the front seat. The man on the passenger side held a gun in the opening between the seats. He pointed the gun at the little boy. We drove through narrow, winding streets. The little boy, who seemed experienced, and I both knew what the gun meant: one wrong move and the men would shoot this little boy. That meant if I bolted from the car, they would shoot him. The little boy knew not to talk or cry. He sat rigidly and stared ahead. He had pants and a short-sleeved shirt on. We were both robots in this hot country. His hand was on the seat. I reached for his hand again. He had short chubby fingers. I felt his heart and his breath through his fingers—beats of sadness, more sadness than fear. He might have been drugged. I let my hand tell him that I was with him, that I could not save him but that I could feel him. This boy whom I didn't know will be part of me always. This boy who was probably stolen and would eventually be killed. I sent as much of myself to this child as I could. The men in front did not feel us, but the gun kept pointing.

"Get rid of her now," a man said. They pulled over. "Get out of the car," the driver said in a heavy accent. I held onto the child. In my mind, we would both get out of the car. "Leave him." The other man cocked the gun as if to shoot the boy. I left the car. The boy was not with me but the boy was with me. The road went down sharply. Little huts were everywhere. Someone came up to me and said, "Come with me" in an accent. The car was gone. We went down a path to a hut. A woman inside the hut gave me comfortable clothes and a purse. Another car drove me on the highway to the airport.

What if they were bluffing? What if I hadn't left the car? Maybe the boy would not have been killed.

Earlier, my grandfather and father refueled a pre-existing program. We sat at the dining room table in my parents' New York City apartment. I was home from college, perhaps summer break. My grandfather, wearing his Wiezenslowski mask, put down a Jack of Clubs, Jack of Hearts, and Ace of Clubs, cues that called out my mule parts. "We have an assignment for you and you have your choice. You're going to Pakistan. You could either take a child, or transport a child, or kill a child. You'd better transport the child because you're not a good killer. Since you're a wimp and a sissy, that will be your next assignment."

Thinking of this little boy cuts through my extensive programming not to cry. Remorse fills the tears. What would have happened if I didn't take the boy out of the store or leave him?

The red-haired boy may have been one of the children bred to be used for these purposes. Then his parents would have received money or some privilege, and a slashed conscience. Or his mother might have been a brothel girl like me, who grieved his loss and yearned for him all her life. The world will never know whose little boy it was and what happened to him. Children are being used as he was right now.

TWELVE

Beginning to come alive

Creativity regained

These groups are expert at assessing infants' potential. Always on the lookout, they had spotted my creativity fast. In early childhood, my drawings, interest in color, expressive movement, and struggle to find new words and the right word tipped them off. In my ritual abuse cult, you are not allowed to do anything that lets you come close to your core self. That self, they believe, belongs to them. So my handler and her assistants used drugs, torture, threats, and extensive electroshock to command me never to be creative again. But during a programming session, my father added, “Leave all the creating to your mother and sister.” The program not to create stayed put in my splintered brain until around 1978, when my mother began her last phase of dying. In my literal child's mind that held this programming, I thought if my mother wasn't going to create, then that program was defunct. I couldn't leave the creativity to my mother and sister if my mother was dead.

I began creating in my mid-thirties. I saw dances in my head, put them on paper, and then transcribed them to space. I would notate the dances on graph paper with squiggly lines that reminded me of a movement, a color for an emotion, and words that described the movements, stage direction, interactions, and place in the score. Film, costumes, setting, and music were woven into the conception. That first year after this program broke, I choreographed seven or eight long dances and wrote over one hundred poems. I started a dance company to perform the choreography.

I had zero awareness of my true life then. I hadn't even remembered the incest. My dances were about life in general, not that I really understood what life was supposed to be. I was no longer a dead robot. The air was sweet, the sunbursts golden, the blue curtain of sky clear harmony. My cracked, tangled heart spread and opened and breathed. I felt solid.

But while I joined this artists' world, forces were against me, conspiring my recapture. And parts of my mind were against myself, as was preplanned. After all, I was a manufactured robot. Some inside parts smelled something fishy. These parts existed in my internal ghetto city and had the job of reporting to my handlers what was going on in my life. They had learned through heightened torture to obey and not question and above all not think. It takes a world of electricity to stop the brain from thinking. They told the abusers what I had done.

Reporting and recall

One internal reporter telephoned my father in New York. She told my father that I was about to mount a performance in the theater-loft I had just opened for my new dance company. I don't think my handlers ever found out why this program had broken, but they were swift to act on its demise. This father who could not care less about dance or art or me was on the next plane to the Midwest.

My inside reporters patted themselves on the back. We have done well, they thought. My front people who knew nothing of the reporting on myself were impressed that my father was travelling to see my work. He really cares, they thought. My more aware insiders screeched “Traitor, betrayer.” The creators screamed, “All our hard work for nothing, to be ruined, you fool.”

I refuse to be angry at myself, even though it eviscerated these years of my life. Those parts were tortured beings just doing what they had been tortured into believing they had to do. But here comes despair from other parts, ones with a wider view of my interior. Yes, I did this to myself. I got some creativity back, but at what cost?

Overnight, I became dead again. Electricity and rape punctuate programming. My performance's opening was that night, and I could hardly rise from my bed. My father sat in my apartment, expecting me to serve him food. He was like a black pit sucking out air and cleanliness. He was a dark hole of perversion. After the portable electroshock and the rape, he delivered the command: “When your sister telephones you, you must return to live in New York and leave the Midwest.” After the opening night performance, I had to drive him to the airport. A friend in the audience said later, “You were so filled with life and energy. What happened?”

Seasons later, his telephone call came. He put my sister on. She delivered her command: “You don't want to be a bad mother, and they'll kill Ned if you don't come.” My father returned to the phone to make sure I would be obedient. “We will kill him.” I returned to New York as ordered. Ned didn't want to leave me and live with his father, I didn't want him to leave. I clung to him, but I had to push him away to save his life, or so I thought then. My son would stay with his father. He never came back to me.

My conscious mind knew that I had been living in the Midwest, but my father had wanted me to return to New York. I couldn't consciously remember that his reason was to keep an eye on me, or that after Mother died, he had called me back, though I knew she had died. I knew I had begun creating, but didn't know it was not allowed, or that they had had to tighten the reins, get me to behave, tweak the programming. I thought I was back in New York because my father had had a heart attack. It did not help that my father and my new assigned handler, my boyfriend Eli, kept torturing me to get me to obey and stop creating. I was breaking the rules and following the rules. I was creating, which was breaking the rules, and reporting on myself, which followed the rules, but I couldn't hold it all together in my head.

Once a program breaks, it's difficult to put it back in. My front people were on one track, and my insiders couldn't stop them. Had my front people known how much the internal ones and my body suffered, I think that they would have ceased their work. But they were oblivious to the other side of my life. Even though the subject matter of my creations was still vague and abstract, the family attacks on me were vicious.

I arrived in New York in 1980 and immediately began looking at what others were performing and began auditioning. Being in New York had its benefits. A new form of art called “performance art” was buzzing. It suited what I was doing because it didn't require balletic technical skill, used multimedia, and was expressive and socially aware. The choreography I had been doing easily transformed into performance art.

First memories

One afternoon when I was walking to the Star Health Club to go for a swim, I vomited into a corner, outdoor, city trashcan onto empty cans of Tab and Coke. In my head I saw babies, one being thrown, another being stabbed. What was the matter with my mind? Why was I seeing violent, vicious scenes? More memories began to erupt. There would be no going back.

I took a class from Elaine Summers in what she named “kinetic awareness”, a body technique that helps defrost frozen tension. People would lie down on rubber balls from a toy-shop and suddenly have breakthrough memories. People who had spent their adult lives in therapy would do one session of kinetic awareness and recover a lost part of themselves. I was one of the dancers who lay on blankets in Elaine's huge loft, moved our bodies internally from our joints, then placed six-inch rubber balls under our necks. Instantly an image of my mother peeing on me appeared. Shocked tears drenched me. That was my first memory that came straight from my body, not a typical incest memory, and it hinted at something even more ominous. Memories that come from the body are compelling and easier to believe. From there, incest memories charged out like bulbs in early spring.

I was closer to my real self than I had ever been, except for the year I had spent with Daniel, when I experienced love.

Twelve-step meetings for sexual abuse

We rushed straight from our jobs without eating to the six p.m. meeting. We sat in a large oval on collapsible chairs, our feet rubbing the spilled-on basement linoleum floor of a midtown church. To open the meeting, one by one, we iconoclasts went around the room and in shame and victory confessed who our perpetrators were. Some people had always remembered the incest although they hadn't spoken about it before. More were like me, remembering only that very week or day yet another betrayal and trauma, and in the throes of absolute early shock. The group whispered fathers, stepfathers, sometimes mothers, often neighbors, siblings, teachers, religious leaders. I had always remembered my paternal grandfather's sexual abuse. Each week, I added to my personal list. Mother came first, the other grandfather, uncles, grandmother, and sister. Finally, I got to my father, who I thought had loved me, and who had protected me from my mother's rages. My outer world smashed, and each piece had a bold black line around it.

One week, I added Bambi, our miniature Doberman, and the group of comrades and strangers gasped. Shivers went through the group meeting. Eli let out a horrific scream. When I heard the scream, I thought How nice that he cares so much about what happened to me. I later realized that he was warning other cult victims not to dare follow in my memory path. I couldn't name it yet but my consciousness had entered the realm of ritual abuse: the extended family incest, bestiality, and people close to me masquerading as helpers but really blocking my path. I had a vague impression of shadowy meetings outdoors with robed figures. I had no notion yet of the mind control, but I knew I was following a stormy current in a shifting raft through dangerous waters into a disallowed unknown.

Some of us in the Manhattan 12-step support group for sexual abuse earnestly worked on excavating our treacheries. My front person scratched and dug into my brain with all my energies, gathering all my strength to endure the horrendous scenes unfurling from my mind. I would see them as if watching a movie, then record them as accurately as possible in my journals. In the morning or waking up from a nightmare, I would plow through emergent memories. In the afternoon, I would encourage the children in me to draw what they wanted to tell. I always had art supplies on hand. The children could sit on the floor and draw what they didn't have words to say.

But at night, cult-loyal perpetrators would abduct me and warn me not to believe what came out of me. The double agents in the 12-step meetings used their internal memorizers to report what survivors said. They shared experiences that reflected what was already known, pretending to disclose their deepest truths. Consciously, I didn't recognize my slimy, handsome boyfriend Eli as the main plant in this territory, but my inside parts must have known. Why didn't they warn me? Maybe they thought something worse would happen if the outside me knew. But also the nature of dissociation is for parts of the mind to endure distinct lives and not communicate with one another. A huge disconnect existed between the outside me who lived my life and the inside people in me who knew about the cult abuse and mind control and didn't tell.

Trying to help survivors

I entered the training program for kinetic awareness. Survivors came to me for sessions, and I tried to help them. At the same time, I thought I needed clinical skills to manage people's huge reactions to knowledge about themselves. Like so much of my life, I thought it was my decision to get further training. I didn't know I was programmed to go to school and become a therapist instead of an artist.

I studied and received a master's degree from Hunter College School of Social Work in 1993. Soon I had a full-time clinical practice, and many of my clients were mind control and ritual abuse survivors. Some found me honestly, but many were sent. Wherever there are mind-controlled clients, there will be plants and trespassers. They reported knowing one another from rituals. They would get some clarity in their session, but that night or week, they would be reprogrammed. Professionals didn't know how to treat them at that time.

I wrote about my experiences with my clients and my own attempts at healing myself in a clinical book. Despite the threats, I continued writing this book to expose the abusers' practices. However, a few chapters of the otherwise helpful book took an oversimplified Christian approach that I had been programmed to include. A Christian publisher gave me a contract, but when the False Memory Syndrome Foundation took hold of this field, saying that all these memories were implanted in clients and suing earnest therapists, this publisher withdrew its contract.

I also curated art exhibits on ritual abuse, which launched me onto a more serious hit list, especially after publicity. I started a lawsuit for sexual abuse against my father and an uncle, which was eventually thrown out of court because of the statute of limitations. Some of my internal parts remained fearful, others intractable. I didn't care if I was hurt. I just didn't want others to be. I gave lectures to New York City professionals and survivors on incest and what we then called satanic ritual abuse.

I depicted my incest memories in a mixed media performance piece called “INCEST: Remember & Tell,” urging the survivor audience to cut through dissociation, find their true selves, and speak out. This performance was well received, well attended, and reviewed even by major papers like The New York Times. Arlene Raven chose it for her “critic's choice” for Village Voice. The performance was funded and toured. We had sold-out audiences. After each performance, there was an open audience discussion. Women poured their stories out. Some had never told anyone before. Some of their utterances weren't completed because survivors broke out in staccato sobs. They cried “My father…” “My brother…” “My uncles…“ “My mother…” People were just beginning to speak about their mothers raping them. The play started with a scene of an actress-dancer raping a naked doll. A shudder went through the audience. The audience members were very supportive to one another. Sometimes they sat in silence when the pitch of emotion reached the theater-loft's rafters. The evenings felt holy. Men were present, but I can't remember any talking about their own abuse. A woman who directed a nursing home was in the audience and said, “Now I understand why children are so mean to their elderly parents.”

Multiple personalities

I had discovered all these memories, and had focused on helping survivors, but I didn't yet know the most important part, that I was multiple.

Some moments in a life are indelible and do not wash away no matter how many years have passed. These moments derailed the stream of my life and put me on a different path. I was in my bed, about to go to sleep or wake up, when a curtain ripped open within me. Many people inside came to the surface—I think now it was my Council, the leaders of my internal world—and told me they existed.

“No, I am not multiple,” the surface me or me's screamed back. “Others are multiple, not me. Multiplicity is a hoax,” I flailed, contradicting myself. The force of my recoil from my own being alone could have right there shredded me into fragments. I realized that I wasn't one piece but had parts to my brain that alternated and rotated and carried either shameful acts, or scenes of atrocities, or programs not to remember. I did not want to bite into the apple, but I did want to bite. My integrity and also curiosity and desire for truth urged me on, despite my recoil. The shame overwhelmed.

It took me time to yearn to be with every single part of my assaulted mind. I had continued interference not only from the inside but also from outside me. Slowly, breath by breath, thought by thought, eyelash by eyelash blink, I accepted my selves. I didn't know them yet. That would take years. But I came to know that my mind was a tangled web of despair and the condition serious.

While I was lying on my good Stearns & Foster mattress and propped up by delicious down pillows in my apartment on 108th Street and Amsterdam Avenue, either in the middle of the night or early morning, hundreds of scenes squeezed out of my constipated mind. Each scene was held by different parts of my brain, different personalities. I had to face that multitudes lived under my surface reality and I had to meet everyone. That moment was the worst and the best moment of my long life. Despite my initial revulsion, I learned that the parts I avoided are the real me, and the strongest.

Even as I had these pivotal memories that led me to the heart of ritual abuse and eventually mind control, I didn't know that each program or command to do a task was held by a different part of my brain. Nor did I realize that these parts were not random and free floating but were arranged in strict hierarchical, chronological order. Although I, like all humans and animals, was born with a natural brain, programmers hijacked it and rendered parts of it servants of evil purpose.

THIRTEEN

Trapped in therapy

The first plant—a psychologist

Elaine Summers' advanced student, Annette, referred me to a New York City psychologist to help process my budding memories. Sheila Lesser, Ph.D. had long blond hair, a child's bookworm face, and legs that seemed to go in opposite directions. Her specialty seemed to be giving practical advice, which no one needs in therapy. I imagine she did this in order to distract me from the search for traumatic memories. Although Sheila seemed to view me as a specimen, she appeared interested in my theater work and encouraging. My front person did not know that she, Eli, and a major traveling mind controller trained some of my inside parts in her office.

“Roll up your sleeve,” the international programmer said and gave me an injection. “Follow my fingers. You will remember nothing more of incest.” An electroshock.

“You will forget the memories you have,” Sheila Lesser said. “You will tell no one of these memories; you will stop your performances about incest….”

“Upon penalty of death,” Eli continued in his heavy Israeli accent while twisting my left arm backwards to almost breaking. Twice a week, I went to this therapy and about once a week, I had these anti-therapy sessions. While I was quasi-satisfied with therapy on the outside, the colonies of my insiders raged.

A warning

An inconspicuous car pulled up as I walked down McDougal Street in Greenwich Village. Eli and another man pulled me in. The man held my arm behind my back and one hand over my mouth, while my boyfriend slit my nose with a razor and said, “Stop before we kill you.” They dropped me off in front of a hospital downtown, giving me papers that identified me as Madeline Smith. The Emergency Room doctors sewed my nose, asked Madeline no questions, and discharged her. The outside me didn't notice the scar on the strip between my nostrils, or the pain. The inside me's fumed.

The cult handlers pulled me away from Sheila Lesser because she had not managed to quell my memory process and productivity. For a while I remained without professional help, which in my case meant cult help. Even though I was better off, I felt adrift. When swimming in a sea of sharks, one needs the illusion of a raft if not a lifeboat.

A bright survivor, Denise, who frequented the 12-step support meetings for survivors of sexual abuse, where Eli recruited people, called and told me of a pastoral counselor who helped survivors by doing short-term walk-throughs or visualizations of hidden memories. I felt intrigued but cautious. That night, a call woke me up and a male voice called out my scheduler. “I want to talk to the person who schedules Wendy's undercurrent life,” the voice said. It sounds like Eli, I thought. Then that part of my mind receded and another part received that information. The voice gave this pastoral counselor's phone number, which I didn't have to write down, and instructions to call her. She had an out of state area code.

The second plant—a Christian pastoral counselor

This pastoral counselor, Catherine Carter, gave in-home seminars to educate survivors, and she happened to be giving one the following week. Denise and I took the train to her town. Catherine's neighbor, a popular pastor of a large local Presbyterian church, picked us up at the station. They lived in suburban split-level homes. The pastor, Cliff, in his late thirties, had red hair, was pleasant and accommodating, in good physical shape, and over-energized. Catherine was about ten years older and overweight, used a walker to get around, and often had life-threatening asthma attacks. During her seminar, I was in a hyperactive mood, asking too many questions and responding too noticeably. My front person was not in control.

Afterward, we went from Catherine's den to the pastor's living room in his identical home across the street. Cliff, his wife Liz and her mother, Catherine and her live-in mother, Mrs. Landon, gathered around Denise and me. Mrs. Landon grabbed my wrist, put a razor blade on my wrist's veins, and said “You do what I say or else.” Mrs. Landon was a short, stocky woman with dried-up skin holding together a body that appeared empty. She had cunning and alertness but resembled stale, crumbling leaves in late fall. A lifetime of worshipping evil depletes the body of blood and life. The tip of the razor penetrated my skin. She called out the slaves my grandmother had created when she slit my scalp with her razor blade. All adult programming is grafted onto one of the personalities or a group of them that was created in childhood. Mrs. Landon got out a vacuum cleaner. “We're going to burn you at the next ritual and vacuum up your ashes unless you obey us.” Liz's bent-over mother carried the electroshock kit to the pastor, and Mrs. Landon gooed us up and injected Denise and me. Drugs carry one away from terror into a blurry compliance that can be felt as a relief.

Cliff asked Denise, “What do you want to be?” She answered, “An investment banker.” “You are not permitted,” he told her. “Wendy, what do you want to be?” I answered, “Just what I'm doing now.” “You may not do your book, choreograph, paint, or write, and you have to withdraw your lawsuit. You can be a therapist or a secretary. Denise, you can't even work.” He looked at me and said, “She's sleeping over.” Looking at Denise, he said, “She's going back to Manhattan.” Denise looked worried, more for me than for her. To me, he said, “We're going to work you over,” and about Denise he said, “Get rid of her.”

Liz drove Denise back to the train station, while Mrs. Landon continued working on the obedient child slave parts of me she had called out, using electroshock and other torture. These parts were supposed to live eternally in cages in the closet in my grandfather's second bedroom, even though he was long dead. Now she wanted them to live in cages in the closet in her guest room. “Your job is not to remember,” Mrs. Landon said to them. “If you remember, we'll make you into ashes and you will go into the vacuum, your leftovers into the garbage disposal.” She injected me over and over, and the drugs made me foggy, and nauseated. Afterward, she showed me boxes of Goobers chocolate-covered raisins and peanuts, and told me that eating them would make me not remember anything. During recent therapy where I retrieved these mind-controlled-away memories, Alison said to these child parts, “It was the drugs that made you forget.” Mrs. Landon placed an upright vacuum cleaner right by the head of my bed in the guest room, as a reminder or cue.

My front person thought They must really like me, inviting me to stay over, and such knowledgeable folks too. They must be good people, because they are Christian. My internal people blindly followed orders and had a deep sinking feeling. In the corners of my mind, I see hand signals going wild. Trapped again, others in me thought, and terror seized me. Before I left the next day, Mrs. Landon opened the sliding closet door, and I saw cages on the bottom. “This is where you will live for eternity,” she said to my child slave parts. She put a lock on the closet. My child parts shook with fear, and my internal adults didn't know how to reach them.

Catherine took me into her grip with weekly counseling sessions during the day and mind-control programming and rituals at night. Before each ritual, Cliff administered electroshock and drugs. The outdoor night-time rituals took place in a deserted field. The participants, naked under their black robes, danced wildly around a blazing bonfire. Cliff had a penchant for immodest exuberance when he was not playing the role of the restrained Presbyterian pastor. During the flamboyant ritual, he said, “Is anybody here not Christian? Anybody who is not Christian is going to be thrown in the flames.” He turned to me and called out Queen Philomena. “Are you going to be Christian or will you be thrown in the fire?” “Yes, I'll become Christian.” Queen Philomena had to protect her people within. Afterward, they dumped me at the train station. In the middle of the trip home, when I had to change trains, I made my way to the candy bar station in the middle of the two train tracks and as directed bought Goobers chocolate-covered nuts. They allowed me to choose between nuts and raisins.

I thought becoming a Christian meant going to church. For a while, I attended this pastor's church, but they said they wanted me to have a church closer to home. After the command and assault, I walked around the city wondering which Manhattan church I was supposed to attend. My inside parts were confused. I was being sucked into evil, and no one on the other side helped me pull against the current.

After a ritual with torture, Cliff said “We have found a home church for you.” Interspersed with electroshock, they gave me the address of the Acres of Grapevine Church in Manhattan and instructions to go there on Sunday “because you need Jesus for protection”.

It is the end of 2013. For days I have coaxed out this 1990 memory, clearing a path through my brain, reassuring the children who hold this memory in the cages of the locked closet that they are safe enough now to tell. The memory unfurls. The terrorized children huddled in the closet in Mrs. Landon and Catherine's guest bedroom. Small, terrorized children who trust no one shoot me images as if in a film, then talk.

In a private ritual in the pastor's living room, Cliff called out Queen Philomena. He required that she put on her cape and crown, and hold her scepter. In real life, I was practicing kinetic awareness with incest survivors at that time. Referring to my clients, he said, “You will lead your people into church and Jesus' blood. You will tell them that Christianity is the way to heal, tell them to go to church, but one of our churches. Then we will send them to our line of Christian therapists trained and ready to close them down. You will go to the Acres of Grapevine Church and lead your clients there. This is the work we have cut out for you,” he said.

Queen Philomena in me didn't want to lead people to Christ, or what these abusers considered to be their Christ. She threw down her scepter, flung off her crown and cape, and had a queenly temper tantrum with spitting and stomping.

“Then every one of your clients, past and present, will be sacrificed. We will start by chopping off their left ankle and proceed to skinning them alive. If you prefer that to happen, then disobey us.” If you have ever seen someone's ankle chopped off while they lie on an altar or the start of a skin-alive, you believe these threats. “You decide. You lead people to the churches we tell you, or you indirectly kill your clients. It's up to Queen Philomena. They are her subjects,” the pastor roared.

“You will persuade your clients that they are demonized. You will tell them the only way to be free of demons is to have deliverances in one of our churches. We will stop this movement of knowing and remembering. You will be instrumental,” Cliff said. For security reasons, they would not have killed my clients, but my drugged, terrorized parts didn't know that then.

That Sunday I took the bus to the Acres of Grapevine Church. The second I entered, a beautiful and wholesome-looking woman greeted me. Grace stuck to my side and became a friend and companion to me. Only now do I realize she was a handler.

My programmed inner parts became a member of this church and also attended the small neighborhood home groups. Going to this church had some positive effects. The music inspired and took me out of the earthly realm, a feeling of being in a family comforted me, the Bible teachings taught how to live and values, and at times I could feel what I believed to be the Holy Spirit. At this church and others like it, anything that popped into your head could be the voice of God. I took communion each week, but had convulsions right afterward. There were so many sick and injured people who attended that I didn't attract too much attention. I had experienced belonging and community in my cult life but not in real life before. My outer mind didn't hold any awareness that this was cult life again.

I am Jewish and had never considered becoming Christian until I was ordered to. Two of my cult survivor Jewish clients followed me to this church. This was before the rules against dual roles for therapists, and in any case mind-control programming supersedes generalized codes of ethics in strength.

I continued trying to do authentic therapy with my mind-control clients, kept creating, and also writing a clinical book.

Punishment

One winter night in 1990, I left my computer running, grabbed my giant study Bible, and hurried to the bus stop so as not to be late to my prayer group. The bus driver did not lower the bus steps, and as I descended, I stepped in one of the many cracks in the sidewalk and smashed my ankle. My front person thought I had the worst luck. I didn't think there was anything more to it. But there was.

Two mornings before, in the early hours, Eli, Grace, and my ex-therapist entered my apartment with a key. I sat up in bed as they streamed into my bedroom. Sheila brought in a chair from the main room. They tied me to it, while Eli pressed his gun to my head. On the outside, I showed only stunned silence. Inside, where no one could hear, were sobbing screams. Sheila did hand signals in front of my face.

SHEILA: “Wendy dear, you have misbehaved again and evoked a great deal of anger, wrath, from very high-up people who think you are not as controllable as we would like.”

GRACE: “It's Monday night now. On Wednesday night, you will go to home group. You will not walk there. You will take the bus.”

SHEILA: “You will exit the back door, look up, and see a man giving you directions. You must follow them.”

They recited lines as if they were in a high school play, I thought. Eli pressed the gun in further. Two other men entered, whom I recognized as Stan, the pastor of the Manhattan church, and the higher-up pastor, Ralph, from the other location who had sent me the client. Of course.

I thought I smelled alcohol on Ralph's breath. “I want all these art supplies cleared out.”

ELI, WITH THE GUN: “I'll take them away. I can use them.”

RALPH: “Bitch, no more painting, writing, dancing. You are through as an artist. We're about to send you away for good.”

Stan shoved a gun into my back, right behind my heart, which seemed to have stopped. With one gun pressed in, I felt as if I were hanging on a mountain. At the moment, Eli seemed aware of himself, but at any second he could fly into his demonic-style rage. Ralph spit foam. With two guns pressed in, I was floating with clouds, not sure I would land anywhere. My body was far out the window in polluted air and fragmented with hundreds of pieces going in disparate directions. Ralph grabbed Stan's gun, as if to say his violence wasn't enough, and moved it from my back to my crotch. I heard a click. “No more expressing yourself. Don't forget to take the bus Wednesday night.”

Over a decade after this “accident” occurred, it pushed its way out of my closed-down mind. I had told Alison about the bus accident during one of our therapy intensives, about what bad luck I had with all these accidents, but she thought I might have had some signal to fall, since I'd already told her I had inside parts who were trained to fall. My mind was a blank. But months later, as I walked to the post office during a lunch break at work, I envisioned a man in a suit with brown hair and a pleasant face. I didn't know him. He made circles with his hands and arms, which were bent at the elbows. He directed the hand signals to my internal parts in a deliberate way, staring into my insides. I looked more closely. He looked like a businessman who had just finished work for the day, and stood outside the back bus door among the other passengers waiting for the bus, but slightly to the side. I had a clear view of his body and hands.

The bus driver hadn't lowered the high bus steps. I carried my heavy study Bible. A girl in me began stepping down the rear exit, when someone else inside me looked up and saw this man's hands. A boy inside me behind her pushed another inside person, and the girl fell down the bus steps onto a highly cracked sidewalk. The toe of my shoe caught in one of the cracks, and I spun and fell. I lay screaming on this spider web of cracks and splits in the sidewalk. My ankle broke in three places and had a double closed dislocation. Even shots of morphine in the Emergency Room didn't take away the pain.

About ten waiting passengers observed the fall at the bus stop. The bus driver quickly lowered the bus steps, then called for an ambulance. A would-be witness slipped me a piece of paper with his name and number printed neatly on it. He told me he would witness that the bus driver hadn't lowered the steps. The front person who received the paper didn't know that this witness was the same person who had given me the hand signals.

One of the home group's members visited me at St. Luke's Hospital, and confessed in private to my front person, the queen in me, and anyone else who was listening, “All together the support and prayer group threw curses at you. We were disappointed and thought we hadn't coordinated the attack well enough. We had to keep trying.” She delivered the message that they had been trying to kill me, but they had probably just been scaring and warning me. If they had wanted me dead, it would not have been difficult to accomplish.

“But I am so injured and in a cast up to my hip for months,” I said to her.

“But we didn't kill you, so we failed.”

They wanted me to believe it was their curses that magically broke my foot, rather than my inside people obeying hand signals they had been taught in childhood.

In real life, despite my injuries, I continued doing the kind of therapy work I wanted to do. My clients, who must have been programmed to be in therapy with me, still made progress and became increasingly aware of who they were. Even though becoming a therapist wasn't my idea, I found the work rewarding and enjoyed helping people in despair. Perhaps we were all getting too close to the truth.

I had just about recovered from the bus accident in 1990, when another occurred in 1992. A giant man crashed into my head as I was swimming at the Star Health Club. When questioned, he blubbered, “I did not see her” and continued swimming. He dislocated my vertebrae and gave me a concussion. I lived, but it was another two decades before I understood what had happened. In therapy in 2013, I hear the words: “You will go to the Star Health Club. You will swim the crawl forward, then back. A large man will crash into your head.” My memory followed these words and discovered the voice of a therapist I believed was a friend. She also used hand signals. I didn't know she was a cult member and handler. I don't think the swimming pool crash was a homicidal attempt. It was another warning and branding of ownership.

Later, I was drugged and kidnapped from my Manhattan apartment and taken to the main branch of this same Christian church. A mob of people I knew, plus one international programmer, mauled me.

“You will be one of our line of therapists. When people have memories, you will erase them. You will tell people that demons are causing their memories. You will be part of our Christian army of therapists who will close down this chaotic movement to know what's real. You will become the enemy of anyone who tries to lift our veil and expose truth.” They wanted me to have credentials. “You'll go to Hunter so we can keep tabs on you. You'll be a B student there, not an A student. Then you'll be one of our gals.” They meant Hunter College School of Social Work. At least they sent me to a good school.

Slowly I began to remember these church leaders at satanic rituals. The leaders of the main branch of this unconventional church sent me a member of their congregation, who had just started to remember ritual abuse. I believed that this church was offering me a practice treating its congregation. The new rememberer sat on the sofa tense and ashamed, her arms and legs tightly crossed, not able to make eye contact. I told this young woman to reject this church and go to a safe, clean one, because this church was part of what she was trying to get away from. She left aghast and that was the last I saw of her. As soon as I remembered the pastors and congregants at rituals, I told my clients, and they and I left the church. The walls of my life recollapsed.

Ritual abuse experts

Still trying to get free and thinking I was acting on my own initiative, I got a coveted appointment with a pioneer therapist in the deep south, Sandy Flowers. Hardly anyone could get an appointment with her. As I explained myself, she stopped taking notes, circled around me as if I were an interesting antique piece, and said, “Do you remember being in a black chair? It looks like you've had black chair programming.”

I hadn't heard of black chair programming but my inside people sprung to attention, both those who wanted to be free and those who had the job of preventing freedom, and also those who were not up for any more torture.

“I'm not taking any new clients,” she said, smiling. She looked like a youngish but middle-aged Southern belle. She referred me to Judith Peterson or Ann Wilson. Why I chose the Christian baffled my front person. Had I learned nothing from the “pastoral counselor” and “evangelical church”? My front person did not know Ann was part of this cult or of the programming.

Decades later, the parts inside who held this memory all gathered together and told the front person the bad news that would lead to healing. I was back in Catherine Carter's guest bedroom still in the early 1990s. I was only partially conscious. Catherine said about me, “She's having good memories. She's close to a total breakthrough.”

CLIFF, THE PASTOR: “We'll take her off your hands. We'll send her to our old standby.” (Cliff pressed his thumb hard into my third eye.) “Juice her up.”

Mrs. Landon, Catherine's mother, lifted my left arm and injected it. My heavy arm fell back down. She put goo on me.

Cliff called out the little girls whom Mrs. Landon had put in cages in her closet, and ordered everyone else in me to go away. Mrs. Landon punctuated his orders with electroshock. I felt like a cut-up chicken under cellophane in a grocery store.

MRS. LANDON: “I'm putting a piece of paper with a name and phone number in your purse. Tomorrow you will call her and make an appointment. No one else inside you can know this information. She will be waiting for your call at 3:00.”

I went south to Sandy Flowers' office as directed, returned, and found myself again in Catherine's guest bedroom, flanked by my programmers and handlers. Cliff told me that I would go to Ann Wilson, and would not return. “If you remember what happens in Ann's territory, we will kill your son,” he said. He told Catherine she was rid of me. Eli added, “If you remember and tell, we will skin him alive," as he waved the index finger of his left hand in front of my drugged body, while shoving a tarot card of the hanged man at my face. Motherhood is particularly charged for people of this lifelong abuse. The mothers in me blocked the knowledge that I had fallen into yet another trap and was being closed down.

I left New York City and moved to the rural town Ann lived in. Instead of getting to mind control programs, parts, and structure, Ann focused on Jesus, demons, intruding human spirits, and spiritual warfare. Ann performed "deliverances" as she moved her hands back and forth spiraling upward—hand signals that meant, "If you ever tell, we will kill you or worse."

In regular "therapy", parts in me came forward and spoke. They thought it was real therapy and their chance for freedom. When a part is first coming out, it feels like a wave rising, almost like levitating. Ann persuaded me that these were not parts of myself but human spirits and demons or demonized human spirits, people who had at one time lived in the real world and had now become spirits invading my body. To rid me of these supposedly supernatural beings, she verbally bound all the demons and commanded that the demons and human spirits go to the throne of Jesus for judgment. Then she symbolically put Jesus' blood on any openings that might be left in me, to seal them and prevent them from being redemonized. She made a mob of hand movements, and I felt a movement and an eruption within me, followed by exhaustion and a need to eat protein. I thought I had been delivered.

Some of these hand movements were to get rid of my front person, who fell into a coma-type sleep while still in her office. Then, without my being conscious of it, Ann called out personalities within me and directed them to caves, caverns, closets, drawers, drawers within drawers, wells, freezers, internal coffins. Some she dumped in the rivers running through my system. Crucial parts of my existence became locked away in the recesses of my mind, and I didn't know it. She closed down the courageous parts of myself that had tried to come forward and speak. She banished my internal Council. By the time she had finished with me, all the inside parts who knew their and my story had been locked away, and my outside, everyday life person thought that I had been mostly filled with evil entities. My front person thought she had sent away the evil spirits; my inside parts knew that they had been locked away into internal representations of actual containers.

Ann convinced my front person that outside forces caused all my problems and conflicts, that I was a mere pawn in the universe. I began seeing life and the gray skies as filled with demons and demonized spirits. During the programming sessions, her Christian music played in the background, but it rendered disguised mind-control messages. She said it did spiritual warfare for her. She recited many Christian prayers using words like demons, human spirits, authority, pathways, portals, channels, protection, broken, armor, weapons, vexes, hexes, curses, vows, fallen angels, astral projection. She taught me how to handle spiritual attacks, which were really only insiders telling me the horrible truth about my life. I was to pray that the demons and curses be sent back to whoever sent them and up the chain of command threefold in Jesus' name. When I complained that that was overkill, she said, “It's what God wants.” I had to say “the Lord rebuke you” whenever I felt such “spiritual attacks”. In that way, I silenced the lucid truth seekers within. She gave me Christian books to read that held the same beliefs.

Ann's closedown of me was systematic. Drugs and torture take away the ability to think and have a will. Because she had possession of the volumes of my black book, Ann knew how to draw out and intimidate vulnerable pieces of my dissected brain. “You will never remember, tell, or write about what we do, or we will kill your only living child, of that you can be certain.” No one in me doubted it. In retrospect and without the drugs or concussions, I can see that it is doubtful they would have taken the chance of killing my son. My protective acts were most likely for nothing.

Christian therapy for the cult

During week-long intensive therapy, Ann's assistant Marge brought me drugs to sniff. Marge's husband Lenny hit me over the head with the handle of his gun. A hit over the head feels like sliding down endless winding steps on one's back. During a concussion, it's impossible to connect thoughts. Concussed thinking is like trying to knit with one knitting needle. Ann said, “This is how you close people down. As soon as someone has a memory, you know there's an alter there. Most people have been trained in hand signals. First your alternating hands pull out the alter as if pulling on a rope.

Round up all the alters, put them in a chamber (your hands go down), then use words, tell them they're in a cave, etc.—you can improvise what. Tell them they'll be there forever and put Lucifer's stamp on them so they're encapsulated, like a pill in plastic. The right fist comes down before the left. Now you will go back to New York and practice on your clients." Marge sang "O beautiful for spacious skies" and a medley of other songs. "Whenever you hear one of these songs, you will remember what your job is, why we made you into a therapist." That was lesson number one.

Lenny performed lesson number two during a different trip while I was still commuting from New York City. "Everyone has human spirits and demonized human spirits in them. Your job as a therapist is to have long conversations with these human spirits, to bind the demons, and send them to the throne of Jesus for judgment. You do rope pulling hand signals to pull them out, then flick your hand outward to send them to the throne of Jesus, and use your fists to communicate to go to the throne for judgment. With your mouth you're saying Jesus but your hands say Lucifer. Then give the hand signal that the ordinary life parts will remember nothing of these commands. Hand signals override words."

Ann continued, "Make people dependent on you, make them think the only way to get rid of these spirits is by having you do deliverances. Persuade them that they are filled with demons. You will go back to New York and practice on your clients, then move here and be part of our practice."

"Lesson four, you will hand in all information on your clients."

"Lesson five, you will tell us immediately if anyone is close to breaking free."

"Lesson six, you will go into supervision with Jennifer Winters." Jennifer Winters was one of the better-known psychologists working in this field and extremely well respected.

"Lesson seven, if Jennifer Winters tells you to send someone to a hospital, you will. She will tell you which ones."

I foolishly believed that if my clients weren't closed down, they'd be killed. The cult would not have killed them all, but I thought they would kill at least one. So I had to tell them they were filled with demons and distract them from the truth of their lives by saying they were subject to spiritual forces outside themselves. I had to tell them they were just a pawn in a battle, instead of focusing them on their thousands of inside parts. I had to make them believe that feelings and wishes cause things to happen, and that they could do horrible things to people with their minds, rather than that programmed people respond to pre-arranged signals because of mind control. Somehow no one in me was scared enough to use the hand signals. Meanwhile cult handlers most likely tortured these same people, who wanted to be free, in rituals and programming sessions. Back in New York, as I was giving my clients misinformation, thinking I was saving their lives, these clients were triggering me with hand signals, probably thinking also that they had to do it to prevent something worse happening to me. Evil thrives on victims' goodness.

I commuted to Ann's town every few months until I received another command: “We do not put you in a position to help people get free. When we give you an order, it's not for you to do what you want with. It's for you to do what we want with. You're going to close your practice and move to where Ann lives. We will keep a closer watch on you.”

After seven years, Ann and her colleagues deemed that I was sufficiently closed down and were disgruntled that it had taken so long. She needed my space for other unwitting survivors making progress in their quests for freedom, and was anxious to discard me to make sure I could not influence any of her new victims.

Right before I was sent away from her rural town, Ann drugged me and Lenny put a head vise around my now fifty-seven-year-old head, squeezed it more and more tightly until someone agreed to be a seven-year-old girl who was in charge of a whole schoolroom of internal children.

“All the children have to be told there's no point in seeing other therapists because they are all Ann. If you need a therapist, you have to go back to Ann. You must never tell anyone about Ann.” They were sure they had sealed me off for good.

They went through my black book, step by step, identifying the important personalities and enclosing them in storage containers. They repeated all the original tortures which these internal people had experienced, to emphasize that they must remain locked away and never disclose their secrets. They read that my grandfather had put me in freezers and when he separated out the black slaves in me, he had tortured me in a human-sized freezer. Ann then bought such a freezer and put it in a room adjacent to her therapy room. She called out these slaves in me, put my body in there, and told them they were stored permanently in her freezer. They are now in my internal safe house.

She told me what to say if anyone wanted to know why I had stopped therapy. “You are bored with therapy, bored. Ann, me, doesn't want you to, but you are so bored that you have to stop.”

If you are a survivor who has been closed down, go back to the closedown memories. They will tell you who has been frozen off and silenced. Then rescue those parts of yourself from storage. The mind and heart want to be whole. Your yearning for your full self will help you find what they took away. Their closedown is a road map to what is missing in you, a shortcut to self-awareness and rebuilding the self. It also will validate your memories.

Hiding a piece

The head programmers must have taught the underlings that traumatic memories resolve only when victims bring all pieces to consciousness. The closedown specialists planned to take pieces of crucial memories out and block them, so that I would never be able to complete and therefore resolve certain dissociated sequences. Ann would call out a part of me that played a role in that memory, torture and shock that part, and move it into storage in what she called a “morgue”. There the parts remained in cold storage, separated from the other parts of me who had participated in the experience. In my last session at her counseling center, Ann asked for someone who could withstand the ongoing spinning and burning to come forward. The threat of more torture hung in the air.

A heroic four-year-old came forward. “This is your assignment—when there's a painful event in your secret or outward life, you split off a small part of the memory and put it in this box. It doesn't have to be the worst part of the memory, but it has to be a part of it. Now you will leave here and will never come back for therapy but will report back to me every six months, sooner if you do anything not allowed. Go in peace, forgetting everything. Move to Baltimore, and we don't care what you do or become. Just remember nothing.”

During this castration of the self, the universe delivered a moment of joy.

The day I became a horse

Couples and families with invigorated children sprawled on the hot mustard sand. Radios and six-packs of coke and beer held down the corners of their striped, frayed-edge blankets. I was alone and needed a place where I wouldn't be crowded. I scanned my possibilities. I stepped onto the orange sand, and carried my beach chair to the water's edge. Drip castles dotted the dark wet sand. I felt disappointed not to see the wild ponies at Assateague Beach. I needed to feel close to something untamed. Perhaps they were sunning further down the shore.

The beach smelled pregnant, the color of inner grass. A few yards from the low tide, I dropped my chair, pulled off my beach robe, and put on my large straw sun hat decorated with clusters of artificial fruits on top—a banana, green grapes, and plump peaches. The breeze sculpted my mouth into a smile. I spooned my feet into the sand. My toes popped out like spring buds. My spine sank into the back of my low beach chair. My breath skimmed the green gray ocean. I exhaled into the rhythm of the vibrating waves. My pores opened and yearned for the thinnest air.

I smelled horse. Pungent, stinging. A wild pony lay down on my right side. Brown and white, slim and muscular with an eager look, it lay parallel to me, like a puppy. I was tempted to stroke its spine but it was wild. And it had fleas and flies. A fatter gray horse slid from behind and lay down on my left. I was snug tight in the middle. Two pets. A cozy living room in the center of the beach. A third, tan and delicate, approached gracefully and lowered on its balletic legs behind my chair. The brown and white one lifted its head, then rested its chin on the sand. The gray horse swished its tail. I absorbed its happiness. The tan one edged in closer.

A calm encircled me. At last, I fit in. I belonged. A community. The wild horses with fleas chose me above all the other beachgoers. Who was the leader of our pack? I wondered. Perhaps the more muscular one. My soul had no borders. It floated on the calming waves. I was with my own kind. I was chosen. I looked around for a photographer from the Baltimore Sun to record our family. The breeze enveloped my limbs. The sun became a torch above me, blazing a path. The scalding sand formed diamonds and sapphires, and I tasted salt and the richness of creation. The earth. I breathed into my part of the universe as if it were my husband. My nostrils turned inside out. Calm, calm, endless calm. A hedge of stillness held us and sealed me into their world.

I heard a rumble and felt a jolt, like the first quiver of an earthquake. My right eye's peripheral vision caught hooves a half inch from my scalp. A fourth beach pony, darker tan, fought for the spot to my right. Hooves, legs, manes, flying, neighing. On my stomach, dragging my sandals in one hand and my hat in the other, I inched toward the tide, like a crab, creeping low so as not to distract the ponies from their playing or fighting. In case of a stampede, better to be in the water than on the burning ground. Moments before, the other beachgoers held one eye transfixed and with the other shot darts of envy at me. Now some laughed. Two ponies were still butting and neighing in our nest. The sand singed. The orange and brown resonated and danced in the wind. All four ponies sped off in the same direction. My former gang flew way down the shoreline.

Maybe the beach ponies thought I was a horse. Maybe I had been in a harem. My legs reared up on the relenting sand, my arms stretched into other legs with hooves. Orange turned burgundy, and the wind waved my mane and suspended me. My spirit galloped and galloped with belonging and through the crashing waves leapt into my future and past.

* * *

I could not live as a corpse, molded into my abusers' conception of a human being. Something in me stirred, then fought to know the truth. I refused to abandon myself. All I needed was a little support and help and when I found that, I began the more targeted search inward. I had not suspected there would be so many caverns in my brain. No matter how many or how dense, I plan to travel through them all and find the captured parts of my mind. I yearn to be who I am without the programs.

FOURTEEN

But first another punishment marriage, 1998

I had thought that Darlene, the woman Ned married, was from the normal world. But at the wedding, Ned's eye twitched faster than a hummingbird's wings.

Three women flew to his wedding with me. Two stayed in the hotel, and one with her daughter who lived nearby. I saw Ned for the first time at the rehearsal dinner. He looked handsome and accomplished. As I rushed over to him, instead of rushing to me, he looked at a woman I didn't recognize. She nodded, moved both hands as if to shoo away a pesky animal. Only then did he approach me. He needed her permission to greet me! Then she came over to me, stuck her face in mine, and put a closed hand out for a shake in my face too. I said “Who are you?” and she said “Cindy, Todd's wife.” I had seen her only once, years before.

I remembered all this clearly. Then there was a big blank, and I didn't pick up any narrative until the next morning when I went to the continental breakfast in the hotel, after my two friends had already eaten. I had slept later than they had. When there's a blank and your life disappears from under you, then you know something is amiss. I had to go to therapy to retrieve the lost narrative.

In the hotel, everybody was asleep. It was after 2 a.m. My son and one of Darlene's brothers came in quietly. The brother injected me, and they silently dragged me out of the room in my nightgown. I thought about holding Ned as an infant pressed against my heart, and realized that I had led my friends unknowingly into danger. In my mind, I gripped a thick rope that sunk into a pure, olive-colored ocean, then all my thoughts suddenly froze. The men forced me down wooden steps and into a parked car, which sped along a steep driveway like a garage ramp. I felt jostled in the car, sleep-driving to somewhere. We drove a long way and arrived at an indoor banquet hall. People gathered at long rectangular tables with white tablecloths. Darlene's family dominated the head table. This could have been a fairy tale like Alice in Wonderland. Darlene and her parents and sister and sister's husband and sons were there with Todd and Cindy, the stepmother who had stuck her face and hand in mine, my former in-laws and crowds of people I didn't know. They were all drinking heavily, especially Cindy's alcoholic father, who was the most boisterous. I still wore my nightgown. Some man was kind enough to put his jacket over me. It was June 1999.

They sat Ned and me on straight chairs in the middle of their circle, tied us both up, and circled us, chanting. The crowd at the secret middle-of-the-night banquet chanted:

> Stolen from the nest
> Stolen from the nest
> He'll never rise again
> This boy of yours will never rise again
> Trapped in a marriage
> Trapped in a marriage
> Your punishments again
> He'll fall from grace, amen

"My punishment again." Yes, just like in my own marriage. Ned must not have known that he was kidnapping his mother only to be electroshocked himself.

Taser blasts assaulted both of us. In therapy, Ann instructed me never to remember this. They bounced the Tasers off me and Ned, as they chanted:

TO ME: "Let him go"
TO NED: "You'll never be free"
TO ME: "Your boy is doomed"
TO NED: "Your fate is sealed"
TO ME: "It's all because of you"
TO NED: "This is punishment for you"

TO ME: “Look at your deeds”

TO NED: “Now you're stuck”

The circling and drinking crowd sung “Booby prize…” which was insulting to Darlene, but she didn't seem to notice. Maybe the insult made her hysterical, unless she was that desperate for a husband. Then the orgy. Darlene wildly copulated with every male, while her father chased girls. Ned and I were tied up on those chairs and drugged, through the chanting:

> Poor boy, poor boy
> Undone his life
> Poor boy, poor boy
> Trapped underground for life
> No more hope for him
> All because of his sin.
> Poor mother,
> Poor mother
> No rescue possible
> No heritage possible
> All her efforts naught
> You're punished, you're through
> There's nothing more to you
> There's nothing more for you to do.

If he had done something they wanted to punish him for, if he were sufficiently rebellious for them to give him an inappropriate marriage, then he must still have a conscience. What I want for Ned is not to be one of them. He resisted. He was punished. He is holding his soul as best he can. I soar. I see light, as if from Mr. Jacobs' apartment, streak the darkness.

These drunken cultists were punishing him as they had punished me through a degrading marriage, twisting and thwarting him like a bonsai tree. I don't know what they were punishing him for—perhaps not being willing to kill. Maybe my parenting had not been for naught.

At the end of this wedding-ritual humiliation, they untied us, drove me back to the hotel, and cautioned me about not forgetting to lock the door. “It's a dangerous world out there.” Drugged, I slept for hours. When I woke up, my friends had already had their continental breakfast downstairs.

The day after I processed this memory, in the late morning, something else crept out of my mind. Some part perceived an action, a silent movement in the blackness, out of my peripheral vision. Another man had entered the room before Ned and the brother. He glided to the bed closer to the window, where my friend Amy had wanted to sleep. I saw a handkerchief flash in the dark. Silly of them to use white handkerchiefs. Then he snuck to the other bed between mine and Amy's but by then, the other two men had me sleepwalking to the door. The first man in raced through the hotel room pushing open the bathroom door, looking in the wardrobe alcove. Ned must have told them I had three friends. He hadn't known one would be staying with her daughter. It had never occurred to me that non-cult people would be drugged. In the morning, when my two friends had just returned from breakfast and I was just waking, they looked at me suspiciously. Everyone's unconscious mind must have been rattling, but nothing had slipped into consciousness yet.

During the night and for weeks afterward, two simultaneous rhythms pervaded my heart. It was sinking, and in its middle, it burst like an overripe fruit but with sadness. Soon I would be in my front person, not knowing I had endangered my friends who had just wanted a fun trip. After the enforced wedding, I wept through the night silently. Almost all of me realized that he had married into cult and that we would remain separated. Before his wedding, now and then there would be a word, gesture, or sigh from my son that recalled our connection, but mostly there was only ice with barely a crack. After the marriage, another layer of thickened ice set over the winter landscape.

The closed-down years

I remained hollow and unknowing for thirteen more years after Ann closed me down. I managed a little bit of a life. I still worked as a therapist for people who were in emotional pain. I bought a house in a suburb of Baltimore, decorated it and created a garden, made some friends. I walked around as if something huge was missing, like the inside of me. I had fewer memories than before and did less creative writing. I performed activities to absorb my anxiety. I cleaned, dusted, washed, ironed. I knitted and went shopping. I cooked dishes that had to simmer for hours, like chicken paprikash. I couldn't figure out why I had so much time for cleaning. I didn't even know that the missing me was gone.

I spent more hours at my job. As soon as Ann discarded me, I reverted to doing good therapy with clients and did not put forth any of Ann's pretend-beliefs. For me, much of being a therapist is feeling what the client is suffering. Having someone else holding their feelings lets the clients see their situations from a distance. Objectivity can set in. Changing angles frees them for a moment to transform themselves. They can then go back to their sorrow with a new perspective. My life remained stagnant until a handful of my sister's hair, a towel's fall, and a doctor's comment restarted my search.

Ned lived a short plane ride or a day's drive away from where I lived in Baltimore. I was invited to visit every couple of years. He visited me maybe twice in a decade.

I endured the insults of ordinary life without knowing about the real trespasses. I am afraid that every one of my visits coincided with a pre-planned ritual. During these rituals, my grandchildren were programmed against me, and the leaders threatened their lives as a snare to get me to kill. As I got older, I must have become more immune to their ways, because I continued to refuse, and my grandchildren were not killed. But, like me and Ned, they were raised in the cult. And I could do nothing to rescue them.

One of my first intensive therapy sessions with Alison was spent discussing how to make a child abuse report. I had called Child Protective Services and ascertained that they took out-of-state reports anonymously. They would go to the school and question the children. The children had already been mind controlled to deny. I retrieved in therapy how to signal children that it is all right to talk, as if they were reporting to a master in the cult. But the twenty minutes the worker would spend with the child could not counteract the mind control not to tell that they had received from birth on. When the parents found out, the children would be double programmed with a stronger lid. The system was not sophisticated enough, and the workers would be too naïve. I didn't know my daughter-in-law very well, but the man my son was in these rituals was not the person he was in ordinary life. Alison and I concluded that the only way I could help my grandchildren, and all children, would be by writing this memoir.

There was a death warrant on me. I was supposed to go to the 2009 Feast of the Beast, an international ritual dedicated in part to the transfer and promotion of leadership. There I would have been forced to “fall on the sword”, the ancient way of suicide, which was how my ancestor King Saul had died, my ancestor according to this group. My body would have been cooked and eaten. At my home, the forgers would have left a suicide note.

The cult relies entirely on its members' obedience. If you don't report what you're doing, they won't know. If you're not where they want you to be, they may not come after you.

These groups usually have a fail-safe plan. Since I didn't attend the last Feast of the Beast ritual to be forced to kill myself, then when I am seventy-two, they will send people—most likely family members—to escort me to another ritual where I will be required to “fall on the sword”. I have written letters to the police and left them with lawyers and doctors. The letters state that I am not suicidal or psychotic, and give the names of persons to investigate should I have a serious “accident” or die.

My son and his family visited me a few years ago, before I remembered the rituals in New England. Darlene took the lead in hurting my grandchildren and torturing them into believing their punishments were because of me. My remembering this visit is why I left Baltimore and am in hiding. I have no contact with my family. My grandchildren have probably been programmed to believe that I don't want them in my life. I care enough about them and all children to have written this book.

The tide, fall 2013

I'll have to hide. I will get in the car with my clothes and files, computer and dog. I will drive a long way. Like the bride whose train covers the ground behind her, like the snake shedding its seasonal skin, I will take steps away from my known world. Unlike the cicada that returns every seventeen years, I will not return.

I take steps away shedding love, friendship, family, money, the known world. I step into a tide, lie on my back and float. Whyo, whyo, whyo, the waves murmur. The silken sky covers me. The green ocean becomes an inflated raft. A rip tide erupts and floats me far away. I don't fight it this time. My elastic body folds, suspends.

At my first week-long intensive therapy session with Alison in 2012, I spoke about “running for my life”. I heard myself say those intense words with sincerity, but I hadn't a clue what I was talking about. I accused myself of being melodramatic, looked at myself from a distance and didn't understand the urgency of this belief. I would have left my home and arrived across the country before those parts of me who spoke these mysterious words identified themselves.

I abruptly closed down my life in Baltimore. I gave two months' notice at work, but it still felt like a sharp, unquiet end. People grieved my leaving. Of all my clients, only one understood that something was the matter and that's why I was leaving. The others said, “Enjoy your travels” and thought I was abandoning them. But an injured roofer with a frozen shoulder who had a mild mental handicap said, “Now I will have to worry about you.” He knew I wouldn't leave my practice unless I absolutely had to. This morning, my first morning in my new location, where I fled to, I am crying for the clients I left behind and didn't see through to the end. Before I left, I told a few friends the real reason. One said I was just upset and making up stories; another said, “I'm worried about you,” implying I was insane. Leaving my clients, and the hope that my family would come around, hollow out my heart.

Epilogue

My grandfather was once a scared little boy in Galicia until they forced him to decide to be evil, this grandfather who attempted to destroy so many young minds. My mother was like a firefly closed in a glass jar with only one hole punctured for air. Even when the firefly changed colors fast, it remained lidded and caught. My sister was afraid. My father was still a child doing whatever he could not to be a victim. This next generation is under the lid of this oppression.

I had a year of a boy's love. Sixty years later, I had a friend who nurtured. And another friend who cared enough about me to point me to someone who could help. Alison cared that I become free. People cared. A small amount of love can undo what man has connived from the beginning of time. Love is that potent.

Even seeing some of my mind's barriers dissolve affirms this laborious process. Even a moment of not being surrounded by satanists makes this trek through awareness worth it. The unspeakable purity of freedom is like breathing the cleanest ocean air.

Despite every day that I had expected to be my last, I have grown into an old woman. Being alive allows me to honor those who were killed or driven crazy. It allows me to remember and tell.

Today, in another country, I walk through a wooded area with my West Highland Terrier, and by chance an old man using a thick cane walks his large black dog at the same time. He tells me the herons have flown to another park because of a hawk. Multitudes of empty nests crown bereft trees.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Without Alison Miller's clinical support and steadfast encouragement to tell my story, this memoir would not have been written.

I want also to thank Baron Wormser, Eugenia Kim, and Kim Dana Kupperman for their interest, guidance, and concern.

The names and locations have been changed to protect the innocent and consequently the guilty. My name is real, as are those of Alison Miller, E. Sue Blume, Daniel David Baker, and some others.

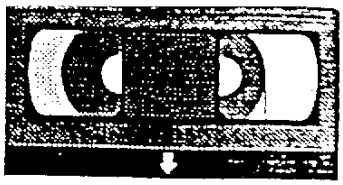
Satanic Ritual Abuse and Secret Societies



VIDEO TAPE

Satanic Ritual Abuse and Secret Societies is the first serious documentary addressing this subject. Ritua abuse involves the sexual abuse and/or sacrifice of children and others during organized religious rituals Researcher David Carrico examines the subject in detail. After beginning with the historical scriptural evidence Carrico documents the modern day occurrence. The existence of Satanic Ritual Abuse and Masonic Ritua Abuse are fully supported by facts, dates and court convictions. The following aspects are covered:

Definition of Satanic Ritual Abuse

A legal definition is followed by scriptural descriptions of the nature of Satan and other demons. Historical evidence of ritua abuse is documented in scripture.

Proof of the continued existence of Satanic Ritual Abuse

Several of the numerous recent court convictions for ritual abuse are presented. Names, dates and locations are given The information is a matter of public record and can be verified.

An examination of the claims of those who deny that Satanic Ritual Abuse occurs today

The reluctance of prosecutors to pursue ritual abuse cases as well as the reluctance of law enforcement officers to investigat such cases is discussed. The nature of recovered memories, reliability of recovered memories, and the possibility o causing additional injury to the ritual abuse victim by improper therapy are discussed. False Memory Syndrome is covered in detail. In order to understand the purpose of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, it is necessary to understand the backgrounds of its founders. Carrico documents allegations of child abuse and paedophilia directed at its founders. The impact of the False Memory Syndrome defense on survivors of ritual abuse is discussed.

The origins of Satanic Ritual Abuse & how the practice has been propagated to the present

The roots of SRA are examined and traced back to Babylonian mystery religions. The teachings and practices of the mystery religions are documented as well as the need for secrecy. Present day organizations which promote the teachings of the mystery religions are revealed. Their founders and leaders are identified and their teachings are examined. Included in the discussion are Modern Witchcraft, Rosicrucianism, The Theosophical Society, The Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and Ordo Templar Orientis, (O.T.O.).

The role of the Masonic Lodge

Carrico documents the connections between the various occult organizations and the largest secret society in existence today, the Masonic Lodge. The structure of Freemasonry is discussed. Former witch Bill Schnoebelen explains why as a witch, he was encouraged to join the Masonic Lodge. The history of Freemasonry and the identity of many pagan Masonic gods are documented in Masonic literature. Connections between Freemasonry and the ancient mystery religions are thoroughly documented. Masonic literature promoting human sacrifice and an example pact with a demon to deliver human souls to the prince of demons is shown. The similarities between Masonic ritual and the rites of Lucifer (as practiced by the Church of Satan) are discussed. Masonic Ritual Abuse, the sexual ritual abuse of children in a Masonic context, is discussed. Many victims are coming forward reporting that, as children, they were sexually abused by Masons. The numbers are too significant to be ignored. There has been legal action which resulted in conviction.

This tape is like nothing you have ever seen. It is well documented and fact filled. 88 Minutes

IS THERE A CONNECTION BETWEEN FREEMASONRY AND SATANISM ?

This book researches and explains that 'connection' and examines the common Egyptian element in both Freemasonry and Satanism. 37 Pictures, drawn by victim-survivors of Satanic ritual abuse are presented and analyzed to show the amazing similarities between Satanism and ancient Egyptian rites. The Egyptian element in Freemasonry is pursued down a path that leads to an intriging study of Black Masonry and the O.T.O.

Also included in this book are statistics from leading therapists, counselors, and counter-cult ministries concerning cases of ritual abuse alleging Masonic perpetrators.

THIS BOOK PRESENTS A VIEW NEVER SEEN BEFORE OF THE WORLD'S LARGEST SECRET SOCIETY - FREEMASONRY

CHAPTER 9 - FREEMASONRY AND SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE 113
I experienced at least 18 years of Satanic ritual abuse by several groups of Masons 113 therapists and Christian counter-cult ministries that high percentages of their victims have a connection with Freemasonry 113
90% of his victims claim that they were abused by Masonic perpetrators 113
50% of the actual abuse took place on Masonic properties 113
About half of the clients I treat report that their fathers were Masons 113

"Blue House SRA case" 113
all of the 'blue house children' claimed that they were abused by Masonic perpetrators 114 police who investigated the 'blue house case' also were Freemasons 114
Christian lay counselor 114 clients report childhood sexual and ritual abuse occurring during Masonic rituals 114 counter-cult ministry 114 known many SRA's who had Masons in their family 114
"Masonic programming" in some part of their system 114 about one-half the people I've worked with have some connection to Masons 114 major book in the field of SRA by Margaret Smith 114
Thirty-three percent said perpetrating family members were Masons 115
THE FREEMASONRY - SATANISM - SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE LINKS 115
POINT #1 - THE OVERLAPPING MEMBERSHIP 115
connection between Masonry and the various occult groups are the many leading occultists who were Freemasons 115
Baphomet was used in the Masonic lodge 115
POINT #2 - OVERLAPPING THEOLOGY 116
Masons who emphasize the universal aspect of Freemasonry and have a Kabbalistic element in their doctrine 116
POINT #3 - THE APPEAL OF MASONIC SECRECY 116
death oath not to reveal Masonic secrets or conversations 116
Secrecy is indispensable in a Mason 116
Initiate binds to himself every Mason in the world 116
POINT #4 - THE CO-ORDINATION THEORY 117
Freemasonry could theoretically fill that role 117
POINT #5 - THE RECRUITMENT POSSIBILITIES 117
Masonic lodge provides a fertile field of recruitment for other occult orders 117 first man who was known to have done this was Adam Weishaupt with his Bavarian Illumanati 117
POINT #6 - THE COVER-UP THEORY 117
Mason obligates himself to help his fellow-Mason whether he is right or wrong 117
Mason cannot tell you the 'secret word' that the Worshipful Master whispered in his ear 118
POINT #7 - THE DEMONIC LINK 118
counseled more than 550 people who were demonically invaded and many of them were affected by Masonic Lodge backgrounds 118 form of hereditary oppression can come through the Masonic Lodge 119
POINT #8 - THE GENERATIONAL LINK 119
tremendous pressure from their Masonic parents to join Masonic organizations 119

Transgenerational cults are those perpetuated through family generations . . 119
Alex Sanders who was a Freemason and a witch was initiated into witchcraft by his Grandmother 120
POINT #9 - DISSOCIATION 120
Dissociation is a defense mechanism 120
dissociation is taught to people in Satanic cults 120
Dissociation also occurs in what the Freemasons and other occultists call initiation 121

LET US SET THE RECORD STRAIGHT 122
FREEMASONRY REMAINS SUPREMELY AN ORGANIZATION THAT DECEIVES GOOD MEN! 122
IGNORANCE IS NO EXCUSE AND A POOR DEFENSE 122
THERE IS NO EXCUSE - YOUR HANDS ARE NOT CLEAN 122
RESIGN from the lodge 122
Plead forgiveness from God through his son Jesus Christ 122

RESIGNATION FORM 124

FOREWORD

It probably all started with the women's movement, which gave society the message that victims of oppression need not be silent. They should be able to talk about what happened to them without being blamed for their perpetrators' transgressions. Many of the early feminists were focused on women's rights in society. Simultaneously, women all over the States also started remembering another form of violence.[1]

In the 1970s and 80s, American women who were incest survivors started speaking out. No, they didn't seduce their fathers; they were raped. No, they didn't like it. Yes, they wish it had never happened. It scarred their lives. No, they didn't fantasize it. Their lucidity set the stage for our present decade of uncovering the hidden and naming abuses. In united voice, they contradicted the experts whose opinions joined with common "wisdom" over the centuries to sabotage truth and justice and blame innocent victims. They held self-support meetings so that survivors could share and validate one another. They wrote books on incest and produced art exhibits and theatre performances. They held "Take Back the Night" marches. National and local television talk shows started featuring incest survivors, or as they were called, incest victims. These shows reached millions of American homes and gave other silent or repressed survivors permission to remember and speak out.

At the same time, some, not all by any means, survivors of severe repressed trauma observed that they had divided parts within themselves, that different personas had different interests, manners, outlooks, personalities, functions. Professionals gave these survivors the diagnosis of Multiple Personality Disorder. As their treatment progressed, inevitably they discovered that some of the personas recalled severe sexual abuse at home, sometimes by multiple perpetrators.

As time went on, though this all happened very fast, some survivors remembered fathers and mothers raping and violating them, their brothers and sisters. Moreover, the rapes were not so secret as in families where there is incest by one parent only. Here there was open collusion. Sometimes known community members, including high up politicians and professionals, were remembered violating together. Survivors remembered that this violence occurred during rituals and ceremonies. Some, again not all, remembered religious overtones. They recalled that covens held these rituals, and that spiritual warring occurred during them. As soon as Satan was named, some churches became involved in the recovery process. Many churches continue to disbelieve this abuse exists.

Many survivors whom I have worked or spoken with observed that they had terrible reactions to their breakthrough memories, that after they had a memory, some became suicidal, felt that they were losing their minds or had other strange responses. Why should they suddenly feel so negative at the very moment of a leap into freedom? These reactions helped them and their therapists understand that this was not solely a phenomenon of physical and spiritual torture. An advanced scientific system of mind control was the main ingredient in satanic cult abuse.[2]

People's recovery process deepened, and survivors and their therapists discovered more about imposed and natural dissasociation and repression. Some survivors remembered that Masonic abuse also occurred. As each month goes on, more and more therapists and survivors are reporting this connection. Some remember their fathers taking them to Masonic meetings and rituals occurring on the characteristic black and white checkered floors. Other survivors have done art work describing their abuse, in which Masonic and satanic symbols are interwoven. Some of Ann-Marie Germain's conversations with her father, which support her memories of having been Masonically and satanically abused, were recently published in Margaret Smith's book Ritual Abuse (HarperSanFrancisco, 1993).

David L. Carrico's The Egyptian - Masonic - Satanic Connection presents the characteristics of Masonic abuse. With Rick Doninger, he describes the characteristics of satanic abuse and demonstrates how they correspond. In addition, some of what he describes as Masonic practices are also reported by satanic cult survivors, such as the kissing of certain parts of the body described on page 126. The double subterranean level shown in the illustration on page 64 matches what some survivors have described as hidden ritual sites. The demonic presences described on page 137 reflects some satanic cult survivors' experiences. Another similarity is the extensive and exact use of hand signals and motions to communicate

There's no precedent in history for understanding satanic cult abuse. It's not exposed like incest, alcoholism, the Holocaust, the mafia, what's happening in Bosnia or our ghettoes. We don't know about groups of people being mind controlled and living with no free will, but they have been with us for centuries. The Bible describes satanic practices but not mind control or the high tech electroshock programming that satanic cult survivors suffer.[4] One of the many reasons people are so reluctant to believe satanism exists is because they're not aware of a model for it in modern Western civilization. It's no accident that the Masonic connection to satanic cult abuse is slow to be revealed in survivors' memory process. The Masonic link brings survivors into the realm of the political world view that satanic cults have and how some world leaders may be involved in this exploitation.[5]

David Carrico's work is one of the first attempts to set the foundation for understanding the interconnectedness of satanism and Egyptian-Masonic abuse. This kind of historical exploration is needed to put today's world in perspective and help people understand the roots of current violence, conspiracy and destruction. The combination of personal testimonies and research has got to make a strong impact even on a sleepy, negligent society that is prone to denial. The information in this book is important.

INTRODUCTION

The title of this book causes various reactions. Some cannot see how there could possibly be a 'connection' with the subjects mentioned. We will prove that there is without a doubt a 'connection' between Freemasonry and Satanism. In this book we will examine the rituals and literature of Freemasonry and Satanism. As we proceed you will begin to see that the most prominent link is the Egyptian element with its rituals and other factors involved with the mystery religions. This Egyptian element is the common denominator between Freemasonry and Satanism.

A little over two years has passed since The EGYPTIAN - MASONIC - SATANIC CONNECTION was written and to our knowledge it was the first book that ever suggested a connection between Freemasonry and Satanic ritual abuse.

Our first book was written as a result of examining the personal disclosures of SRA victim-survivors from Evansville and other parts of the United States who contacted child advocates Mr. and Mrs. Rick Doninger for help. This is a very rough book and not for the squeamish. Exposing the deep workings of Satan can indeed be very uncomfortable, however, this is what it will take to liberate the captives and this is our mandate from our Lord:

> 11 And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather expose them.
> Ephesians 5:11 NKJV

Today the connection between Freemasonry and Satanic ritual abuse is still just a theory, but it is becoming a theory that is getting some 'teeth'. Personal testimonies from SRA victims and those who work with them from all parts of the country are now testifying to the presence of a Masonic element in their abuse. These testimonies together with all of the additional documentation that we have obtained certainly calls for a re-write of our first meager efforts.

While it is true that clergy, law enforcement, and school teachers have also frequently been named as SRA perpetrators, there are many reasons that will become apparent in this book that make the Masonic element very unique. Is there a coordinating force and link in SRA crimes that always seems to enable them to have just the right people - in just the right places - at just the right times? As more is learned about how SRA crimes are executed such a networking medium seems to be a necessity and Freemasonry could theoretically fill that role.

While the evidence is increasing in support of this theory, it is not strong enough at this time to present a case in court; and for those of us who live in the 'real world', we expect a serious investigation of the organization of Freemasonry about as much as Scotty beaming us all up to the Enterprise.

Long ago we gave up the idea of seeing the Devil tried and convicted in a human court; indeed, many of the pastors who fill the pulpits in our land can't decide whether or not Satan even exists. In the final analysis their decision doesn't really matter at all. What does matter is the fact that every time one of the victim-survivors turns in faith toward Jesus Christ, Satan looses!

JESUS IS LORD OF ALL AND THE LORD GOD OMNIPOTENT REIGNETH.

18 "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me,
Because He has anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor.
He has sent Me to heal the broken hearted,
To proclaim liberty to the captives
And recovery of sight to the blind,
To set at liberty those who are oppressed,
19 "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

Luke 4:18-19 NKJV

To the Reader:

I am pleased and honored to be able to heartily recommend THE EGYPTIAN-MASONIC-SATANIC CONNECTION. As a former member of both the occult fraternity and the Masonic fraternity who has now chosen to serve the Lord Jesus Christ instead, I must say that David Carrico's book is a ground-breaker in many ways. It accurately captures the ancient evil which undergirds the Lodge and then brings it right up to the present day with practical, Biblical solutions. It opens up several new lines of insight for me in my sutdies.

I think it is a powerful resource tool for the lay-person, pastor and Christian worker who wish to understand more about Masonry, Satanism, and their impact upon the people they encounter in their service of the King of Kings, both in terms os prayer intercession and counseling.

THE EGYPTIAN-MASONIC-SATANIC CONNECTION

(With Revised And Updated Documentation)

CHAPTER 1 - OUR INTENTION !

In this book we present a theory that there is a connection between Freemasonry, Egyptian rituals and Satanic ritual abuse. The fact that there is a connection between these things and occult crime is now impossible to deny. The mass murderer called the zodiac killer is a sad but classic example.

A Signature Taken From the Book of the Dead

> The satanic killer taunted his pursuers by sending coded messages and letters to the newspapers. His "signature" was a cross within a circle.
> "He claims he's killing people to be his slaves in the afterlife," a police investigator stated. "He has a great knowledge of the occult. His signature, or insignia, was taken directly from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, where it was used as a symbol of death."[1]

Convicted 'Son of Sam' killer David Berkowitz also testified in the quote below that the satanic cult that he was involved in was strongly influenced by the writings of Freemasons Aleister Crowley and Eliphas Levi. This cult used a "death oath" of secrecy as does Freemasonry.

> At one time I was a member of an occult group. Being sworn to secrecy or death I cannot reveal the name of the group, nor do I wish to. This group contained a mixture of Satanic practices, including the teachings of Aleister Crowley and Eliphas Levi. It was and is totally blood oriented and I am certain you know just what I mean. The coven's doctrines are a blend of ancient Druidism.... the secret orders of the Golden Dawn, black magick, and a host of other unlawful and obnoxious practices.
> To break away completely is impossible because of a pact each new member signs in his own blood. Also each new and carefully screened recruit supplies a picture... of all his family, plus their addresses. These items are used, if necessary, as tools for blackmail, coercion, and eventually physical harm should one attempt to betray the group.[2]

In his investigation of the 'Son of Sam' murders, Maury Terry uncovered evidence that the man responsible for directing the cult that committed the murders was a Freemason who used his business connections to further the goals of the satanic cult. As recorded in his book, The Ultimate Evil, Terry states:

> The top leader of the Children, not surprisingly, was said to be a lawyer who dealt in real estate, or a real estate man who also held a law degree....
>
> The Children's leader was further said to be a Mason, rank unknown, and to have owned or kept dogs. "Berkowitz occasionally watched the guy's dogs for him,".....
> This man--about whom multiple, intricate details were provided--is allegedly responsible for directing the group which committed the Son of Sam murders and other violent crimes.[3]

We will also be resenting a theory that much of today's ritual Satanic child abuse could stem from Secret Societies that are using Masonic and Egyptian rituals. Such pseudo-Masonic cults have been around for a long time and have a history of advocating violence.

If we do our job well, by the time you finish reading this book, you will have an awareness and a compassion for the children who are suffering at the hands of Satanists around the world. THIS BOOK WILL BE VERY GRAPHIC AND SOMETIMES SHOCKING BECAUSE IT WILL SAY SOME VERY HARD THINGS THAT HAVE A GREAT NEED TO BE SAID! IT WILL BE A GRAPHIC "EXPOSE" OF WHAT CAN RIGHTLY BE CALLED THE ULTIMATE EVIL.

We need to pray that law enforcement officials will become aware of this problem and learn how to put these hideous offenders behind bars. Such was the case in Dade County Florida, with Frank Fuster. The charges that were made against Frank Fuster were very disturbing.

> There were sixteen actual charges against Fuster. He was accused of eight separate counts of sexual battery and seven lewd and lascivious assaults. The last count was a charge of aggravated assault compassing different acts committed on twenty-one children. The Prosecution argued that Fuster on several occasions had threatened the children by wearing masks, making verbal threats, dancing naked, fondling sex organs, defecating and urinating in the presence of the children, by administering drugs, confining them against their will, and compelling them to eat excrement.[4]

> claimed that Frank had beaten her into submission and said Frank continually tried to insert a cross into her rectum, that he dosed her with drugs every night, that he tied her up, threatened her with a power drill, and forced her to have oral sex and give drugs to the children.[5]

No doubt, reading this has made you feel uncomfortable, and well it should. Perhaps that you, along with many, will say that you don't want to HEAR about it. BUT YOU DO NEED TO HEAR ABOUT IT! Until we are made aware of it (and unfortunately, even after we are made aware of it) INNOCENT CHILDREN WILL CONTINUE TO SUFFER at the hands of the Satanists and also often at hands of the authorities, BECAUSE MANY REFUSE TO BELIEVE THEIR DISCLOSURES! This UNBELIEF is part of Satan's plan; to make the abuse so cruel and hideous that no one would believe that anyone could do such a thing to a helpless child.

This is how the defense was conducted for Frank Fuster. Fuster owned a $ 150,000 home and was the head of the Country Walk Day Care Center. Because of those facts, Fuster's attorneys led people to believe that the charges against him were an impossibility. His lawyers stated:

> Now the government wants you to believe all the allegations these children eventually made about being abused. Now, these are children who also said that they ate heads, sipped ants through straws, saw doody monsters,[6]

Fuster's lawyers, however, were not able to convince the jury.

> ..it proved difficult to explain to the jury how Frank Fuster's seven-year old son, Jamie came to be infected with gonorrhea of the throat or why Jamie's father had recently taken a photo of him seated on a toilet, the surrounding floor smeared thickly with excrement.[7]

Frank Fuster was found guilty and will not be eligible for parole until the year 2150. Since he has been in prison, Fuster tried to hire a man to kill his wife by offering him the video tapes of the rituals he did with the children. Frank Fuster is a horrible reminder that RITUAL SATANIC CHILD ABUSE DOES HAPPEN!!

The exposure and conviction of Frank Fuster had some far-reaching effects.

> Parents initially reacted with shock, guilt, and denial. Government officials in Florida reacted strongly to the widely publicized case by assembling task forces, drafting tougher legislation, and running on election platforms in 1984 denouncing child molestation. A wave of media attention brought to light at least fourteen other child abuse arrests. Forty illegal child-care facilities were shut down in a matter of weeks. An emergency session of the legislature was held in 1985, and some forty bills pertaining to child welfare were introduced.[8]

As we see in Frank Fuster's case, SOMEONE DID BELIEVE THE CHILDREN and there was some retribution. This, unfortunately, is not always the way it ends up. I regret to say that the community's response and the response of the official authorities to Satanic ritual abuse, often is not that good. Just try to imagine how the children must feel; children who have told the truth to someone who is supposed to protect them from the ones who hurt them - and still they are not believed by the authorities. Many times the child and the mother are left at the mercy of a system that does not protect them. Hopefully, this book will be one small shot in the war to prevent ritual houses from becoming as one of Fuster's victims said:

"the house into which God could not see." [9]

Also, during the course of this book, it is hoped that the Anti-Christ nature of Freemasonry will be made known to many. Even those Masons who are repulsed by Satanism and child molestation are guilty of participating in pagan and occult rituals and of propagating a system that could provide a cloak of secrecy for evil deeds.

If you think that Egypt, Masonry, and Satanism are three odd topics to group together, you will discover by the end of our book that these are three intricately intertwined and interwoven subjects. You will come to see that there is an Egyptian-Masonic-Satanic Connection. The search for the solution takes us back to faith in the shed blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, of whom it was said:

> (1 John 3:8 KJV) He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.

Many have chosen to remain silent while the innocent suffer.

Therefore We Speak !

> (2 Corinthians 13:8 KJV) For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.

CHAPTER 2 - THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS

In this chapter we will be examining the pagan mystery religions that had their origin in ancient Babylon. These pagan mysteries will be used by Satan in the time of the end to form the backbone of the apostate church that is prophesied in scripture.

> (Revelation 17:1-6 KJV) And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters: {2} With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. {3} So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. {4} And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: {5} And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. {6} And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.

To lay the groundwork for our study, we are going to begin by making a brief study of the Ancient Mystery Religions. We are going to quote an article from Mackey's Revised Encyclopedia of Freemasonry to try to understand what the mystery religions were.

> Each of the Pagan gods, says Warburton....had, besides the public and open, a secret worship paid to him, to which none were admitted but those who had been selected by preparatory ceremonies called Initiation. This secret worship was termed the Mysteries.[10]

This statement confirms the fact, that in addition to the public worship that the average person could attend, secret meetings for the "initiated" were also held in secluded areas, caves, and behind closed doors. The ancient mystery religions functioned in the same manner as modern secret societies function with members sworn by oath not to reveal what goes on at the meetings.

This certainly seems like a strange way to operate. If what they were doing was so great and Godly and wonderful, why didn't they tell everyone so that all could come and learn about the things of God? There certainly was a reason why they didn't want the public to know what they did at their secret meetings, but their reason had nothing whatsoever to do with God. As we trace the Ancient Mystery Religions back to their origin we can easily understand why they had to do what they did under the cloak of secrecy. This is not the way of the knowledge and worship of the true God! He wants the worship of Him to be open, public, above board, and free to all that all may come and hear the life-changing Gospel of Jesus Christ.

> (Isaiah 45:19 KJV) I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth: I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain: I the LORD speak righteousness, I declare things that are right.
> (John 18:20 KJV) Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing.

THE ORIGIN OF THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS

To get back to the very beginning of the mystery religions we must begin with a man named Nimrod. The Bible speaks of Nimrod in the tenth chapter of Genesis as being a member of the family of Ham, one of the sons of Noah.

> (Genesis 10:6-10 KJV) And the sons of Ham; Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan. {7} And the sons of Cush; Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, and Sabtechah: and the sons of Raamah; Sheba, and Dedan. {8} And Cush begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth. {9} He was a mighty hunter before the LORD: wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the LORD. {10} And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar.

According to the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, Nimrod was the man who was responsible for the building of the Tower of Babel. This is the first recorded attempt of man trying to establish a One World Government and a Universal Religion in opposition to God.

> Now it was Nimrod who excited them to such an affront and contempt of God. He was the grandson of Ham, the son of Noah, a bold man, and of great strength of hand. He persuaded them not to ascribe it to God, as if it was through his means that they were happy, but to believe that it was their own courage which procured that happiness. He also gradually changed the government into tyranny, -seeing no other way of turning men from the fear of God, but to bring them into a constant dependence upon his power. He also said he would be revenged on God, if he should have a mind to drown the world again; for that he would build a tower too high for the waters to be able to reach! and that he would avenge himself on God for destroying their forefathers![11]

God did not want a One World Government or a New World Order ruled by the tyranny and oppression of man, but it was his will that the peoples of the earth be divided into nations and spread over all of the earth. Genesis 10:25 appears to refer to God's first attempt to divide the people of the earth into nations.

> (Genesis 10:25 KJV) And unto Eber were born two sons: the name of one was Peleg; for in his days was the earth divided; and his brother's name was Joktan.

Expositor Robert Candlish comments on Genesis 10:25:

> Eber receives a commission from God to divide the earth among them--to announce to the several tribes and families their appointed homes, and to lay down, as on a map, their different routes and destinations. This charge he executes, and in memory of so remarkable a transaction, he gives the name of Peleg, signifying "division," to his son, born about the time when it took place.[12]

It is clearly God's will as revealed in the Scriptures for the people of the Earth to be divided into nations and therefore the action of Nimrod in building the Tower of Babel was clearly an act of rebellion against God.

> (Deuteronomy 32:8 KJV) When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel.

> (Acts 17:26 KJV) And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation;

The plan of Nimrod failed because God intervened and confounded their language.

> (Genesis 11:7-8 KJV) Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. {8} So the LORD scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city.

The Bible also tells us that one day the dream of Nimrod for a One World Government and a One World Religion will be realized in the man that the book of Revelation calls the Beast.

> (Revelation 13:7-8 KJV) And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. {8} And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

Nimrod was apparently killed because of his open and public displays of wickedness. Herein lies the real reason for the establishment of the secret mystery religion. It was not created out of any desire to spread the real truth about God but only to protect themselves from public outcry and retribution because of the wicked acts that they were committing. The following commentary is from Rev. Alexander Hilsop's book, The Two Babylons:

> It seems to have been now only when the dead hero was to be deified, that the secret Mysteries were set up. The previous form of apostasy during the life of Nimrod appears to have been open and public. Now it was evidently felt that publicity was out of the question.[13]

In the History of Freemasonry published by the Masonic History Company, we find that Nimrod is honored as a "great Mason" and his early attempt at establishing a "New World Order" earned him the distinction of being called the "first Grand Master".

> We see, therefore, that the Masons of the present day are wrong when they make Babel or Babylon the symbol of intellectual darkness, and suppose that there the light of Masonry was for a time extinguished, to be re-illumined only at the Temple of Solomon.
> And, again, the Legend of the Craft vindicates its character, and correctly clothes an historical fact in symbolic language, when it portrays Babylonia, which was undoubtedly the fountain of all Semitic science and architecture, as also the birth-place of Operative Masonry.[14]

> The universal sentiment of the Masons of the present day is to confer upon Solomon, King of Israel, the honor of being their "first Grand Master." But the Legend of the Craft had long before, though there was a tradition of the temple extant, bestowed, at least by implication, that title upon Nimrod, the King of Babylonia and Assyria.[15]

> The Craft have in both forms of the legend recognized Nimrod as a great Mason, nor have the vituperations of Josephus and the scandalous legends of the orientalists had the slightest effect on their apparent estimation of that mighty monarch, the founder of nations and the builder of cities.[16]

While the ancient Kingdom of Babylon fell, its religion conquered all who conquered it and spread its system of evil all over the world. Once again, from Hilsop's book, The Two Babyons:

> ...it will be readily perceived that, in these circumstances, if idolatry was to continue–if, above all, it was to take a step in advance, it was indispensable that it should operated in secret. The terror of an execution, inflicted on one so mighty as Nimrod, made it needful that, for some time to come at least, the extreme of caution should be used. In these circumstances, then, began, there can hardly be a doubt, that system of "Mystery," which, having Babylon for its center, has spread over the world. In these Mysteries, under the seal of secrecy and the sanction of an oath, and by means of all the fertile resources of magic, men were gradually led back to all the idolatry that had been publicly suppressed, while new features were added to that idolatry that made it still more blasphemous than before.[17]

This Mystery Religion, with its origin established in the ancient kingdom of Babylon, is still being carried on by various groups today. These groups which are propagating the Ancient Religion of Satan form the cornerstone of what the Bible calls in Revelation Chapter seventeen, "Mystery Babylon". Even in its infant stages this Satanic form of worship contained the trappings of what we know as modern Satanism with its occult symbols, ritual fires, candles, and other occult paraphernalia. Comments from Woodrow's book, Babylon Mystery Religion:

> Much of the Babylonian worship was carried on through mysterious symbols–it was a "mystery" religion. Since the deified Nimrod was believed to be the sun god, fire was considered his earthly representation. Thus, as we shall see, candles and ritual fires were lighted in his honor. In other forms, he was symbolized by sun images, fish, trees, pillars, and animals.[18]

We see another connection between the Ancient Mystery Religions and Modern Satanism in learning from Masonic authority Albert Pike that the Mystery Religions were celebrated at the Autumnal Equinox and the Spring Equinox - two days that are also celebrated by Modern Satanists as Satanic holidays.

Quoted from Albert Pike's book, Morals and Dogma:

> We celebrate the August Mysteries of Ceres and Proserpine," says the Emperor Julian, "at the Autumal equinox, to obtain of the gods that the soul may not experience the malignant action of the Power of Darkness that is then about to have sway and rule in Nature."[19]
> Ezekiel speaks of the festivals of Adonis under the name of those of Thammuz, an Assyrian Deity, whom every year the women mourned, seated at the doors of their dwellings. These Mysteries, like the others, were celebrated in the Spring, at the Vernal Equinox, when he was restored to life; at which time, when they were instituted, the Sun (Adon, Lord, or Master) was in the Sign Taurus, the domicile of Venus.[20]

The Ritual Calendar below is from The Edge of Evil, by Jerry Jonston.

January 7	St. Winebald Day	Blood Rituals
January 17	Satanic Revels	Sexual Rituals
February 2	Satanic Revels	Sexual Rituals
February 25	St. Walpurgis Day	Blood Rituals
March 1	St. Eichatadt Day	Blood Rituals
March 20	Equinox Feast Day	Sexual Rituals
April 26-May 1	Grand Climax	Blood Rituals
June 21	Solstice Feast Day	Sexual Rituals
July 1	Demon Revels	Blood Rituals
August 3	Satanic Revels	Sexual Rituals
September 7	Marriage to the Beast	Sexual Rituals
September 20	Midnight Host	Blood Rituals
September 22	Equinox Feast Day	Sexual Rituals
October 29	All Hallow Eve	Blood Rituals
November 1	Halloween	Sexual Rituals
November 4	Satanic Revels	Sexual Rituals
December 22	Solstice Feast Day	Sexual Rituals
December 24	High Grand Climax	Blood Rituals

In addition to the above dates, a satanic group member's birthday is considered a special holiday. .....,the satanic calendar revolves every 28 years, culminating in a year-long series of celebrations called the "Feast of the Beast." The next Feast of the Beast will occur in the year 2009.[21]

By comparing this Ritual Calendar with the information previously quoted from Albert Pike you can see that the days held sacred for the celebration of the Mystery Religions are indeed days that are used by Satanists for Satanic rituals. In the following statement by Masonic authority Albert Pike the satanic nature of the Mystery Religions can once again be seen.

> The powers revered in the Mysteries were all in reality Nature-Gods;[22]

The pagan origins of Freemasonry becomes apparent as we examine the two pages of pictures of pagan gods. The pictures are taken from The History of Freemasonry published by the Masonic History Company. These pictures are given the following explanation in the History of Freemasonry.

> "Krause gives ample proof that the Colleges of Artificers made use of symbols derived from the implements and usages of their craft.[23]
>
> It would, indeed, be strange if, with such an education, the various craftsmen had failed to have imbued their trades with that same symbolic spirit which was infused into all their religious rites and their public and private acts."
>
> In plates 1 and 2 (pages 1719 and 1720) we have shown a very few of the symbols used by the Ancients in their mythologies, and which are copied from Calmet, and herewith is a short description of each.[24]

According to the Bible the worship of idols and other gods will bring us into fellowship with demons.

> (1 Corinthians 10:19-20 KJV) What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? {20} But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

Thus, in the Mystery Religions, a system was set up that brought people into direct demonic contact and schooled them in the occult arts. In this chapter we have learned what the Ancient Mystery Religions were and how they came about. We have revealed their satanic nature and have identified them as what the Bible calls Mystery Babylon. In the next chapter we will be showing the direct connection between the Mystery Religions and the Most Powerful Secret Society in the world today - the Masonic Lodge.

Among these pictures of gods that were taken from the Masonic History Book are the pagan dieties who were the most viscous opponents of God's people in the pages of Scripture. On page 13, upper left No. 13 is the goddess Ashtoreth; center page No. 10 is the pagan god Dagon; lower left No. 19 and No. 20 are of the god Baal to whom human children were sacrificed; and toward the top left No. 17 is the Satanic Goat of Mendes.

CHAPTER 3 - FREEMASONRY AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

In this chapter we will reveal the definite possibility of a connection between Freemasonry and human sacrifice. We will do this by simply presenting documentation and drawing logical conclusions. The points that will be established are as follows:

- 1. THE CONNECTION BETWEEN FREEMASONRY AND THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS.
- 2. THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND HUMAN SACRIFICE.

  Having established that there is a definite CONNECTION BETWEEN FREEMASONRY AND THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS - and also that there is a definite CONNECTION BETWEEN THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND HUMAN SACRIFICE – this logically necessitates the possibility that there is a -

- 3. CONNECTION BETWEEN FREEMASONRY AND HUMAN SACRIFICE; and documentation toward that conclusion will be presented.

We have chosen, for the sake of our research, to take the advice of one of these Masonic books that we will be quoting and read some of the stories of the Mystery Religions. To be precise, we will research the best possible place to learn about Freemasonry and the Mystery Religions - a book written on the subject by a Freemason.

 Please understand that what we are going to quote is very graphic and quite offensive to most Christians, however we feel we must present evidence to support our conclusions. We feel it is best to let you, the reader, see the true depth of evil that is contained in the Mystery Religions. Many Masons would like to present this material as harmless to their spiritual walk.

■ 1. THE CONNECTION BETWEEN FREEMASONRY AND THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS

There is certainly no shortage of testimonies by Masonic authorities as to the relationship of Freemasonry and the Mystery Religions. According to Joseph Fort Newton, Masonry is the "spiritual descendant" of the Mysteries. Joseph Fort Newton was a 33° Mason who served as Past Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Iowa and Past Grand Prelate of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar of the United States. In his book, The Builders, he states:

> Masonry stands in this tradition; and if we may not say that it is historically related to the great ancient orders, it is their spiritual descendant, and renders much the same ministry to our age which the Mysteries rendered to the olden world.[27]

In his book, The Meaning of Masonry, W.L. Wilmshurst, the Past Provincial Grand Registrar (West Yorks) makes the following statement:

> It remains with the Craft itself whether it shall enter upon its own heritage as a lineal successor of the ancient Mysteries and Wisdom–teaching, or whether, by failing so to do, it will undergo the inevitable fate of everything that is but a form from which its native spirit has departed.[28]

The book, Freemasonry Its Hidden Meaning, by George H. Steinmetz, published by Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Company, calls the "teaching of the Mysteries, the true parent of Freemasonry" and states that Freemasonry is a descendent or reincarnation of the Mysteries.

> It is entirely out of harmony with the profound teaching of the Mysteries, the true parent of Freemasonry.[29]

> If Freemasonry is the actual descendant or, if one prefers the term, reincarnation of the Mysteries, back of its "veil of allegory," then must be concealed a deeper truth than expounded in the various lectures of the degrees.[30]

It is from this book, The Spirit of Masonry, by Foster Bailey, that we will take a quote concerning Masonry and the Mystery Religions. Bailey plainly says that Masonry is carrying on the work of the ancient Mystery schools.

> Study of spiritual realities found in Masonry reveals that we have perpetuated and increasingly activated the essential principals of the ancient Mystery Schools which have existed from the very earliest times.[31]

The Masonic authority, Albert Pike, also testifies to the relation of Freemasonry to the Mystery Religions.

> The Mysteries, like the symbols of Masonry, were but an image of the eloquent analogies of Nature;.....[32]

> Masonry, successor of the Mysteries, still follows the ancient manner of teaching. Her ceremonies are like the ancient mystic shows,–not the reading of an essay, but the opening of a problem, requiring research, and constituting philosophy the arch-expounder.[33]

Freemason Albert Churchwood writes in his book about the connection between Freemasonry and the religion of Babylon:

But the secrets these operative Masons had were received from the Chaldean Magicians.[34]

The next documentation, a Masonic oath, the OATH OF NIMROD, is also from Churchwood's book.

Oath of Nimrod

Apprentice Degree (1st).

I,.....do , in the presence of El Shaddai and of this Worshipful Assembly of Free Masons, Rough Masons, Wallers, Slaters, Paviors, Plaisterers and Bricklayers, promise and declare that I will not at any time hereafter, by any act or circumstance whatsoever, directly or indirectly, write, print, cut, mark, publish, discover, reveal, or make known, any part or parts of the Trade secrets, privileges, or counsells of the Worshipful Fraternity or Fellowship of Free Masonry, which I may have known at any time, or at any time hereafter shall be made known unto me.

The penalty for breaking this great oath shall be the loss of my life.

That I shall be branded with the mark of the Traitor and slain according to ancient custom by being throtalled, that my body shall be buried in the rough sands of the sea a cable's length from the shore where the tide regularly ebbs and flows twice in the twenty-four hours, so that my soul shall have no rest by night or by day–

(Candidate Signs the O.B.)

Given under my hand and sealed with my lips, this day of 1913.

So help me El Shaddai and the holy contents of this book.[35]

The Masonic Lodge in Indiana makes no effort to hide its connection with the Mystery Religions. It openly boasts of its connection with the Ancient Mysteries. The Master Mason, a book authorized by the Grand Lodge F.& A.M. of Indiana and compiled by the Committee on Masonic Education, plainly shows the connection between Hiram Abiff and the Mystery Religions.

The idea that lies behind the Hiramic legend is as old as religious thinking among men. The same elements existed in the story of Osiris, which was celebrated by the Egyptians in their ancient temples; the old Persians told it concerning Mithras, their hero god. In Syria, the Dionysian Mysteries had the very same elements in the story of Dionysius: for the > Romans, Bacchus was the god who died and lived again. There is also the story of Tammuz, older than any of these. These are collectively referred to as the ancient mysteries. They were celebrated by secret societies, much like ours, with allegorical ceremonies, during which the initiates were advanced from one degree to another in these old societies. Read these old stories for yourself and marvel how men in all ages have taught the same great truths in the same effective way.[36]

The book, The Master Mason, quoted above challenges the Freemason to read the stories of these Old Mystery Religions to see how they teach the same "great truths" as Freemasonry. The truth is: the Mystery Religions were the enemies of the church in New Testament times; they were pagan and Satanic, loaded with rituals that included sexual perversion and even human sacrifice.

In the previous quote, the Indiana lodge proudly states that Hiram Abiff had a direct relationship to Tammuz, which was clearly denounced as an abomination by the Old Testament prophets.

> (Ezekiel 8:13-14 KJV) He said also unto me, Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do. {14} Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the LORD'S house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz.

We have seen how the passage in Ezekiel condemned this type of rite as an abominatin to the Lord. We have read how the Indiana lodge knows the connection of Hiram Abiff and Tammuz; however, we have met many Freemasons, claiming to be Christians, who proudly defend their membership in the Masonic Lodge. The idea of such statements is staggering!

Other Masonic authors also brag about the connection between Freemasonry and the Ancient Mysteries, the Ancient Wisdom, and the Occult, etc. Henry C. Clausen, 33° Sovereign Grand Commander says in his book, Your Amazing Mystic Powers:

> A new day is dawning for Freemasonry. From the insufficiencies of modern theology, the hopelessness of materialism, and the sterility of academic philosophy, men are turning to those eternal truths perpetuated in the arcana of the ancient mysteries.[37]

Mason S. R. Parchment states in his book, Ancient Operative Masonry:

> The hierophants of the universal science and sublime philosophy taught in the Great Mysteries of Egypt, India, Persia, Chaldea and other nations of antiquity, revealed certain secrets pertaining to the finer forces of > nature to such candidates as were worthy and well qualified. These faithful ones were also instructed in the doctrine of universal Brotherhood, and finally initiated into the "I am that I am" consciousness. These ideals are the landmarks, traditions and glyphics of Ancient Operative Freemasonry–nothing more.[38]

Mason R. Swinburne Clymer, M. D., says in the introduction of his book, The Mysticism of Masonry:

> There are indeed many reasons why the present volume should be generously circulated among all classes of students of the Occult and Mystic, especially the members of the Masonic bodies.[39]
>
> The vast majority of Masons smile with derision when the term "Occult Science" is used in connection with the Mysteries but, despite this, if it had not been for the Occult Fraternities, Masonry could not have existed.[40]
>
> It is the duty of every sincere Mason who is interested in the spirit of the teachings of his Order, carefully to study the philosophy of the masters who have reconstructed the Ancient Wisdom to suit his needs, and having done so, to guide his actions in all the affairs of life so as to be prepared for his entrance into the Great Lodge hall where he must give an account of all his deeds and in return receive his "Mark."[41]

And also from the book:

> All Masonry of the past dealt largely with the ethics and symbolism of the Ancient Mysteries. If the Masons of the present age will but seek for the spirit of the symbolism upon which the degrees are based, the grandest achievements in the knowledge and reconstruction will be possible and the mysteries concealed in the Greater Mysteries of Antiquity will be recovered to them.[42]

Another Masonic author J. D. Buck 32° makes these statements in his introduction of his book, Symbolism or Mystic Masonry:

> Freemasonry is modeled on the plan of the Ancient Mysteries, with their glyphics and allegories, and this is no mere coincidence; the parallels are too closely drawn.[43]

In his book, A Bridge to Light, published by the Supreme Council of U.S.A., 32° Freemason Rex R. Hutchens explains about the 23rd degree in the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry:

> Here we begin the symbolic initiations into the Mysteries practiced by the ancients from whom Masonry has obtained her great truths.[44]

32° Rev. Charles H. Vail speaks about one of the rites in the Blue Lodge in his book, Ancient Mysteries and Modern Masonry published by the Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Co.:

The Rite of Circumambulation

> This Rite again connects Freemasonry with the Ancient Mysteries. It consists in a formal procession around the altar, and originally alluded to the apparent course of the sun which is from east to west. In ancient Greece the priests, during the Rites of sacrifice, walked three times around the altar while chanting a sacred hymn, which was divided into three parts, and each part was to be sung at a particular point in the procession. The analogy between this practice of the ancients and the recitations of a passage of Scripture in the Masonic circumambulation is quite apparent.[45]

Another Masonic author, Lynn F. Perkins states:

> At one point in the Ritual reference is made to the hidden Mysteries of Ancient Freemasonry. If there were no other references, or allusions, this one alone would be sufficient to indicate to any informed person that Modern Speculative Masonry is founded upon the Ancient Wisdom of the so-called "Mystery Schools" that are known to have existed in ancient Egypt, Persia, India, Tibet, Palistine, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy.[46]

We believe the documentation above should be sufficient to establish in the minds of honest-hearted people an undeniable link between the Masonic Lodge and the Mystery Religions. Not because we say so, but because we have read the testimony from their own Masonic authorities. It is clear that there are men who are using the modern Masonic Lodge to carry on the work of the ancient Mystery Religions. This is a cup of abomination from which Christians cannot drink.

> (Revelation 18:2-5 KJV) And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. {3} For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. {4} And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. {5} For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.

2. THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

The link between human sacrifice and the Mystery Religions can be established beyond a shadow of a doubt. The following description of the rites of Dionysus sounds very similar to the stories that are told by present day satanic cult survivors.

> DIONYSUS - In classical mythology, the god of wine and fertility. His cult was widespread in Thrace, where the Thracian women were particularly dedicated to his orgiastic rites. The women, Maenads, in their ecstatic frenzy, abandoned their homes, roamed the fields and hillsides, dancing, swinging their flaming torches. In their passion they caught and tore apart animals, sometimes even children, and devoured the flesh, thus acquiring communion with the divinity.[47]
> MYSTERY RELIGIONS - Certain pagan religions received initiates by secret rites that were not publicly divulged. The secret knowledge thus acquired by the aspirant would ensure advantages in his present life and in the life after death.....
> The Dionysiac mysteries were observed in different places. The ceremonies which were orgiastic, required the drinking of the sacred wine, the eating of raw flesh of the sacrificed animal, drinking its blood. The ultimate purpose of the cult was an assurance of immortality.....
> In Syria the mysteries, again involving a vegetation myth, centered around Adonis, the consort of the Nature Goddess, who dies and is reborn.
> The Egyptian mysteries of Isis and Osiris were popular throughout the Graeco-Roman world.[48]

Once again we feel we must apologize for the offensive nature of the quotes. However, as long as men will try to defend Freemasonry as something that is compatible with Christianity, we feel even more compelled to bring the facts to light and challenge Freemasons who profess Christianity to justify their membership in an organization that admits its association with the ancient mystery religions.

J. S. M. Ward explains in his book Who Was Hiram Abiff? how Freemasonry evolved from the 'great mystery rites' and also connects these rites with the fertility cults and also the blasphemous death and resurrection ceremonies of the 'corn maiden', etc..

> Out of these crude beginnings evolved the great mystery rites, and Freemasonry itself, wherein men were taught the doctrine of the resurrection of the soul and of life beyond the grave.....All these primitive rites are associated with the fertility cult, and in the case of the women their rites developed into a representation of the death and resurrection of the "corn maiden," called by the Greeks "Persephone," just as among the men it was the male spirit of vegetation, Tammuz, who predominated...from such societies as these that some of the ancient mysteries and the modern Rosicrucians evolved.[49]

■ 3. THE CONNECTION OF FREEMASONRY AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

Having established the first two points in this chapter we will now look into the possibility of a connection between Freemasonry and human sacrifice. We will begin by asking the question, "Do the Freemasons know that there is a connection between the Mystery religions and human sacrifice?"

The answer to that question is, "Some Masons absolutely do know about the Mystery religions and human sacrifice." To prove this point we will quote from a book written by Freemason J. S. M. Ward, Who Was Hiram Abiff?. This book is sold in the Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Company Catalogue. In the following quote, Ward describes a ritual of human sacrifice and cannibalism and then proceeds to describe those involved as people who were on the path of true knowledge and receiving light from the Supreme Master.

> In view of these rites my readers should bear in mind the fact that in the 16th century the Mexicans still sacrificed men as representatives of the gods. Among them was one who represented Qretzlcoatl, the god who wore ears of corn in his hair, and must closely corresponds with the Preserver in other lands. Many curious legends are told concerning this god, who, according to one account, was slain by three of the other gods.....
> It is, therefore, a significant fact that every year a man was chosen forty days before the date of the festival to represent this god and was clothed in his regalia, which included a sceptre shaped like a sickle. He was first bathed in a lake and then robed in the royal and divine robes. At the end of his forty days he was slain by having his heart torn from his body, which latter the worshipers subsequently ate.[50]
> Thus, after having performed a series of most ghastly human sacrifices, terminating with a cannibalistic feast, the priests of Ancient Mexico would solemnly preach a sermon inculcating a most exalted moral code. They laid it down that their flock must be kind and charitable, must lead a humble, > quiet life, most [must] abhor evil and cling to the good, finally warning them of the doom of the wicked hereafter, while painting in glowing terms the joys of Paradise.

> Where did the Mexican priest learn such moral lessons? Not from the ghastly ceremony in which he had just taken part. Does it not show that the Supreme Master of All does send down messages of light to even his most backward children, and thereby leads them on from stage to stage of True Knowledge?[51]

For the author above to imply that God? (the Supreme Master of All) sends 'messages of light' after such 'gastly human sacrifices' is ridiculous. We feel that it is not the true light of God which would bring them to their knees in repentance and fear. Satan is the master of deception and confusion and these ceremonies described above help to prove that fact.

In the next quote Ward describes the disgusting human sacrifice and torture that took place in the cult of Adonis. Later in the same chapter Ward proudly agrees that Freemasonry is a descendant of the Adonis Cult.

> The custom of sacrificing animals by hanging and then stabbing them was widespread in Asia Minor, and at Heriapolis itself the victims were hung on a tree before they were burnt. We thus see that there is abundant evidence to show that in many areas the human representatives of Adonis perished by being fastened to a tree and stabbed, and a tree in fact is constantly associated with the sacrifice, no matter whether the victim is stabbed or, as at Heirapolis, burnt.
> Let us now turn to the method of cutting off the male member and then letting the victim bleed to death. The slow cruelty of this method seems quite early to have led to its mitigation, and the Rite developed in two directions. Either the victim lost his virile organ but the bleeding was stopped, or else a more expeditious method of causing his death was adopted, usually that of stabbing.[52]

> It is, however, well to remember that the cult of the vegetation god was, and is, far more widely spread than was the cult of the individual god Adonis, although this fact does not affect the other arguments I shall set forth to show that Freemasonry is a descendant of the Adonis cult.[53]

We must remind you that Ward's book quoted above is distributed by the Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Company. Freemason Ward had full knowledge of the torture, sex perversion, and human sacrifice rituals and clearly admits that Masonry is a descendant of the Adonis cult.

The Masonic symbol of the double-headed eagle stems from the pagan rites of human sacrifice.

> In this sculpture the youthful priest, or god, holds a double-headed axe in his left hand, which reminds us of the symbol of Sandan and of the Masonic gavel. In his right he holds a rod, which ends in an "Armless doll, with the symbol of the cross-barred oval instead of a head." which, of course, indicates his close connection with the two fertility deities. He is undoubtedly the son and lover of Astarte, while the bearded deity represents Moloch, or the god in his aspect of the former lover.
> Behind the young man are two goddesses, both standing on the same double-headed eagle, an emblem which at once calls to mind the double-headed eagle of the 30th degree, or Knights Kadosh. As the kadosh, or sacred men and women, were peculiarly associated with the worship of Astarte and Adonis, we cannot lightly brush aside this interesting detail.[54]

The association of the goat with Freemasonry does not come form the wild conjecture of anti-Masons, but from solid tradition. Speaking about a sculpture in Asia Minor Ward says:

> Beneath the outstretch arms of the god and goddess appear the forequarters of two goats, a fact which suggests that the popular association of the goat with modern Freemasonry may have some solid tradition behind it.[55]

According to Ward, the symbolism of the bee in Freemasonry is used because of the fact that the male bee is a sacrifice victim.

> In conclusion it must be remembered that at Antioch and Ephesus Cybele blended with Astarte and there we find Eunuch priests, some of whom are known as King-bees, which suggests that the survival of the Bee in Freemasonry may be due to the fact that it reminded men of the sacrifice the male insect makes in order that the Queen may be fertilised, the present theory that it is an emblem of industry being merely a later explanation put forward at a time when the original meaning had become lost.[56]

The author of a majority of these informative quotes, J.S.M. Ward had full knowledge of the pagan rites of human sacrifice and torture that took place in the rites of Astarte, Tammuz and Adonis. With this full knowledge he states that it is possible that a reformed version of the cult is still taking refuge in Freemasonry. To appreciate these quotes more fully, we will share with you the author's conclusion.

> We have abundant evidence also that human victims were regularly, at one time, sacrificed to Astarte.[57]

> The man who was sacrificed doubtless represented Tammuz, disguised as Diomede at a later date, to whom ultimately the sacrifice was transferred. The manner of the man's death was as follows: –He was led or dragged by youths (perhaps with a halter round his neck) around the altar three times. He was then stabbed in the throat with a spear, and his body was afterwards burnt on a pyre. The stabbing in the neck corresponds to the custom of cutting the throat of a ram for sacrifice, and perhaps the victim's three symbolic journeys were for the purpose of proving to the worshippers that he was a victim properly prepared.[58]
>
> The mourning for Tammuz occurred in the Spring, and the priests, worked up to a state of frenzy by the wild music of flutes and drums, slashed themselves so that the blood ran down, in order that it might fertilize the soil. At such times those desirous of entering the priesthood tore off all their clothing and, seizing one of the swords which stood ready, castrated themselves. Then holding the bleeding fragments in their hands, they ran through the streets and flung them into the houses, whose owners had thereupon to supply each of them with a complete outfit of female clothing, which henceforward they always had to wear.[59]
>
> Although the Greeks modified the rites of Adonis, we must not forget that their own legends indicate quite clearly that at one time human sacrifices were offered even in Greece, and the modification of the Adonis cult must therefore be fairly late.[60]
> Thus we find that the cult of Adonis not only dealt with death and resurrection, but its hero was murdered and the annual celebration started when a certain bright star appeared in the East at dawn.
> Further, we have seen that certain fragments of this cult still survive as popular customs in Europe to this day. This being so there is nothing impossible in a reformed version of it taking refuge in Freemasonry.[61]

The author spoke of the Astarte and Adonis cults that are described and studied in Chapter four of his book and he is boldly stating the connection of this cult with Freemasonry, and also the possibility of its existence in Freemasonry today in some modified form. Please read and contemplate the following quotes:

> One of these Kings of Tyre called himself Abi-Melech, which means "Father of the King" or "Father of Moloch," and is a title which implies that its bearer was the father of a God...From this we see that the title of Hiram Abiff, i.e., "Father of the Exaltation of Life," etc., becomes perfectly intelligible.[62]

In the passage above the connection is made between the King of Tyre, Moloch, and the Masonic hero

Hiram Abiff. In the Holy Bible, this chapter of God's word begins by rebuking the pride of the Prince of Tyrus.

> (Ezekiel 28:2 KJV) Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a God, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas; yet thou art a man, and not God, though thou set thine heart as the heart of God:

The next Bible passage tells the prophecy that begins to focus on the King of Tyre, who is the real power behind the Prince of Tyre, Satan himself.

> (Ezekiel 28:12-15 KJV) Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty. {13} Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God; every precious stone was thy covering, the sardius, topaz, and the diamond, the beryl, the onyx, and the jasper, the sapphire, the emeraid, and the carbuncle, and gold: the workmanship of thy tabrets and of thy pipes was prepared in thee in the day that thou wast created. {14} Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth; and I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. {15} Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee.

Moloch is well known in Scripture as the pagan god who was worshiped with the sacrifice of human children.

> (Leviticus 20:1-5 KJV) And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, {2} Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones. {3} And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Molech, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. {4} And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Molech, and kill him not: {5} Then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Molech, from among their people.

There is no doubt that human sacrifice, torture, and sex perversion was very much a part of the Mystery Religions. The following quotes out of one chapter in Ward's book certainly are not short on information on human sacrifice. There is no doubt that he connects these rites to Hiram Abiff and Freemasonry.

> From the above we see that the Kings of Tyre were Priest-Kings and that King Hiram himself had a father who used the title of "Father of the god, Baal" and that this man appears to correspond with Hiram Abiff.[53]

Speaking of the different methods of the death of victims, Ward's book goes on to say:

> The most unusual method, however seems to have included burning, though often we find that the victim was killed before being placed on the funeral pyre. It is this form of death which seems peculiarly associated with Melcarth or Moloch.....[54]
> Melcarth was the Baal, or Lord of Fertility, who annually mated with the Great Mother, and in the consequence died, but was reincarnated in his son. As the living Divine King of the City he was worshipped under the title of Melcarth, but when he assumed his aspect of the Dying God he was bewailed as Tammuz or Adonis. In short, he was at once the husband and the son of Astarte.....
> It seems, moreover that the annual marriage of these kings consisted of a more or less temporary union with the sacred women, or sacred prostitutes as they are often called, who were always attached to the temples of Astarte. In Palestine, these women were called Kedehsoth (Kadosh), a word which, strictly speaking, means "Sacred Women." In such circumstances the supply of Divine men, the offspring of such unions [were called] Sacred Men," the offspring of the sacred women....it was one of these sacred men who was annually slain.....
> This story is almost identical with that told of Marsyas, who also was a Lover of Astarte and was slain and flayed by Apollo, who then hung his skin on a tree. Similar gruesome rites occur in other parts of the world, notably in Mexico, and we cannot avoid the conclusion that the legend describes a former practice of the slaying the human representative of the Divine Lover, and hanging him, or his skin, on a tree as part of the Fertility Rites.[55]
> Among the Mexicans the victim, whose heart had been torn out, was subsequently eaten by the human worshippers.[56]

Once again we have seen an undeniable connection with some of the practices that victim-survivors of Satanism relate such as bloody sacrifice, eating hearts, and hanging skins on trees, etc., and the Mystery Religions, and now the connection with all of these things and Freemasonry.

The symbolism of the twenty-four inch gauge in Freemasonry also stems from the Pagan rites of human sacrifice.

> In the Operative ritual the twenty-four inch gauge is replaced by a piece of wood which is called the "Straight-Edge," and with it the height of the candidate is measured. The straight-edge, like the twenty-four inch gauge, is retained by the Lodge, and according to this old belief the measure of the man remains attached to it and so his life principle is thus held hostage for his fidelity. Should he betray his trust, all that the indignant brethren need do is to bury that measuring stick under the next building they erect, and he will die.
> This, and not the fanciful explanation now given in the Speculative ritual, is undoubtedly the true origin of the twenty-four inch gauge. That the custom of sacrificing a man did not die out till quite late, is indicated by a local story of Castle Rising, Norfolk. According to this the Norman Baron who ordered it to be built murdered the architect and had him buried beneath the foundations. Local gossips say that not many years ago the skeleton of a man was found there.
>
> In like manner it was customary to sacrifice human victims at the Consecration or Completion of a building.....Even to-day there is a superstition that if a man is killed while a building is being erected that building will be lucky.[67]

The facts that we have learned about Freemasonry and human sacrifice in this chapter make the following newspaper article about a skeleton very interesting.

Skeleton may be from '50s

> Associated Press
>
> MIDDLETOWN, Ind. — The skeletal remains of an infant found in a closet of an old downtown building this week may be 40 years old, an investigator said.
>
> The remains were found by a 9-year-old boy who was helping his father run a television wire in their apartment.
> "We're guessing the baby might have been there since 1951 because a Superman comic was found in the storage space," said Police Chief James Tharp. "We also found a white corset, a cup and plate and open food containers"

Tharp said yesterday the Anderson Police Department crime laboratory was examining the remains to determine the age and sex of the infant.

The building, constructed in the late 1800's, houses an auto parts store on the first floor and an apartment on the second, where the closet is located. The top floor housed the Masonic Lodge during the period that the body was believed to have been left in the closet, but it is vacant now.

"The items found might not be related to the skeleton," Tharp said. "But if this took place in the 1950's, it might have been an unwed mother who tried to hide the fact she was pregnant by wearing the corset, and then hid in the storage area. We don't know at this point."[58]

IS IT POSSIBLE THAT WITHIN FREEMASONRY THE THINKING EXISTS THAT WOULD ALLOW FOR THE PRACTICE OF HUMAN SACRIFICE TO EXIST?

In the following quote from a book called, Ancient Operative Masonry, author S.R. Parchment talks about the mysterious Brothers of the shadow who practice human sacrifice. He then goes on to explain why a Brother of the Great White Lodge does not try to stop them. Parchment explains giving the typical New Age reasoning that it would limit their freedom of choice which will enable them to evolve into Godhood.

The Brothers of the Shadow who are in the flesh are usually very fearful of death and are, therefore, ever in quest of methods for prolonging their physical existence. The biblical statement that man may "Eat of the Tree of Life and live forever," is not to them a mere statement, and for the purpose of prolonging their lives, they have ferreted out and perpetuated among their clan many nefarious schemes too heinous to mention. When these methods fail, as a last resort they sacrifice human beings and feast upon the flesh and blood of their victims.

The question has often been asked, why do the Brothers of the Great White Lodge, who are said to be emissaries of God, permit such diabolical practices to be perpetuated throughout the ages? This question shows clearly that the mission of the Brothers of Light is not understood. My dear Reader! Since these great souls are working in absolute harmony with cosmic law, they can at best only foster that which is good in whomsoever it is found. A moment's thought on this subject should be sufficient to convince one that if the Great Ones were to influence man to do the things which they think best for his future welfare, they would be depriving him of the many valuable experiences so essential for the building of soul qualities. It is obvious that continued guidance from without would inevitably reduce man to an automaton; while with freedom to choose, he evolves into a dynamic God.[59]

CHAPTER 4 - A 33° MASON WHO DEFINITELY DID KNOW ABOUT HUMAN SACRIFICE: ALEISTER CROWLEY

33° Aleister Crowley would definitely get some votes in the "most wicked man who ever lived contest" and is the clear cut favorite for the title of "The Father of Modern Satanism". Crowley's wicked life and his intimate association with Freemasonry are both well known.

> Crowley himself was terribly decadent. A happily heroin-addicted, bisexual Satan worshiper, he asked people to call him "The Beast 666." Crowley believed that he was literally the antimessiah of the apocalypse.[70]

> During the first World War, Crowley transferred his activities to America. The press proclaimed him "the wickedest man in the world." He also spent time in Italy, but was expelled because Italian authorities accused his disciples of sacrificing human infants in occult rituals. According to one source, Crowley resided in the Abbey of Thelema near Cefalu Sicily, and revived ancient Dionysian ceremonies. During a 1921 ritual, he induced a he-goat to copulate with his mistress, then slit the animal's throat at the moment of orgasm.[71]

WAS ALEISTER CROWLEY JUST A 'CLOSET' FREEMASON?

Aleister Crowley was very proud of all his accomplishments and connections. He bragged about all of the Masonic medals and insignia that he was entitled to wear.

> This view was confirmed when The Arcane Schools of John Yarker came to me for review. I wrote to the author, who recognized my title to the 33° and conferred on me the grades of 95° Memphis and 90° Mizraim. It seemed as if I had somehow turned a tap. From this time on I lived in a perfect shower of diplomas, from Bucharest to Salt Lake City. I possess more exalted titles than I have ever been able to count. I am supposed to know more secret signs, tokens, passwords, grand words, grips, and so on, than I could actually learn in a dozen lives. An elephant would break down under the insignia I am entitled to wear.[72]

In the picture below, we see 33° Aleister Crowley in all of his Masonic regalia:

CROWLEY'S DOCTRINE

We find in the next quotes, the 'doctrine' of 33° Aleister Crowley.

From MAGICK in Theory and Practice, by The Master Therion (Aleister Crowley):

> But the bloody sacrifice, though more dangerous, is more efficacious; and for nearly all purposes human sacrifice is the best.[74]

> The animal should therefore be killed within the Circle, or the Triangle, as the case may be, so that its energy cannot escape. An animal should be selected whose nature accords with that of the ceremony–thus, by sacrifcing a female lamb one would not obtain any appreciate quantity of the fierce energy useful to a Magician who was invoking Mars. In such acase a ram would be more suitable. And this ram should be virgin–the whole potential of its original total energy should not have been diminished in any way. For the highest spiritual working one must accordingly choose that victim which contains the greatest and purest force. A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim.[75]

From The Book of the Law, by Aleister Crowley:

> With my Hawk's head I peck at the eyes of Jesus as he hangs upon the cross.....
> There is no law beyond Do what thou wilt.[76]

From SATANIC EXTRACTS, by Aleister Crowley:

> 3
> The Oath of Fealty
> I bind my blood in Satan's hands,
> All this that lieth betwixt my hands
> To thee, the Beast, and thy control,
> I pledge me; body, mind, and soul.
> 4
> Pledge
> I swear to work my Work abhorred,
> Careless of all but one reward,
> The pleasure of the Devil our Lord.[77]

ALEISTER CROWLEY WAS AN INTERNATIONAL MASON

Crowley was truly an international Mason. He received his 33° in Mexico City and spoke of participating in Masonic rituals in the United States and also was involved in other rites of Freemasonry. Not only was Crowley a 33° Grand Inspector General of Scottish Rite Freemasonry, but he was also involved in other rites of Freemasonry that went even deeper into the occult. The Rite of Memphis contained Masonic rituals with a definite Egyptian flavor.

> By the end of 1910, thanks to my relations with the Grand Hierophant 97° of the Rite of Memphis (a post held after his death by Dr. Gerard Encausse ['Papus'], Theodor Reuss ['Merlin'], and myself), I was now a sort of universal inspector-general of the various rites, charged with the secret mission of reporting on the possibility of reconstructing the entire edifice, which was universally recognized by all its more intelligent members as threatened with the gravest danger.[78]

Even for a man like Crowley who was obsessed with the occult, the rituals of Freemasonry provided a profound occult thrill.

> I supposed myself to have reached the summit of success when I restored the Secret Word of the Royal Arch. In this case, tradition had preserved the Word almost intact.[79]

Was Aleister Crowley and his followers or perhaps a similar group capable of performing acts and rituals that are comparable to what are described by satanic ritual abuse survivors. The following quotes are from a book entitled, Secrets of the German Sex Magicians. This book talks about the ritual use of pain and attributes to Crowley the most perverted of practices such as bestiality and the ritual consumption of body fluids.

> The ritual use of pain and agony as an access mode to trance and magical power does have its limits, though. For one thing, physical pain tends to dull the senses in the long run, so that stimuli have to be increased incessantly. This may quite easily lead to grave bodily harm, not to mention the fact that it can become downright addictive and lead to a kindled frenzy not very easily mastered.[80]

> Crowley, in fact, trod in his practice a path similar to that of the more materialistic authorities. Although he positively encouraged ejaculatory orgasm in his sex magic, he always made a point of consuming what he called the "elixir" afterwards. He understood this elixir to be the mixture of the sexual fluids of both partners or, in the masturbatory act, as just the semen. He entered very carefully in his the magical diaries a description of the elixir's consistency and taste, and he even recorded the prophecies which he deduced from these data.[81]

And Crowley's practices go on to be even more disgusting.

> Coprophagia, which means consumption of excrement, here also includes consumption of other secretions such as urine and sweat. It was ritually practiced from early times on the sympathetic-magic principle that the secretions of any entity contain part of its magis. Crowley, for example, occasionally offered his disciples in Cefalu the excretement of a goat. This frequently met with no small disapproval![82]

> Crowley performed a similar ritual in his Sicilian Abbey of Thelema, during which his Scarlet Woman was to be mounted by a goat which would be beheaded during the climax.[83]

There exists today a secret society that dedicates itself to carrying on the teachings of Aleister Crowley. This group is called the O.T.O.. The O.T.O. was founded earlier this century by high grade Austrian Freemason Karl Kellner and German Freemason Theodor Reuss. The O.T.O. became a major force in the occult world when Aleister Crowley became its leader.

WHAT IS THE O.T.O. ?

From The Equinox, the official organ of the O.T.O.:

> The ORDO TEMPLI ORIENTIS (O.T.O.) is an Initiatic Body composed of men and women who have accepted the principles of The Book of the Law, which was transmitted through Aleister Crowley (1875-1947) in Cairo, Egypt in 1904 E.V. The communicating Intelligence identified Itself as Aiwass, a messenger of the ruling hierarchy of our species. The Book announces a New Law for mankind and the planetary transition into the Aeon of Horus or New Aeon. The Book is conceived to be a perfect transmission of the divine, freed from any defects of human interference. As such, it is a luminous vehicle of Truth that can serve as an infallible guide to human conduct.
> Aleister Crowley will at least be remembered as the greatest occult genius of the twentieth century. In The Book of the Law, he is designated as the Prophet of the New Aeon.[84]

> The O.T.O. IS A SECRET ORDER, pledged to the high purpose of securing the Liberty of the Individual and his advancement in Light, Wisdom, Understanding, Knowledge and Power through Beauty, Courage and Wit on the Foundation of Universal Brotherhood.[85]

As previously revealed, Aleister Crowley held many honors as a member of the Masons. It is interesting to discover that a Masonic author also calls Masonry a 'universal brotherhood'.

From Ancient Mystic Oriental Masonry, by Dr. R. Swinburne Clymer:

> Mystic Masonry is not only the key to the religion taught to all men in all ages from the very beginning of conscious life up to the present, but it holds the keys to these religious and is, in fact, the very repository of religion itself.....It has for its object the uniting of mankind into a Universal Brotherhood.[86]

The O.T.O. taught sexual Magic that they felt was the Key that unlocked all occult mysteries. We read this information from book The Secret Rituals of the O.T.O.:

> 'Our Order possesses the KEY which opens up all Masonic and Hermetic secrets, namely, the teaching of sexual magic, and this teaching explains, without exception, all the secrets of Freemasonry and all systems of religion.'[87]

The book, Secrets of the German Sex Magicians, gives this account of O.T.O. sex teachings:

> Today's literature about sex magic relies heavily on practices which were already common in the O.T.O. or in its later development by Aleister Crowley. This literature differentiates the workings of the VIIIth, IXth and XIth grade, which was introduced by Crowley. (The X° of the O.T.O. is a mere "administrative grade" of no special magical importance.) The division is as follows:
>
> VIII° O.T.O. = autoerotic practice
> IX° O.T.O. = heteroerotic practice
> XI° O.T.O. = homoerotic practice
>
> This is the traditional sex-magic practice as performed under Crowley.[88]

IS THERE A CONNECTION BETWEEN THE O.T.O. AND FREEMASONRY ?

We have connected Aleister Crowley to both organizations, but how did he become a member of the O.T.O.? He tells us himself. He was recruited by a fellow Freemason - Theodor Reuss.

> Although I was admitted to the thirty-third and last degree of Freemasonry so long ago as 1900, it was not until the summer of 1912 that my suspicion was confirmed. I speak of my belief that behind the frivolities and convivialities of our greatest institution [Freemasonry] lay in truth a secret ineffable and miraculous, potent to control the forces of Nature, and not only to make men brethren, but to make them divine. But at the time I speak of a man came to me, [Theodor Reuss] a man of those mysterious masters of esoteric Freemasonry who are alike its Eyes and its Brains, and who exist in its midst–unknown, often, even to its acknowledged chiefs.....This man had been watching my occult career for some years, and deemed me now worthy to partake in the Greater Mysteries.[89]

The Secret Rituals of the O.T.O. tells of more connections:

> For the O.T.O. not only had, as we shall see, connections with spurious and clandestine masonic groups but functioned as a recruiting office for one of these–for in the 'Classification of Members by Degrees' appended to Reuss's document it is clearly stated that 'candidates are made Freemasons by the Directing Members (Fratres Superiores) of the O.T.O.'.[90]

Once again from The Equinox, the official organ of the O.T.O., Crowley states:

> I claim for my system that it satisfies all possible requirements of true freemasonry. It offers a rational basis for universal brotherhood and for universal religion.[91]

From The Equinox:

> ...The Book of the Law and the Word of the Aeon are essential principles of membership. In all other respects, it [the O.T.O.] stands by itself as a body similar to Freemasonry, but involving acceptance of a social and economic system which is intended to put the world on its feet. There is also, of course, the secret of the IX° which is to say, the weapon which they may use to further these purposes.[92]

O.T.O. PROFESS-HOUSES

Having already read these following quotes by Aleister Crowley:

> "...for nearly all purposes human sacrifice is the best." etc. and "A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim."; (see page 37).

we find it most interesting to hear of the O.T.O.'s deep compassion for children and pregnant women. The following documentation is from O.T.O. Ordo Templi Orientis An Open Letter to Those Who May Wish To Join The Order, Enumerating the Duties and Privileges. The quotes below are taken from The Equinox, The Review of Scientific Illuminism, The Official Organ of the O.T.O.

The titles above each set of quotes such as FIFTH HOUSE, means that particular section of the O.T.O. laws is called FIFTH HOUSE, etc. Contained in the quotes titled FIFTH HOUSE, etc. is information about actual Profess-Houses that were places where women and children of Brethren, those born without or within the Order of O.T.O., were taken, housed, and some children were adopted by some of the members of the O.T.O.

FIFTH HOUSE

13. Every Brother shall seek constantly to give pleasure to all Brethren with whom he is acquainted, whether by entertainment or conversation, or in any other manner that may suggest itself. It will frequently and naturally arise that love itself so springs up between members of the Order, for that they have so many and sacred interests in common. Such love is peculiarly holy, and is to be encouraged.

14. All children of Brethren are to be considered as children of the whole Order, and to be protected and aided in every way by its members severally, as by its organization collectively. No distinction is to be made with regard to the conditions surrounding the birth of any child.

15. There is an especially sacred duty, which every Brother should fulfil, with regard to all children, those born without the Order included. This duty is to instruct them in the Law of Thelema, to teach them independence and freedom of thought and character, and to warn them that servility and cowardice are the most deadly diseases of the human soul.[93]

TENTH HOUSE

37. All pregnant women are especially sacred to members of the Order, and no effort should be spared to bring them to acceptance of the Law of Freedom, so that the unborn may benefit by that impression. They should be induced to become members of the Order, so that the child may be born under its aegis.

38. If the mother that is to be have asserted her will to be so in contempt and defiance of the Tabus of the slave-gods, she is to be regarded as especially suitable to our Order, and the Master of the Lodge in her district shall offer to become, as it were, godfather to the child, who shall be trained specially, if the mother so wishes, as a servant of the Order, in one of its Profess-Houses.

39. Special Profess-Houses for the care of women of the Order, or those whose husbands or lovers are members of the Order, will be instituted, so that the frontal duty of womankind may be carried out in all comfort and honour.

FIFTH HOUSE

53. All Brethren may expect the warmest co-operation in their pleasures and amusements from other members of the Order. The perfect freedom and security afforded by the Law allows the characters of all Brethren to expand to the very limits of their nature, and the great joy and gladness with which they are constantly overflowing make them the best of companions. "They shall rejoice, our chosen; who sorroweth is not of us. Beauty and strength, leaping laughter and delicious languor, force and fire, are of us."

54. Children of all Brethren are entitled to the care of the Order, and arrangements will be made to educate them in certain of the Profess-Houses of the Order.

55. Children of Brethren who are left orphans will be officially adopted by the Master of his Lodge, or if the latter decline, by the Supreme Holy King himself, and treated in all ways as if they were his own.

56. Brethren who have a right to some especial interest in any child whose mother is not a member of the Order may recommend it especially to the care of their lodges or of Grand Lodge.[94]

TENTH HOUSE

67. Women of the Order who are about to become mothers receive all care, attention, and honour from all Brethren.

68. Special Profess-Houses will be established for their convenience, should they wish to take advantage of them.

TWELFTH HOUSE

72. The secrecy of the Order provides its members with an inviolable shroud of concealment.[95]

O.T.O. members have the right to visit secret-houses.

> d. They obtain the right to sojourn in the secret houses of the O.T.O. permanetly or for a greater or lesser period of the year according to their rank in the Order; or, in the case of those of the Fifth and lower degrees, are candidates for invitation to these houses.[96]

These Profess-Houses are designed to cater to the different tastes of the members.

> Naturally, as it takes all sorts to make a world--and we rejoice in that diversity which makes our unity so exquisite a miracle--some Profess-Houses will suit one person, some another. And birds of a feather will learn to flock together.[97]

The higher you rank in the O.T.O. the more access to the Profess-Houses you get.

> 51. In the higher degrees Brethren have the right to reside in our Profess-Houses for a portion of every year, as shown:
>
> VI°. Two weeks.
> G.T. One month.
> P.R.S. Six weeks.
> VII°. Two months.
> S.G.C. Three months.
> VIII°. Six months.
> 52. Members of the IX°, who share among themselves the whole property of the Order according to the rules of that degree, may, of course, reside there permenently. Indeed, the house of every Brother of this grade is, ipso facto, a Profess-House of the Order.[98]

After reading the quotes above about the Profess-Houses taken from The Equinox, the official organ of the O.T.O. - and then reading the following quotes by Aleister Crowley from The Book of the Law (also in The Equinox) - it gives us serious cause for concern, as the members of the O.T.O. have accepted the principles of The Book of the Law and the following quotes speak of the sacrifice of a child.

> 43. Let the Scarlet Woman beware! If pity and compassion and tenderness visit her heart; if she leave my work to toy with old sweetnesses; then shall my vengeance be known. I will slay me her child: I will alienate her heart: I will cast her out from men: as a shrinking and despised harlot shall she crawl through dusk wet streets, and die cold and an-hungered.[99]

> 11.....Worship me with fire & blood; worship me with swords & spears. Let the woman be girt with a sword before me: let blood flow to my name. Trample down the heathen; be upon them, o warrior, I will give you of their flesh to eat!

12. Sacrifice cattle, little and big: after a child.
24. The best blood is of the moon, monthly: then the fresh blood of a child, or dropping from the host of heaven: then of enemies; then of the priest or of the worshippers: last of some beast, no matter what.[100]

In this chapter we have proven some very important points.

1. Aleister Crowley was a high ranking and very active Freemason.

2. Aleister Crowley was an extrememly perverted Satanist who was capable of almost any act. Crowley's own son died in a ritual that was performed behind closed doors and attended by only Crowley and his son.[101]

3. Crowley carried the Masonic doctrine over into his secret societies.

4. There are individuals and secret sociteies today who are dedicated to continuing Crowley's work.

CHAPTER 5 - THE EGYPTIAN-MASONIC-SATANIC CONNECTION

The place where Satanism and Freemasonry cross paths on their trip to the dark side seems to be at Egypt. This was certainly true for the Father of modern Satanism 33° Mason Aleister Crowley. Crowley's honeymoon was the occasion for an occult Egyptian experience when Crowley and his bride spent the night in the Kings chamber of the Great Pyramid.

> They journeyed to Paris, Marseilles, Naples, and Cairo, where they spent a night in the King's Chamber of the Great Pyramid and Crowley showed off his magic by illuminating the chamber with astral light.[102]

The night that Crowley spent in the Great Pyramid with his bride, produced a profound spiritual experience.

> Once ensconced there with his bride, he lit a candle and began to read an incantation. All at once, Crowley later reported, a pale lilac light bathed the room, allowing him to continue without his candles.[103]

In 1904 another event took place that had a definite Egyptian flavor. Crowley regarded it as the most important event of his life. It took place in Cairo Egypt where Crowley invoked the Egyptian god Horus. This occult practice led to the demonic revelation that inspired Crowley to write his most important book, The Book Of The Law.

> They returned to Cairo where he adopted the guise of Prince Chioa Khan of Persia and it was there in the early spring of 1904 that the event took place which Crowley would regard as the most important of his entire life.
> Rose, who had little interest in magic, asked Crowley to perform a minor ritual purely out of curiosity. Soon afterwards, she was possessed by a strange inspiration and declared to her husband that 'they are waiting for you', eventually informing him that 'they' meant in particular the god Horus. A skeptical Crowley carried out a series of tests based on the traditional correspondences of the god and although Rose had no knowledge at all of occultism, she guessed correctly every time against total odds of 21,168,000 to 1. Some bewildering coincidences followed, all of which identified Crowley with The Beast 666 of Revelations. The upshot of all this was that Crowley performed an invocation to Horus and obeyed his wife's instructions to sit at a desk in his hotel room on 8,9, and 10 April between 12 noon and 1 p.m. A being which announced itself as Aiwass appeared behind him on each occasion and dictated to him the three chapters of a book called Liber Al vel Legis or The Book of the Law.[104]

Crowley's book of the Law stated that all of History was divided into three eons, all three of these eons were named after an Egyptian god!!

> Crowley's philosophy was expounded in The Book of the Law, which taught that history can be divided into two eras. The first was the eon of Isis, the Egyptian nature goddess, wife and sister of Osiris. During this time period, prior to 500 B.C., matriarchy and Egyptian mythology dominated humanity. The second epoch was Osiris, based on the Egyptian god of the underworld. During this time, coinciding with the period of Judaism, Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity, man dominated. In 1904, however, humanity supposedly entered the eon of Horus, the Egyptian child-god of light, the son of Osiris and Isis. During this time, the true self of man would dominate, rather than any allegiance to external authorities, priests, or gods.
> Crowley's creed was simple: "Be strong, O man! Lust! Enjoy all the things of sense. Fear not that any god shall deny thee for this." He lived what he preached. Crowley was accused of being a homosexual, a child molester, and a deviant of every sexual variation known to man. He borrowed the idea of sexual magic from Hindu tantric yoga and taught that sexual union reached its highest realm when the mind, the breath, and the semen were held still.[105]

Crowley can definitely be cited as a prime example of a man who took the dark Egyptian path. Just how dangerous is the Egyptian-Satanic connection as practiced by Crowley and others? The words of professor Carl A. Rashke are certainly worth considering when answering this question; and his words will show that with people of this doctrine and practice, human sacrifice is certainly a possibility.

> Crowley also conducted regularly with his disciples the Thelemic version of the Black Mass, which he termed instead the "Gnostic Mass," which may have been a carefully embroidered version of the older Cathar rituals. The centerpiece of the mass was the ingesting of a biscuit, mimicking the consecrated wafer, which Crowley dubbed the "Cake of Light," baked with blood. It is interesting that Crowley's own Book of the Law prescribed the use of real human blood in this sacramental foodstuff, as the earlier legends about what was employed in the Black Mass implied. Crowley's own black bible described, "the best blood" as that of a menstruating woman, then "fresh blood of a child," and finally of "enemies." This unsettling passage, which has parallels in other writings of Crowley, without doubt confirms that the Crowley cultists, at minimum, granted themselves a license for human sacrifice.[106]

Crowley's rituals were certainly of the most debased and Satanic kind.

> Drugs, particularly heroine and cocaine, were a sacrament for Crowley.[107]

Crowley learned ritual magic from the man who was renown as the master of his day, MacGregor Mathers. The pupil-student relationship soon turned into a bitter rivalry and resulted literally in a Black Magic war. When Mathers died in 1918 many of his friends were convinced that Crowley was responsible for his death. Mathers, also a Freemason, introduced Crowley to an occult organization called the "Golden Dawn" and helped Crowley along his dark walk on the Egyptian Masonic road.

> Mathers and his wife Moina, the sister of the philosopher Henri Bergson, lived in Paris. (Mathers tried to convert Bergson to magic, but without success.) Their house was decorated as an Egyptian temple and they celebrated 'Egyptian Masses', invoking the goddess Isis. Mathers officiated in a long white robe, a metal belt engraved with the signs of the zodiac, bracelets round his wrists and ankles, and a leopard-skin slung across his shoulders. He was convinced that he was descended from the Scottish clan MacGregor and took to calling himself MacGregor Mathers, Chevalier MacGregor and Comte de Glenstrae. W. B. Yeats, whose magical name in the Golden Dawn was Daemon est Deus Inversus (The Devil is God Reversed), was a frequent visitor to the Mathers household in Paris.[108]

One of the most talked about Satanic groups in recent years has been The Temple of Set headed by Michael Aquino.

The brand of Satanism that is practiced by Michael Aquino and the Temple of Set is thoroughly Egyptian. In the book, The Book of Coming Forth by Night (1985) Aquino describes what seems to be a call to start the Church of Satan and speaks in the first person as Set, the Egyptian Satan.

> The Equinox has succumbed to my Solstice, and I, Set, am revealed in my Majesty....I am the ageless Intelligence of this Universe...and from my manifest semblance, which alone is not of Earth. Known as the Hebrew Satan, I chose to bring forth a Magus, according to the fashion of my Word. He was charged to form a Church of Satan, that I might easily touch the minds of men in this age they had cast for me.[109]

The accusation of child abuse and molestation against Aquino was made in 1988 by Sandi Gallant of the San Francisco Police Department, thus placing another link between Egyptian style Satanism and Satanic Ritual Abuse. The accusations surfaced concerning the day care center at the Presidio military installation and were as follows.

> Children said they were taken by day to private homes, including two on army property, where they had been sexually molested.....
> Other children talked about a "googoo" game in which they were urinated > and defecated on by a "Mr. Gary".... Pencils were used to doodle on the skin and genitals of the children and were also inserted in a child anus..... A gun was pointed at the head of another adult in front of the children..... There were five confirmed cases among the children of chlamydia, a sexually transmitted illness.[110]

Although no formal charges were filed against Aquino, there were certainly some interesting twists to the case. His repeated claims of innocence to many were hollow cries. There are some similarities in the accusations against the day care center when compared to the recent disclosures of children that we have been in contact with.

> It is not clear how long the army has known about Aquino's peculiar genus of satanism. But the San Francisco police have been exceptionally interested since about 1980. The interest crested in November 1987 when police raided a house where a three-year-old girl told police she had been molested by a sinister-looking man named "Mickey" who snapped pictures of her in the bathtub and sexually mistreated her in a room with black walls and a cross etched on the ceiling. The girl later spotted "Mickey" in the PX at the Presidio army base in San Francisco, where Aquino was stationed. The girl said she thought "Mickey" was Aquino. The girl also said she recognized Mrs. Aquino. Meanwhile, authorities had found evidence of ongoing child abuse at the Presidio day care center. A three-year-old had also been molested, and the cops turned up six cases of sexually transmitted infection in fifty-eight other charges at the center. A thirty-four-year-old civilian day-care worker at the Presidio facility, who was also a Southern Baptist minister was arrested. At first, the charges were dismissed. But subsequently, Hambright was indicted anew on twelve counts of sodomy, oral copulation, and lewd conduct. Hambright later died of AIDS.[111]

Albert Churchward in his book, The Arcana of Freemasonry, confirms that Set is the Egyptian name for Satan.

> That Sut or Set was first primary god of the Egyptians, but was god of the South Pole, or Southern Hemisphere, is amply proved and borne out by the monuments as well as the Ritual. Set or Sut, according to Plutarch, is the Egyptian name of Typhon–i.e. Satan of the Christian Cult.[112]

THE MASONIC LODGE AND THE EGYPTIAN MYSTERY RELIGION

As the Mystery Religions spread all over the world from Babylon, they found expression in all countries of the ancient world with only a change in the names of the gods and slight variations in the rituals. While the mystery religions were practiced in all of the countries of the ancient world, it was in Egypt where centuries of devotion developed them to their highest degree.

According to Mason Manly P. Hall's book Freemasonry of the Ancient Egyptians:

> It is now generally acknowledged that the Egyptians, of all the ancient peoples, were the most learned in the Occult sciences of Nature. The wisest of philosophers from other nations visited Egypt to be initiated in the sacred Mysteries by the priests of Thebes, Memphis, and Hermopolis.[113]

In this chapter we will be showing that the Egyptian Mystery Religion has a profound and undeniable connection with the Masonic Lodge.

There is indeed, as we have established, a very definite link between the Egyptian Mystery Religion and the Masonic Lodge. This link can be readily established from the words of Masonic authors and testimony can be provided to remove all reasonable doubt. In the book, The Meaning of Masonry, by Past Provincial Grand Registrar, W.L. Wilmshurst, we find the statement:

> I am acquainted, for instance, with an Egyptian ceremonial system, some 5,000 years old, which taught precisely the same things as Masonry does,...[114]

In the book, Freemasonry Its Hidden Meaning, by George H. Steinmetz, we find the statement:

> Regardless of the origin of the modern lodge, or of the name "Freemason," we can, after freeing the symbolism of modern adaptations, discern in Freemasonry the outline of the teachings of the ancient mysteries of Egypt.[115]

In the same book Mr. Steinmetz makes the statement connecting Freemasonry and the Egyptian mysteries.

> If the symbols can be consistently interpreted in this manner, throughout the three degrees we have confirmed Freemasonry to be the reincarnation of the Ancient Mysteries of Egypt".[116]

33" Mason Manly P. Hall relates the efforts of early Masonic historians to link Hiram Abiff to the Egyptian Mystery Religion.

> Early Masonic historians such as Albert Mackey, Robert Freke Gould and Albert Pike were of a single purpose in their efforts to establish a definite correspondence between the Hiramic legend of Freemasonry and the Osiris myth as expounded in the initiatory rituals of the Egyptians.[117]

From The Lost Keys of Freemasonry by 33° Manly P. Hall:

> Man is a god in the making, and as in the mystic myths of Egypt on the potter's wheel he is being molded.[118]

From Freemasonry of the Ancient Egyptians by 33° Mason Manly P. Hall:

> Freemasonry as an institution is Isis, the mother of Mysteries, from whose dark womb the Initiates are born in the mystery of the second or philosophic birth.[119]

Dr. Thomas Milton Stewart 33rd degree identifies the "Christos State" as the "Osirified State".

> The sanctified Spirit of man is now in the Cristos state; and this means the Risen Spirit in Man. In Egypt one would call this the Osirified State,...[120]

HIRAM - KUNDALINI YOGA - HINDU MYSTICISM

33° Mason, Manly P. Hall also shows the similarity between Hiram and the Kundalini of the Hindu's, and also the ancient occult rites of Egypt.

> Sufficient similarity exists between the Masonic CHiram and the Kundalini of Hindu mysticism to warrant the assumption that CHiram may be considered a symbol also of the Spirit Fire moving through the sixth ventricle of the spinal column. The exact science of human regeneration is the Lost key of Masonry, for when the Spirit Fire is lifted up through the thirty-three degrees, or segments of the spinal column, and enters into the domed chamber of the human skull, it finally passed into the pituitary body (Isis) where it invokes Ra (the pineal gland) and demands the Sacred Name. Operative Masonry, in the fullest meaning of that term, signifies the process by which the Eye of Horus is opened. E.A. Wallis Budge has noted that in some of the papyri illustrating the entrance of the souls of the dead into the judgment hall of Osiris the deceased person has a pine cone attached to the crown of his head. The Greek mystics also carried a symbolic staff, the upper end being in the form of a pine cone, which was called the thyrsus of Bacchus. In the human brain there is a tiny gland called the pineal body, which is the sacred eye of the ancients, and corresponds to the third eye of the Cyclops.[121]

These Egyptian mystery rites that Masonic authorities are so proud to align themselves with did more than just theorize about human sacrifice, they actually practiced it. Sir James Frazier informs us of those practices in his book, The Golden Bough.

> With regard to the ancient Egyptians we have it on the authority of Manetho that they used to burn red-haired men and scatter their ashes with winnowing fans and it is highly significant that this barbarous sacrifice was offered by kings at the grave of Osiris. We may conjecture that the victims represented Osiris himself, who was annually slain, dismembered, and buried in their persons that he might quicken the seed in the earth.[122]

> To return to the human victims whose ashes the Egyptians scattered with winnowing-fans, the red hair of these unfortunates was probably significant. For in Egypt the oxen which were sacrificed had also to be red; a single black or white hair found on the beast would have disqualified it for the sacrifice. If, as I conjecture, these human sacrifices were intended to promote the growth of the crops–and the winnowing of their ashes seems to support this view–red-haired victims were perhaps selected as best fitted to personate the spirit of the ruddy grain.[123]

In the following quote the man who is called "Masonry's greatest philosopher", 33° Mason Manly P. Hall Reveals the Egyptian and sexual symbolism that lies behind the Masonic rituals.

> In Egypt, the Mysteries, or institutions of philosophic rebirth, were called Isis and those born out of the temple were designated the Sons of Isis. Now, through the death of Osiris, her husband, this goddess had donned the badges of mourning and through the loss of the Word (symbolized by the phallus of Osiris), had become the great Widow. Hence, those born out of her, the philosophic elect, were termed the Widow's Sons, a designation which has clung to Freemasons, even in this age.[124]

In another book, Hall states:

> The golden phallus is rendered alive by the secret processes rescued from the lost Book of Thoth.[125]

Morals and Dogma states:

> The Egyptians consecrated the Phallus in the Mysteries of Osiris and Isis...[126]

The story of the Egyptian god Osiris lies behind the symbolism of the third degree of the Blue Lodge Freemasonry, The Master Mason degree. Freemason J. S. M. Ward retells the story of Osiris in his book, Freemasonry and the Ancient Gods. Ward's account of the story includes murder, mutilation and necrophilia (sex with corpses).

In the Egyptian mystery legend of Osiris we are told that, on discovering the dead body of the murdered Osiris, Isis threw herself upon the corpse and had intercourse with it, and from this came the birth of Horus, the avenger of Osiris. To prevent a repetition of this, Set tore the body of Osiris into many pieces and scattered them throughout Egypt.[127]

MASTER MASON DEGREE (the third degree of Freemasonry)

To explain what goes on in the Master Mason degree of Masonry we will quote from the book, Freemasonry: The Invisible Cult in Our Midst, by Jack Harris.

The initiate, after being met by three ruffians and literally shaken and pushed around, representing Hiram Abiff, is symbolically slain, mutilated and buried at the base of an acacia tree.

After diligent "searching," the body of the initiate (Hiram Abiff) is found by Fellowcrafters of the second degree.

Hiram Abiff supposedly was in possession of a secret password, known as the Grand Masonic word. Since his death, it could not be given unless Hiram Abiff, Hiram of Tyre and King Solomon were all present and agreed. So a substitute word was used by King Solomon, represented by the Worshipful Master of the lodge, who, in Masonic rite, raises the initiate's body from the "dead" and gives it "eternal life."

Hiram Abiff, which the initiate represents, allegedly came from Phoenicia, a pagan country which worshipped Baal, the sun god. King Solomon, represented by the Worshipful Master of the lodge, fell into idol worship. The ceremony uses Bible characters and verses for some of the story, but adds myth to suit the rite.

After a prayer and other rituals, the initiate is raised upon the five points of fellowship. When the Master raises the initiate, he whispers in his ear the Grand Masonic word ("Mah-Hah-Bone"). The Master than [then] says to the newly raised brother, "Brother _____, you have now been raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason, and the word which I have just communicated is the Grand Masonic word. You were raised by the strong grip of a Master Mason, or the lion's paw, and upon the five points of fellowship, which are..." (The Master then takes the brother's hand and shows him how to do this grip, and says to the brother,) "Follow me. Foot to foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and cheek to cheek or mouth to ear, give me the word." If the brother forgot the word, the Master in this position gives it to him again. The position of giving the Grand Masonic word (five points of fellowship) is the only way it can be given. The Master then steps back from the brother and explains the five points of fellowship.[128]

In this degree the candidate for Master Mason actually plays the part of Hiram Abiff and in so doing actually plays the role of the Egyptian god Osiris as was done in the Egyptian Mysteries thousands of years ago. There is abundant documentation from Masonic authors to prove this point.

The excellent book, The Deadly Deception, by Jim Shaw and Tom McKenney, cites Masonic authorities to show that the Masons consider Hiram Abiff and Osiris to be one and the same!

> (1) "The legend and traditions of Hiram Abiff form the consummation of the connecting link between Freemasonry and the Ancient Mysteries."(Pierson, "Traditions of Freemasonry," p. 159)
> (2) "We readily recognize in Hiram Abiff the Osiris of the Egyptians....."(Pierson page 240)
> (3) "Osiris and the Tyrian Architect (Hiram Abiff are one and the same" (Sickles, Daniel, "Freemason's Guide," page 236)
> (4) "That part of the rite (Master Mason initiation) which is connected with the legend of the Tyrian Artist (Hiram Abiff)...should be studied as a myth and not as a fact.....outside of Masonic tradition there is no proof that an event such as is related in connection with the "Temple Builder" ever transpired and, besides, the ceremony is older by more than a thousand years than the age of Solomon.....it is thoroughly Egyptian." (Sickles, Daniel, The Ahiman Reyan" page 195)
> (5) It (the legend of Hiram Abiff) is thoroughly Egyptian, and is closely allied to the supreme rite (highest degree) of the Isianic Mysteries (Mystery religion of Isis and Osiris)." (Mackey, Albert, "Lexicon of Freemasonry," page 195)[129]

One of the greatest Masonic authorities of all time, Former Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite, Albert Pike, describes the meaning of the Masonic symbol of the All-seeing Eye.

> The All-seeing Eye is a symbol of the Deity, as it anciently was, in Egypt, a hieroglyphic of OSIRIS and the SUN. Connecting the legend of HUROM with that of OSIRIS, by its hieroglyphical meaning,.....
> The Sun, Moon, Comet, and Seven Stars indicate the astronomical symbolism of the legend, and again connect it with that of Osiris.[130]

In this chapter we have thoroughly documented the connection between the Masonic Lodge and the Egyptian Mystery religion. In the next chapter we will be developing our theory that the ancient religion of Egypt has had a profound influence on orthodox Satanism. Much of our documentation in the next chapter will come from the Egyptian Book of the Dead which dates from about 1,500 B.C. which describes rites and rituals that are even more ancient. 33° Mason Manly P. Hall equates the Egyptian Book of the Dead with transcendental magic.

> "The Book of the Dead" is a singularly unfortunate modern selection of a title to cover the principle nucleus of Egyptian literary remains. The reason for the designation is obvious, but the impression created is strangely inadequate. The text is dominated by a spirit of transcendental magic.[131]

As we proceed in the next chapter to document the Egyptian Satanic Connection from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, you will be appalled and shocked as you read the gory and blatantly Satanic Statements. As you read the revealing information that is in our next chapter, we want you to remember this statement by 33° Mason Manly P. Hall pertaining to the relationship between Masonry and the Book of the Dead.

> If the identity of the Osiris and Hiramic myths be accepted, then the Book of the Dead is the open sesame of symbolic Masonry, revealing a hidden beauty beneath the rituals, an unsuspected splendor in the symbols, and a divine purpose actuating the whole of Masonic procedure.[132]

CHAPTER 6 - EGYPTIAN SATANISM

In this chapter we will be documenting and listing the practices of the Ancient Egyptian Religion. As you read these doctrines and practices of the Egyptians their Satanic nature will be readily apparent. These rites which are mostly taken from the Egyptian Book of the Dead will be compared with actual pictures that were drawn by children who are survivors of Ritual Satanic Child Abuse. The comparisons will be made in the next chapter. These passages should remove all doubt as to the evil nature of the Ancient Egyptian Religion and coupled with the other documentation brought forth in this book will establish the case for the Egyptian influence on modern Satanism. Remember as you read this chapter, the words of 33° Mason, Manly P. Hall, "the book of the Dead is the open sesame of symbolic Masonry".

WHAT IS THE BOOK OF THE DEAD ?

> The Book of the Dead is the title generally given to a collection of Egyptian inscriptions and papyri found in tombs or in mummy wrappings. The ancient Egyptians attributed The Book of the Dead to Thoth, Lord of Wisdom, and recorder of the deeds of men, which were produced when the soul came to judgment.[133]

> The deposit of the body in the tomb was accompanied by ceremonies of a symbolic nature,..... prayers, short litanies, etc., having reference to the future life, were recited or chanted by priests and relatives on behalf of the dead....recital would secure for the dead an unhindered passage to God in the next world, ...these..became a distinct ritual..which preceeded actual burial....[134]

The following passages from The Egyptian Book of The Dead are graphic and repulsive and are presented solely for the purpose of expose.

[1] DRINKING BLOOD - SLAUGHTER BLOCK

> (15) "Hail, devourer of Blood, who camest forth from the block of slaughter, I have not acted guilefully".[135]

[2] CANNABALISM - EATING INTESTINES

> Hail, Eater of intestines, coming forth from Mabet, not have I desolated ploughed lands.[136]

[3] TORTURE CHAMBER

> (21) "Hail, thou two-headed serpent, who comest forth from the torture-chamber, I have not defiled the wife of any man."[137]

[4] THE CRUSHER OF BONES

> (9) Hail, Crusher of Bones, who comest forth from Suten-henen, "I have told no lies.."[138]

[5] WASHING IN BLOOD

> Behold ye then god this great of slaughter, mighty of terror, he washeth in your blood, he batheth in your gore.[139]

[6] KILLING ANIMALS - LOCKS OF HAIR

> I have obtained the mastery over the animals with the knife in their heads and their locks of hair, who live among their emeralds, the aged and the shining beings who prepare the moment of Osiris Ani, triumphant in peace. He maketh slaughter upon the earth, and conversely, I am strong.[140]

[7] KING UNAS EATS HEARTS

> He has taken the hearts of the gods.
> He has eaten the Red,
> He has swallowed the Green
> Their charms are in his belly
> He has swallowed the knowledge of every god.
> The lifetime of King Unas is eternity;[141]

[8] KING UNAS IS A CANNIBAL FOND OF SCALPING PEOPLE AND BONDAGE

> 509. UNAS devoureth men and liveth "upon the gods, he is the lord of envoys, whom he sendeth "forth on his missons. 'He who cutteth off hairy scalps,' "who dwelleth in the fields, tieth the gods with ropes;.."[142]

[9] BONDAGE - MURDER - CANNABALISM - DISMEMBERMENT THE VICTIMS THROATS ARE CUT AND THE BODY PARTS ARE BOILED IN A CALDRON AT NIGHTTIME

> 510. Tcheser-tep keepeth guard over them for Unas and "driveth them unto him: and the Cord-master bound "them for slaughter. Khonsu the slayer of the wicked "cutteth their throats.[143]

511. and draweth out their intestines. "for it is he whom Unas sendeth to slaughter; and Shesmu "cutteth them in pieces and boileth their members in his "blazing caldrons of the night.."[144]

[10] THE THIGHS OF THE FIRST BORN ARE HEAPED UP

513. The old gods "and the old goddesses become fuel for his furnace. The "mighty ones in heaven light the fire under the caldrons" where are heaped up the thighs of the firstborn;[145]

[11] THE RITUAL FIRE IS STARTED WITH THE THIGHS OF A WOMAN

514. ..."UNAS lighteth the fire under the caldrons with the thighs "of their women;[146]

[12] HACKING IN PIECES THE FIRSTBORN

[508] Unas hath weighed his "words with the hidden god [?] who hath no name, on the day of hacking in pieces the firstborn.[147]

[13] UNAS EATS MAGICAL CHARMS

Behold, Unas eateth of that which the red crown "sendeth forth, he increaseth, and the magical charms of the gods are in his belly;[148]

The following quote is a comment on the texts about King Unas by the translator of the Egyptian Book of the Dead, E.A. Wallis Budge:

> The notion that, by eating the flesh, or particularly by drinking the blood, of another living being, a man absorbs his nature or life into his own, is one which appears among primitive peoples in many forms.[149]

It is indeed an accurate accessment that these murders in the Unas texts were performed in a ritual and religious manner for the purpose of obtaining the life-force or energy force of the victim. Not only was this the purpose of these ancient Egyptian texts, but it is also the purpose behind modern Satanism. This common underlying purpose can be seen by comparing these texts and their accessment with the words of Master Satanist Aleister Crowley. He writes:

> The blood is the life. This simple statement is explained by the Hindus by saying that the blood is the principle vehicle of vital Prana....It was the theory of the ancient Magicians, that any living being is a storehouse of energy varying in quantity according to the size and health of the animal, > saying that the blood is the principle vehicle of vital Prana....It was the theory of the ancient Magicians, that any living being is a storehouse of energy varying in quantity according to the size and health of the animal, and in quality according to its mental and moral character. At the death of the animal this energy is liberated suddenly. [For Magical purposes] The animal should therefore be killed within the Circle, or the Triangle, as the case may be, so that its energy cannot escape. An animal should be selected whose nature accords with that of the ceremony...For the highest spiritual working one must accordingly choose that victim which contains the greatest and purest force. A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim... Those magicians who object to the use of blood have endeavoured to replace it with incense... But the bloody sacrifice, though more dangerous is more efficacious; and for nearly all purposes human sacrifice is the best.[150]

[14] A GOD BORN FROM THE BUTTOCKS OF A COW

This is a bizarre passage from the Egyptian book of the Dead, translated by Normandi Ellis of the University of Colorado. We will quote excerpts from this strange passage and will compare it in the next chapter with an actual Satanic ritual.

> Every season of the flood I saw god born from the buttocks of a cow...."Come" said the lord of life to the lord of death one day. "Let us make a truce. I shall bring forth creatures and deliver them unto death, if you deliver the dead unto life..."On the day I saw Ra born from the buttocks of a cow I was overcome with weeping....These are the manifestations of Horus, a thousand souls in his train, an army marching against darkness. These are souls returning to earth, men and women beautified.....In the house of death there awaits a being of darkness whose eyebrows swim on his forehead like fishes....I shall not fall under flashing knives I shall not burn up in the cauldron.... I have seen the face of evil—a face full of burns and scars, tortures inflicted upon the self. He would scald his own chest and blame it on others. He would slash his own wrists and blame it on the gods... Now is the day of the joining of opposites, of the mingling of the dust of flesh with the dust of the coffin. This is the day of flow, the living ether returned to air, the maker of forms assuming new form. This is the day without end—the passage into light itself the joining of Osiris to Ra.[151]

That revolting passage was presented solely or the purpose of exposing and reproving the works of darkness, but it speaks of self-inflicted torture that is reminiscent of Satanic Ritual Abuse Victims who are programmed to inflict harm upon themselves.

This ritual which came from the Egyptians is being widely used by generational Satanists. We have recently had confirmation from a Satanic ritual abuse survivor on the West Coast that she endured an identical ritual. The cow was a symbol of great importance for the Egyptian sexual rites, to them the cow represented the passive sexual energy. The following information is from A History of Phallic Worship by Richard Payne Knight:

> Among the Egyptians, as before observed, the cow was the symbol of Venus, the godess of love, and passive generative power of nature. On the capitals of one of the temples of Philae we still find the heads of this goddess represented of a mixed form; the horns and ears of the cow being joined to the beautiful features of a woman in the prime of life; such as the Greeks attributed to that Venus, whom they worshipped as the mother of the prolific god of love, Cupid, who was the personification of animal desire or concupiscence, as the Orphic love, the father of gods and men, was of universal attraction. The Greeks, who represented the mother under the form of a beautiful woman, naturally represented the son under the form of a beautiful boy; but a people who represented the mother under the form of a cow, would as naturally represent the son under the form of a calf.[152]

[15] BOAT RITUAL

> These illustrations from Albert Champdor's "The Book of the Dead" show a mummy with phallus erect sliding into the Seventh Region of the Lower World, described as being "filled with serpents coils and four sons of Horus who protect the viscera of the Dead." [153] (See Illustration on the following page)

Satanic ritual abuse victims have frequently reported being put in a boat with snakes.

More from The Book of the Dead:

[16] THE EATING OF DEAD BODIES

> O Ra-Tmu, Lord of the Great House, prince, life, strength and health of all the gods, deliver thou [me] from the god whose face is like unto that of a dog, whose brows are as those of a man, and who feedeth upon the dead, who watcheth at the Bight of the Fiery Lake, and who devoureth the bodies of the dead and swalloweth hearts, and who shooteth forth filth, but he himself remaineth unseen.[155]

[18] THE HEART IN THE JAR

The heart is placed in a jar to be weighed for judgement.

> The double Maat goddesses are at times represented standing beside the balance to watch the result of the weighing, and at the same time Maat is also placed in the scale to be weighed against the heart of the deceased (Fig. 1 [on the following page])
> ..In the papyrus of Qenna the head of Aunbis is on the beam and the ape, wearing disk and crescent, is seated upon a pylon-shaped pedistal beside the balance. (Fig.2 [on the following page])
> Another vignitte shows horus holding Maat in his hand, weighing the heart in the presence of the Maat goddesses, and anubis, holding the deceased by the hand, presents the heart to Osiris while Isis and Nephthys in the form of apes sit near (Fig. 3 [on the following page])[157]

[19] SEXUAL PERVERSION

> It is Osiris. Others, however, say that his name is Ra, and that the god who dwelleth in Amentet is the phallus of Ra, wherewith he had union with himself.[159]

[20] EXCREMENT

> Who is this? "It is Osiris. Others however, say that it is the dead body of Osiris, and yet others say that it is the excrement of Osiris.[160]

[21] SELF-MUTILATION AND PERVERSION

> Who are these gods? They are the drops of blood which came forth from the phallus of Ra when he went to perform his own mutilation. These drops of blood sprang into being under the forms of the gods Hu and Sa, who are in the bodygard of Ra, and who accompany the god Tem daily and every day.[161]

[22] CHAMBER OF SNAKES

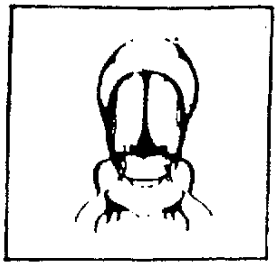
Manly P. Hall 33° Mason, describes a ritual in the second degree of the Egyptian Mysteries that we will show to be very similar to modern Satanic rituals.

> The chamber appeared to be filled with reptiles, to teach the Necoris to withstand bodily terror. The greater the courage shewn on this trial, so much the more was he lauded after reception.[162]

[23] THE SCARAB

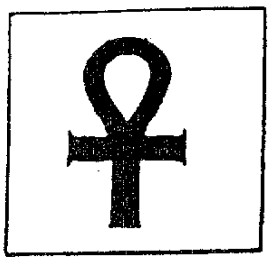
It was believed that the Scarab, if placed in the heart of the deceased, will perform the opening of the mouth so that the deceased may speak words of power or the innermost intentions of his soul.

> The scarabs which are found in the mummies, or lying upon the breast just above the position of the heart, form an interesting section of every large Egyptian collection.[163]



SCARAB: A design based on the dung beetle, this is the ancient Egyptian symbol of reincarnation. It also is associated with Beelzebub, Lord of the Flies.[164]

[24] THE ANKH



ANKH: This is an Egyptian symbol of life and often is associated with fertility.[165]

[25] EGYPTIAN SEX MAGIC

Sexual magic practices that are used by modern occult groups were perfected to fine art by the ancient Egyptian magicians. The following example of a spell to seduce a married woman is from Ancient Egyptian Magic by Bob Brier.

Spell to Seduce a Married Woman

Unas cohabits with his phallus, Unas is the lord of seed,
he who takes the women from their husbands.

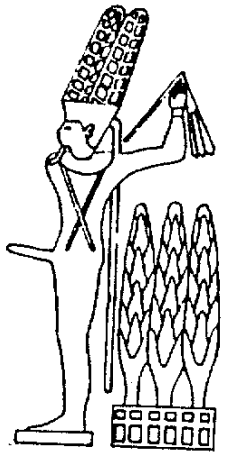
Pyramid Texts, Spell 510[166]

The following picture of the Egyptian sex god Min is from Coming into the Light, Rituals of Egyptian Magick, by Gerald and Betty Schueler.

Another formula of Sex Magick used by the ancient Egyptians was for purposes of enhancing fertility and fecundity were embodied in the god Amsu, whose name is literally "the formula of fertility." Amsu, or Min, was also called Menu (not to be confused with the god Menthu, the warrior Lord of Thebes), and was always depicted in iphyphallic form. Menu vecame the greek god Pan, whose sexual exploits are legendary. An appropriate prayer should be addressed to Amsu–Menu before sex to assure a son or daughter.[167]



Min

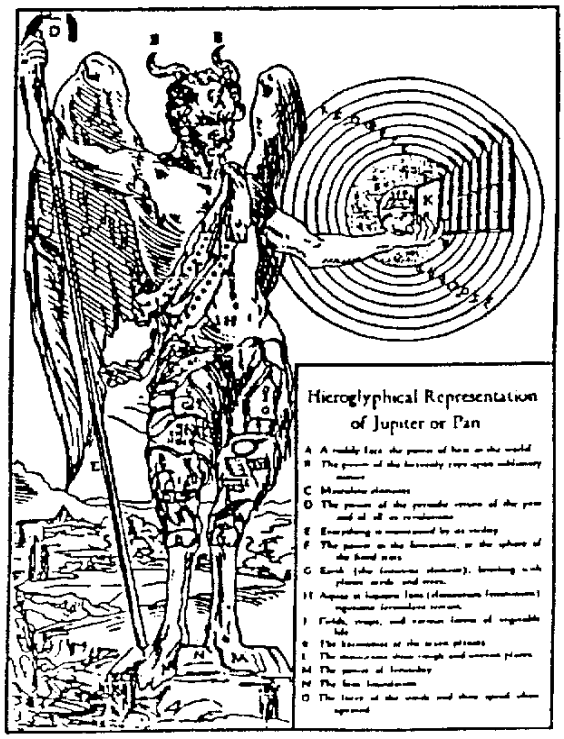
As was explained in this quote the Egytian god Min or Menu is the same as the Greek god Pan. The picture on the following page of 'THE GREAT GOD PAN' is from the book, The Secret Teachings of All Ages, by 'Masonry's Greatest Philosopher' - 33° Manly P. Hall. The explanation under the picture in Hall's book makes it clear that he was aware that Pan was a phallic diety. Hall also alludes to a saying from the early church "Great Pan is dead".

The words under the picture say:

> ...Pan is the prototype of natural energy, and while undoubtedly a phallic deity, should not be confused with Priapus. The pipes of Pan signify the natural harmony of the spheres, and the god himself is a symbol of Saturn because this planet is enthroned in Capricorn, whose emblem is a goat. The Egyptians were initiated into the Mysteries of Pan, who was regarded as a phase of Jupiter, the Demiurgus...The Christians fabricated a story to the effect that at the time of the birth of Christ the oracles were silenced after giving utterance to one last cry, "Great pan is dead!"[168]

Later in the same book Hall makes it clear where his sentements lie and those of Freemasonry when he makes this preposterous statement.

> The ancient Mysteries did not cease to exist when Christianity became the world's most powerful religion. Great Pan did not die! Freemasonry is the proof of his survival.[169]



[26] THE GOAT OF MENDES

The Satanic practice of using a goat for sexual purposes during a ritual also comes from Egypt. The goat of Medes or Baphomet is the most famous of all Satanic symbols. The Satanic goat takes its name from a city in Egypt where the goat was used publicly in a public ritual. This information is from a book called A History of Phallic Worship.

> The Egyptians showed this incarnation of the Deity by a less permanent, though equally expressive symbol. At Mendes a living goat was kept as the image of the generative power, to whom the women presented themselves naked, and had the honour of being publicly enjoyed by him. Herodotus saw the act openly performed, and calls it a prodigy. But the Egyptians had no such horror of it; for it was to them a representation of the incarnation of the Deity, and the communication of his creative spirit to man.[170]

The following illustration is the most widely used of all Satanic symbols, The Goat of Mendes or the Baphomet as it was drawn by Freemason Eliphas Levi. On page 15 of this book, there is a picture of a goat with the other pagan gods that was taken from The History of Freemasonry published by the Masonic History Company and they admit that the goat is indeed The Goat of Mendes.

> Figure 17 is a representation of a four-horned goat, which is said to be from Spain, with two upright and two lateral horns. This animal was alive in London about 1769. It is a symbol of the goat of Mendes.[171]

[27] THE SYMBOLIC CRUCIFIXION

The symbolic crucifixion in the picture below is occuring in the King's Chamber of the Great Pyramid and is taken from the book, The Phoenix, by 33° Mason Manly P. Hall. A Satanic ritual abuse survivor from Dearborn County, Indiana, confirmed that he was hung on a wooden cross in a similar ritual.

THE SYMBOLIC CRUCIFIXION
In the King's Chamber of the Great Pyramid 173

THE MOST DANGEROUS PIECE OF INFORMATION ABOUT THE BOOK OF THE DEAD — IT CONTAINED RITUALS THAT WERE PERFORMED IN SECRET BY PEOPLE WEARING MASKS.

Manly P. Hall 33° Mason writes:

> Professor Breasted, the most distinguished Egyptologist, told me that he was convinced that this book contained the ritual of a sacred drama performed by the living in the secrecy of the ancient temples. He justified his remarks by saying that he had personally examined the manuscripts of this work which had been marginated with prompter's marks and notes indicating entrances and exits. The ritual was evidently part of the primitive mask cult. When a priest, or even a consecrated layman, put on the mask or likeness of one of the gods, he became identical with that god.[174]

Can old writings thousands of years old give us clues to who is behind ritual satanic child abuse? If no further explanation were given, these hideous passages would reveal themselves as blatantly Satanic. The comparison that we will now make with the pictures that were drawn by the survivors of Satanic Ritual Abuse will show conclusively that someone is practicing Satanism with a distinctive Egyptian twist.

The similarities that we have drawn between Freemasonry and the ancient Egyptian religion are far too intricate to be dismissed as a mere coincidence. The magic word of Egyptian Magic though it is not now known was known to be a three syllable word which once again gives us an amazing similarity to the secret word of the third degree of Freemasonry, MA-HAH-BONE.

From Ancient Egyptian Magic:

> The story specifies that the word had three syllables, but does not give the word.[175]

We will close this chapter with a few more words of praise for The Egyptian Book of the Dead from an extremely popular Masonic book, The Lost Keys of Freemasonry:

> The Book of the Dead is a treasure house of Masonic lore to those who can realize that the ancient work has a significant meaning throughout, and were it available in a complete form, would render the whole subject of philosophy considerably more lucid.[176]
>
> Thus, from the crude fragments left to us of ancient Egyptian manuscripts, and their commentaries, we receive a great inspiration, an enobling realization of our one purpose. We are promised that if we serve faithfully and consecrate ourselves to the purpose for which the Mystery Schools came into existence, the Word will ultimately be returned and with it will come the full understanding of that deep and sublime mystery of philosophy as the rational substitute for death.[177]

CHAPTER 7 - SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE

This chapter is being contributed by Rick Doninger. He and his wife have been child advocates for eight years and are currently involved with helping children who are survivors of satanic ritual abuse as well as all other forms of abuse and molestation. Mr. Doninger has first-hand experience in dealing with the survivors of the horrors that the children of our nation are experiencing after being subjected to satanic ritual abuse. Our goal in providing this information to you is to help increase your awareness of what these children have suffered so that you will have compassion for them, believe their disclosures and encourage the authorities who are responsible for punishing the perpetrators to provide justice for the victims and their families. We also pray that you will join with us in this spiritual battle by praying for the survivors and their families. We ask that you pray for protection for all the men and women of our nation who are actively involved in this struggle for justice for the survivors.

****

In this chapter passages selected from the Egyptian rites in The Book of the Dead will be compared with the explanations of drawings of survivors of satanic ritual abuse. The drawings at the end of this chapter will be indicated by Mr. Doninger as #1,# 2,# 3, etc.. Please refer back to CHAPTER 6 for further explanation about their connection to Egyptian Satanism if necessary; > repeated physical, emotional, mental, and spiritual assaults combined with a systematized use of symbols, ceremonies and machinations designed and orchestrated to attain malevolent effects. The abuse may be repeated 100-1000 times.[178]

****

RITUAL ABUSE: by definition is:

This will probably be the most disturbing chapter you will read in this book. This chapter is meant to be a comparison between the ancient rites of Egyptology (the Mysteries) and the rites of modern day Satanism as described and illustrated by the victims of the most heinous crime brought to the public's attention in the history of our country: ritual child Abuse. Although the evidence that is needed to prosecute such crimes against children is by far the most difficult to obtain, the growing number of reports of this nature demand that we as a society take a very serious look at what these victims are saying.

The recent allegations of ritualistic abuse of children is not limited to this country. Reports are beginning to surface in England, Canada, France and Italy. All of the countries mentioned have also noticed a virtual explosion of interest in the areas of witchcraft and the occult.

Although the fascination with the supernatural covers too many areas to mention, the one most frequently referred to by victims of ritual abuse is satanism. Our knowledge of satanic ritual abuse is still very limited, as the reports of this crime have only begun to gain attention over the last decade. Law Enforcement personnel and professionals in the areas of identification, intervention, and treatment of abuse victims are painstakingly trying to piece together the information supplied by survivors of ritualistic abuse in order to meet the urgent need for expertise in this growing field of occult crimes.

Primarily as a society we are not at all prepared to wage war with an enemy we've seen very little of. Although evidence of its presence is seen in the eyes of its victims and felt after hearing their disclosures, there are some very definite obstacles to overcome before we can even begin to arm ourselves with the weapons to fight this hidden foe. Disbelief from those who are supposed to be involved in intervention for such victims is one of the biggest hindrances to those who have become aware of the ritual abuse problem and have committed themselves to offering assistance to those victims. In 1991, in the United States of America, many in law enforcement, child welfare, and the judicial process simply refuse to accept that there are elements of our society who are committed to the physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual destruction of our children.

'Fear' is another factor which prohibits those who are approached for assistance from getting involved in such a controversial issue. This 'fear element' is probably the single most effective weapon the perpetrators of ritual abuse use to continue their activities undetected. Professionals often fear the loss of credibility at the mention of terms such as Satanism or Devil Worship. Much of the fear generated when this issue is raised results from a lack of knowledge and understanding of occult crimes and, more specifically, the ritualistic abuse of our most precious resource--our children.

In this chapter we are going to try to counter some of this fear by sharing some of the information gathered from interviews with the survivors of these horrible crimes. In this comparative look at the specific rituals described in the previous chapter, alongside the disclosures and illustrations drawn by child victims of ritual abuse, we hope to better arm you - the reader - with understanding necessary to face this nation's darkest secret. This information, though shocking and heartbreaking, will hopefully open some eyes to the fact that man is capable (and has been capable) for centuries of such atrocities as human sacrifice and cannibalism in hopes of appeasing a god of darkness. The same god of darkness and deception who cloaks himself today in the secrecy of symbolism and ceremony is found in the occultic nature of secret societies that have been around for centuries. As stated in chapter one, we will also be putting forth a theory that much of today's ritual satanic child abuse could stem from secret societies who are using Masonic and Egyptian rituals. Such pseudo-masonic cults have been around for a long time and have a history of advocating violence.

We will now begin to compare the Egyptian rituals with pictures drawn by victim-survivors and their testimonies.

[1] DRINKING BLOOD - SLAUGHTER BLOCK

> Hail, devourer of blood, who camest forth from the block of slaughter, I have not acted guilefully. (Ch. 6, page 51)

The drinking of blood, either human or animal is consistently part of the ritual abuse survivors disclosures (Pictures #1,3,5,8,9, and 10). According to the victims, the Satanists believe that the life force of the sacrificial victim is in the blood. Partaking of the blood is believed to empower and add longevity of life. Child victims have related accounts of how the cult members would always drain and save the blood of their victims in apple juice jars, pans, bottles, and pots. The very young children are sometimes introduced to the taste of blood gradually by mixing it with milk, formula, punch, and other beverages. Eventually, with increases in blood content in these drinks, the child victim will be able to drink the blood without dilution. Pictures #9,12,16,20, and 23 show body parts removed to be used in a ritual, including the drinking of blood. Picture #10 illustrates 'blood punch' made from the blood of a sacrificed child. The child victim titled this picture "Birthday Colt [Cult] Celebration". The trauma to child victims, resulting from this type of forced participation in satanic rituals such as these is immeasurable. The State of Idaho, as a result of legislative efforts in 1990, has a Legislative Act relating to ritualized abuse of a child (House of Representatives Bill No.817)-Céntennial Legislature second regular session 1990. Chapter 15, Title 18 Idaho Code-New Section-18-1506 A Idaho Code.) (Idaho Code-Chapter 50 Title 18, New Section 18-5003. Def. Cannibalism)

In pictures #1,3,8,10, and 17, ingestion of blood is shown as a major part of the rituals. In picture #1 a young girl describes how during her grooming to be a Priestess in a satanic coven, she was forced to kill the sacrificial victim (a woman) without the aid of the adult members. Three priests in the cult stand, with glasses in hand, waiting for the child to cut the victim. When the blood would begin to flow, it was drained into each of the three glasses. The child was then placed in a suspended cage and made to observe the victim being crucified upside down on a cross and burned. Then the child was forced to drink the blood offered by the priests and was then placed on a table and tortured sexually by all the members as a reward.

In picture #8, the child describes how blood was drank from the skull of a sacrificial victim (a man?). This picture also represents the child and an adult nude, with blood smeared over their bodies in preparation for a ritual that also includes the drinking of blood.

Picture #4 illustrates the members of the cult getting ready to use the ritual stick and carving with the knife to draw more blood. These rituals are damaging to the physical health and mental stability of the victims.

[2] CANNABALISM - EATING INTESTINES

> Hail, eater of intestines, coming forth from Mabet, not have I desolated ploughed lands. (Ch. 6, page 51)

Cannibalism (Pictures #6,10,11,12,17, and 20) is the practice of eating the flesh of one's own kind. In our experience with the victims of ritual abuse, this aspect of the abuse is certainly one of the most traumatic of all. One of the best pictures depicting this is #11. To the average American citizen, the thought of cannibalism is a foreign concept; something you hear about happening in the deepest, darkest regions of Africa or South America. We just cannot accept the possibility of such an atrocious act in a "civilized nation". In 1989 in Matamoros, Mexico, a cult was discovered operating a drug trafficking business. When the Mexican authorities searched the compound of the cult, human remains were found in boiling pots. In the last few years children all over America are telling authorities about these sorts of practices at "meetings" where the people pray to the devil. When children disclose cannibalism their attitudes and behavior vary from regression, to aggressiveness, to horrified. Then there are those who can speak very plainly and recall the mutilation and devouring of both babies and adults with no emotion at all. In an interview with an eight year-old girl I was told how her dad had been teaching her to skin babies in the garage. When I asked what they did with the babies after they were skinned, this angelic looking child answered almost mockingly, "They ate them?". I was shocked! She said "Yes Rick, they ate them. There's people like that. They think it gives them power". That child will never know the impact she had on my life. Out of the mouth of this child came testimony of the ultimate evil! Forced ingestion of flesh of her own kind. Cannibalism, right here in the U.S.A. I cried sporadically the next several days at the memory of that child's disclosure. I didn't want to believe it, but I knew in my heart it had to be true. Later, I learned that children from all over the U. S. and several foreign countries were giving very detailed accounts of ritual murders and cannibalism.

Pictures #6,9,10,11,12,17,20 and 34 depict rituals involving cannibalism. This survivor titled picture #12 "eating organs". It shows eighteen coven members around a table upon which a human sacrifice is offered to Satan. The intestines are exposed on the body. On the wall are two pieces of entrail to be eaten and, on a small table, the instruments used to remove these parts from the body. Present at this ritual were six red-robed priests. Our survivor was not sure why so many of high position were present, but said the eating of the intestines provided some special power.

Picture #6 shows six members of this satanic group kneeling in prayer, giving thanks to Satan for the baby which is about to be offered as sacrifice.

Picture #36 illustrates how the child was hung by a nail through the head, entrails removed, and then roasted on a spit over an open fire. Our survivor said, "You throw up the first few times you eat it, but you eventually get used to it." The damage done to a child's mental, emotional, and spiritual health as a result of this type of victimization, is long lasting and results in the child suffering from post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), such as is found in war veterans. Although disbelief is provoked by the children's testimonies of the atrocities, the detail and similarity from such a large number of unrelated children from different geographical areas demands credibility be given to their stories.

(21)Hail, thou two-headed serpent, who comest forth from the torture-chamber, I have not defiled the wife of any man. (Ch. 6, page 52)

The police detective and his female assistant tried to maintain their composure as the nine year-old victim described the horrors that she had witnessed in the basement torture chamber of her grandmother's house. She described how tables were made with chains attached to hold the victims down on the table; how the victims heads are shaved, and three foot long "sticks" placed in the rectums of the victims on the tables. It was all the South Georgia policeman could do to keep from showing the disgust and anger at the perpetrators who had forced this beautiful, red-haired, freckled child to participate in horrors that tested the experienced child abuse investigator's imagination.

Pictures #12,13,15, and 18, drawn by a male and female survivor in Indiana, depicts victims restrained on tables and mutilated in different ways.

Pictures #18 and 21 show how the victim is sometimes branded on the chest with a five-pointed star symbol. This illustration is titled "Baby being branded by the demons".

The children tell of how the eyes, ears, brains, hearts, hands, and feet are usually removed. The Satanists believe the longer and more prolonged the death, the more power they absorb from the victims. Skinning the victims alive, we are told, is also a preferred form of torture. The children are always forced to participate in this torture which serves a two-fold purpose: First, it ensures silence of the children by implicating them in the crime and, secondly, it desensitizes the child to future participation in these ritualistic activities.

> Hail, Crusher of Bones, who comest forth from Suten-henen, "I have told no lies.." (Ch. 6, page 52)

In pictures #9,16, and 23, the children's illustrations show the removal of bones. The children tell how some of the bones are kept, dried and crushed into powder. They are then used to make clay from which ritual paraphernalia is made. Things such as plates, cups, and bone china dolls are sculpted from this bone clay. These items are then sold and traded among other cult members. This also answers some investigators' questions about why evidence of ritual murder is seldom found. The children say virtually all body parts are utilized for some purpose, and what isn't eaten or kept is burned leaving no traces to be found by authorities.

> [5] WASHING IN BLOOD
> Behold ye then god this great of slaughter, mighty of terror, he washeth in your blood, he batheth in your gore. (Ch. 6, page 52)

> [6] KILLING ANIMALS - LOCKS OF HAIR
> I have obtained the mastery over the animals with the knife in their heads and their locks of hair, who live among their emeralds, the aged and the shining beings who prepare the moment of Osiris Ani, triumphant in peace. He maketh slaughter upon the earth, and conversely, I am strong. (Ch. 6, page 52)

The children we have interviewed have all given accounts of animal sacrifice. The stories involving animals have ranged from rats and other small animals, to cows. We are not sure of the specific meaning for the use of different kinds of animals: the children say that those who do this will use anything for the shedding of blood; dogs, cats, squirrels, mice, or deer.

Picture #14, drawn by a nine-year-old, shows a rat being killed. This child was allegedly taken from her school to an old church where a satanic ritual was being held. She said those adults involved were personnel from her school.

Pictures #26 and 37 depict the killing of a goat which was then beheaded. The head was then mounted on the wall and the members prayed to Satan asking him to possess the goat head and speak through it. According to our survivor she was then placed inside the carcass of the dead goat and the cult members sodomized it and her once again while she was inside.

[7] KING UNAS EATS HEARTS

He has taken the hearts of the gods.
He has eaten the Red,
He has swallowed the Green
Their charms are in his belly
He has swallowed the knowledge of every god.
the lifetime of King Unas is eternity. (Ch. 6, page 52)

Survivors of satanic ritual abuse involving human and animal sacrifice always tell of eating the hearts of the sacrificial victims. They tell us the heart is the most powerful part of the body to be eaten and all of the victims life energy is contained within the heart. Sometimes the heart is removed very quickly while the victim is still alive and then devoured immediately by the group. Picture #19 drawn by a nine-year-old girl illustrates hearts of children kept in jars and the children's names recorded on the jars. In Picture #20 the cabinet the child says the hearts were kept in also had a knife, a pan that blood was collected in, and books that held written accounts of all that was done to the ritual abuse victims. The children say that the cult has members designated to do this. These record keepers are known as scribes with the cult.

[8] KING UNAS IS A CANNIBAL FOND OF SCALPING PEOPLE AND BONDAGE

509. UNAS devoureth men and liveth "upon the gods, he is the lord of envoys, whom he sendeth forth on his missons. 'He who cutteth off hairy scalps,' "who dwelleth in the fields, tieth the gods with ropes;..(Ch. 6, page 52)

Pictures #6,8,9,18, and 19 are all depictions of cannibalism, #15,18,22 bondage. and #21, scalping. These are aspects of modern day Satanism which are routinely described by victims of ritual abuse.

Picture #21 shows the skin being peeled from the skull of a baby. Skinning people alive is a common practice among cults involved in human sacrifice. As in this same illustration the inverted pentagram is sometimes carved upon the abdomen of the victim.

Picture #22 is what the survivor calls the "dirt offering". The victim is tied down on a bed of spikes. Then the child participant is forced to push the victim down onto the deadly points. Once again this forced participation in ritual murder is devastating to the child. The mental and emotional scars resulting from this lasts a lifetime. Survivor guilt is common among these children.

> 510. Tcheser-tep keepeth guard over them for Unas and driveth them unto him; and the Cord-master bound them for slaughter. Khonsu the slayer of the wicked cutteth their throats.....and draweth out their intestines, for it is he whom Unas sendeth to slaughter; and Shesmu cutteth them in pieces and boileth their members in his blazing caldrons of the night..(Ch. 6, page 52-3)

Picture #11 is the most graphic of illustrations done by any of the survivors we have interviewed. This picture is entitled "carving for our feast." It tells the story of an eight-year-old girl being forced to butcher the sacrificial victim into small enough pieces to be packaged for storage for a cannibalism ritual. Sometimes the victims' body parts were cooked in pots as a stew; sometimes the cult just devoured the flesh raw. The child who drew this illustration suffers from Multiple Personality Disorder as a result of the forced participation. M.P.D. is common among child ritual abuse victims.

> The old gods and the old goddesses become fuel for his furnace. The mighty ones in heaven light the fire under the caldrons: where are heaped up the thighs of the firstborn; (Ch. 6, page 53)
> [11] THE RITUAL FIRE IS STARTED WITH THE THIGHS OF A WOMAN (Ch.6, page 53)

Picture #23 drawn by a little girl from a generational Satanist family from south Georgia, shows the thighs of a woman lying next to a firepit.

> [12] HACKING IN PIECES THE FIRSTBORN
> [508] Unas hath weighed his "words with the hidden god [?] who hath no name, on the day of hacking in pieces the firstborn. (Ch. 6, page 53)

Picture #24 is a very simple illustration of the offering of the firstborn. The survivor tells us she was given the special privilege of being allowed to carry this sacrificial offering to the stone altar where it was then hacked to pieces. This particular ritual is shown as having been done during a full moon. Our survivor tells us that most of the sacrifices take place when the moon is full.

> Behold, Unas eateth of that which the red drown sendeth forth, he increaseth, and the magical charms of the gods are in his belly; (Ch. 6, page 53)

Although it is still unclear exactly what is meant by "magical charms", one survivor tells us that it may be the different entrails of the sacrificial victim, as each part (heart, liver, testicles, etc.) are believed to contain mystical powers and those who consume those parts become endowed with such powers.

> [14] A GOD BORN FROM THE BUTTOCKS OF A COW
> Every season of the flood I saw god born from the buttocks of a cow..." (Ch. 6, page 54)

Picture #29 was one of the most bizarre disclosures of the many we've heard involving Satanism and ritualistic abuse. This disclosure came from one of the alter personalities of a survivor. When asked where she was at the time of this ritual, she said, " I was watching from up on top of the light. I'm little enough to sit up there, you know." She recalled this ritual as a birthing ceremony whereby a full-term infant was taken from the mother by cutting open the belly. Then the newborn was placed inside the stomach of a drugged cow. After sewing the child inside and performing the required incantations the infant is removed, symbolizing being born into the family of Satan. Actual performance of these appalling rituals are beyond the comprehension of most modern minds, yet children from all over America are giving corroborative testimony to these ungodly crimes.

[15] BOAT RITUAL

These illustrations from Albert Champdor's "The Book of the Dead" shows a mummy, with phallus erect sliding into the Seventh Region of the Lower World, described as being "filled with serpents' coils and four sons of Horus who protect the viscera of the Dead." (Ch. 6, page 55)

In Picture #27, a 19-year-old ritual abuse survivor depicts herself being made to lay in a boat floating in shallow water. The boat is surrounded by six cult members, six burning red candles, with six snakes placed in the boat to crawl on her. She says she was not allowed to move even one muscle or be punished for her disobedience. She said this was a part of a ritual performed to cleanse her of sins against Satan, which consisted of acts of kindness, or belief in God. She titles this picture "the snakes will cleanse forever life." One can only imagine the horror experienced by a small child while enduring this type of abuse.

Many times the various tortures and acts of violence perpetrated upon these children are specifically designed to cause the child victim to suffer a split personality. This Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD) aids the perpetrators in cases where this type of abuse is discovered by authorities. M. P. D. destroys the credibility of a child witness in a court of law. The trauma, resulting from ritual abuse, is something the perpetrators rely on to avoid prosecution.

[16] THE EATING OF DEAD BODIES

Ra-Tmu, Lord of the Great House, prince, life, strength and health of all the gods, deliver thou [me] from the god whose face is like unto that of a dog, whose brows are as those of a man, and who feedeth upon the dead, who watcheth at the Bight of the firey Lake, and who devoureth the bodies of the dead and swalloweth hearts, and who shooteth forth filth, but he himself remaineth unseen. (Ch. 6, page 56)

This ritual has already been discussed in the section on CANNABALISM on page 78. However, there is a reference made to "face is like unto that of a dog", which could possibly be similar to one of the masks the survivors tell about that are sometimes worn during the rituals.

[17] RITUAL SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS (Ch. 6, page 56-7)

The illustration on page 57 shows the passing down of body parts and pitchers of blood?

The survivors show things similar to this in Pictures #29, and 37.

[18] HEARTS IN A JAR

The heart is placed in a jar to be weighed for judgment. (Ch. 6, page 57)

The young children who tell of these sordid rituals do not know why many of these ceremonies are performed, but those adults who commit these atrocious acts are well aware that the motivation is to satisfy their god of darkness. In the previous chapter. the weighing of hearts in jars for judgment are Egyptian in origin.

In Pictures #19 and 20, the survivors show the hearts in the jars also. How many satanic cults actually use the Egyptian Book of the Dead as a guide for their bloody worship is unknown, but the similarities in specific aspects of the ritual leaves no doubt that it is more than a coincidence.

As we near the year 2000 A.D., we must remember the children who have been ritualistically abused are human beings who have been attacked by an enemy and taken prisoner. They have suffered wounds that they may or may not survive. They have suffered assaults upon their spirit that are intended to corrupt their innocence. Evil, pain, and fear have been forced upon them repeatedly until the child prays to die but, at the same instant, anger, violence and hate are kindled. If the child is fortunate enough to find someone who believes them they have a chance to be helped. It takes much love, earning their trust, making the child (or adult) feel safe, a strong stomach, and belief in the power of God to heal and deliver the survivor from the powerful clutches of Satan. When there is no intervention, you have a child (or adult) who has had to experience more than the soldiers of most of the conventional wars, some of whom act out their frustrations on school-mates or members of their families. It is no wonder that some of these victims experience learning difficulties and attention problems in school, problems holding down a job or, just relating to people in general.

Trauma suffered as a result of physical and sexual abuse at a very young age leaves scars that, more often than not, never go away. When this abuse is combined with assaults on the victims' emotions and spirit, in such a way as to implant evil, not only is the child traumatized, but - without intervention, the child will be desensitized to horrors such as cannibalism, murder, bestiality, animal mutilation, and sexual perversion beyond our imagination. Some of these children will grow up to be murderers, rapists and child molesters. This is the goal of those involved in ritual abuse; to totally corrupt the child in every way. Satanists have a goal to breed an entire generation of youth, indoctrinated in evil.

> It is Osiris. Others, however, say that his name is Ra, and that the god who dwelleth in Amentet is the phallus of Ra, wherewith he had union with himself. (Ch. 6, page 58)

Pictures #28,31, and 37 are graphic examples of sexual perversion. When one tries to imagine the trauma associated with either of these pictures, the heart is - or should be - gripped with compassion for the victim of ritual abuse. In Picture #28 (the lower half), the child illustrates how a sacrificial victim was laid on a table, whereupon his genitals were cut off. This was done while he was alive! After removal of the penis, a stick was inserted into the amputated organ. The emotional and physical shock to the child victim because of the use of this tool of perversion is beyond description. She was first made to taste the blood from where the genitals were removed, then made to lie down and suffer molestation and torture with the tool made from the amputated penis. Finally, she was placed in a cage suspended from a tree to watch while the cult members finished the mutilation (Picture #2). The lower part of #28 shows the tool from the amputated penis. Picture #31 shows a wand, or ritual stick, used in the sexual torture.

Sexual perversion is a part of every ritual, according to our survivor. This unbridled sex, including the abuse of children which many times is filmed to be sold for profit in the child pornography market, is also part of the lure to attract those people who are prone to participate in acts of deviate sexual conduct. This aspect is interesting because child molestation is a crime and, many times, blackmailing the victims and parents can be profitable. The children who have been victimized all tell of being placed nude on tables, eaten, insulted, mocked, tortured sexually, and forced to have sex with siblings, animals, and adults, including same-sex partners. Satanism's doctrine proclaims no restraints in all areas of morality including sex.

> Who is this? It is Osiris. Others however, say that it is the dead body of Osiris and, yet others, say that it is the excrement of Osiris." (Ch. 6, page 58)

Both Pictures #35 and #34 are examples of the use of excrement in satanic ritual abuse in the 90's. Both show children lying on tables with people in robes and other disguises. Both show bowls nearby filled with urine and feces to be smeared over the children's bodies. Children tell how they were made to eat and drink the human waste. Defilement of the innocence of the child, humiliation, and degradation are forced upon these children to both satisfy their god-Satan-and their own unbridled Lust.

An interesting note about the child who drew #35: This girl alleges she was ritually abused at a Masonic home down in the south. She claims she spent nine years at this home being forced to participate in and witness some type of ritual performed by men who were Masons. According to this victim, the people who forced these children to partake in these rituals also forced them to wear a pair of 'golden scales' around their neck. This is extremely significant in light of what 33° Mason C. W. Leadbeater said about Black Masonry.

> The whole of what we now call Black Masonry led up to an explanation of karma as divine justice, this having been preserved for us in shadow in what is now the 31°. That is the degree of the Grand Inspector Inquisitor Commander, whose symbol is a pair of scales. In Egypt, this pair of scales was taken as an emblem of the perfect balance of divine justice.[179]

This young girl's disclosure could well be the first ritual of Black Masonry ever to be documented. She also alleges that she observed her siblings killed during these rituals. Further, she alleges that other children at the home were used in pornography and prostitution.

> The chamber appeared to be filled with reptiles, to teach the Necoris to withstand bodily terror. The greater the courage shewn on this trial, so much the more was he lauded after reception. (Ch. 6, page 58)

In Pictures #30 and 33, snakes are used to teach the children who are ritually abused to withstand bodily terror.

In #33, the child victim had to let the snakes crawl over her. She was not allowed to cry or move even one muscle. This use of snakes is so traumatic to the children many times this act alone is enough to cause the development of Multiple Personality Disorder.

In #33, and in #28, in the Boat Ritual referred to on page 64, snake bites occurred many times. The pain was unbearable, but intentionally inflicted upon the victims.

Picture #30 shows the use of snakes as guardians to keep the children in their cages and quiet.

> [24] THE ANKH
> The ankh is an Egyptian symbol of life and is often associated with fertility. (Ch. 6, page 59)

The ankh in Picture #32 shows an illustration of a book the child victim calls "The Devil's Book". The child said the perpetrators of her abuse read from this book at the "meetings" where she and other children were abused. The child shows the book had the Egyptian symbol of life and fertility on the cover. Pictures such as these leave no doubt to the adult observer that these rituals, described by child victims of ritual abuse, are directly related to ancient blood rites.

During many of these rituals, the Devil, or Satan, was summoned from a pit. In Picture #7, a survivor has drawn her conception of what she thought he resembled: a half-human, half-animal form. In some literature this type of figure is called a "Pan" figure or god of the underworld.

[21] SELF-MUTILATION AND PERVERSION

> Who are these gods? They are the drops of blood which came forth from the phallus of Ra when he went to perform his own mutilation. These drops of blood sprang into being under the forms of the gods Hu and Sa, who are in the bodygard of ra, and who accompany the god Tem daily and every day. (Ch.6, page 58)

Although I do not have an illustration that depicts self-mutilation, we have worked with many ritual abuse victims and it seems as though even the youngest of the children display tendencies toward self-injury. We have known of instances where children as young as age four have cut and scratched themselves severely as a result of the trauma and pain suffered during ritualistic abuse. As the victims spend more time in the abusive situation, they will eventually be programmed to keep the abuse a secret. One victim that we have worked with extensively would hurt herself impulsively. She told us that she was taught to do something to herself if she began considering disclosure of the dark secrets to someone who might threaten the cult's operations. Even years after leaving the abusive group the urge to hurt herself was sometimes overwhelming, resulting in self-inflicted scratches, burns, or razor blade cuts. Suicidal tendencies are common among ritual abuse victims. One survivor said she would rather die than feel the pain caused by guilt over the things she was forced to participate in. She saw, over and over, the pain felt by the cult's sacrificial offerings; sometimes adult, and sometimes child, victims. During these times, she would usually feel like hurting herself, saying, "I deserve it." This false feeling of being responsible for those victims who died upon the Satanists' altars many times would send the survivor into a frenzy of self-mutilation.

Other children who have been ritualistically abused will sometimes try to aggressively sexually assault other children, repeating and acting out the perversion of the adult cult members.

All of the illustrations we have briefly examined in this chapter are gruesome testimonials to the horrors that man is capable of inflicting upon innocent children. The trauma or emotional shock to the children is immeasurable and in many cases death results. As I have stated earlier, in those cases where the child survives, the atrocities the victim is left with does irreparable damage to body, mind, and spirit. This indoctrination into evil is not easily reversed. That is exactly what the perpetrators of this abuse set out to accomplish. The children are taught that the dark god who requires the blood, pain, and flesh of innocent victims is the supreme deity. They are taught that darkness is more powerful than light. Love is something fictitious. To devour one's own kind is a pleasure which extends life and adds to personal gain. The total reversal of both spiritual and moral value results in the development of a heartless, murderous, depraved human being, who can only be reclaimed by the one power greater than God's dark adversary. The power of Jesus Christ to redeem, through love, those little ones offended by the servants of Satan himself, is the one hope the innocent young victims have.

After looking at the obvious similarities between the Ancient Egyptian Blood Rituals of "The Book of the Dead" and the disclosures of victims of modern day ritualistic satanic abuse or Satanism, we are left with no doubt as to the origin of this dark religion. Although we may draw back at the thought, we must also consider those who practice these dark rites and consider the role they may play in our every day life as a society. Do these blood thirsty practitioners of horror affect anyone more than the innocent victims of this religion? We think: Yes!

We know from first-hand experience, the grief each victim-survivor is living through as they disclosed the terrible things they endured. We have seen the problems this information has caused the families of the survivors. We have listened as families and victim-survivors have told us how many times they have been rejected and not believed by their own church families. We have spent a countless number of days and nights listening, believing, crying, comforting, and most important of all praying for and with these victim-survivors and their families; these "little ones" whom Jesus died for.

We hope this book will show you - the reader - that the evil of old is as real and present in our day as it was in the day when the Ancient Rites were first recorded. Let us continue to pray for the innocent "little ones" who need our intervention to help rescue them from the chains which bind them within this "Hidden Holocaust."

Although our society as a whole is rejecting the possibility of such an unspeakable problem; ritual child abuse is a reality. Only by believing the children, who have survived these awful acts, can we help them escape. Modern day Satanists have a number of stated goals; one of which is to claim as its own an entire generation. We as Christians, must answer the call to spiritual warfare if we hope to help God's most precious creation: Our children ! If you have any questions regarding this chapter, or questions about ritual abuse, write to the address in the front of the book.

CHAPTER 8 - BLACK MASONRY - DEVOTED TO THE KNOWLEDGE OF EVIL

In this chapter we are documenting the doctrine of Black Masonry as it was taught by 33° Mason C. W. Leadbeater. Not only was Leadbeater a prominent Mason, he also was an influential Theosophist and worked closely on many projects with the head of Theosophy, Annie Bessant. Leadbeater according to some sources was a homosexual pedophile.[180] According to Leadbeater, Black Masonry is degrees 19 through 30 in the Scottish Rite and are known as the Council of KADOSH. In the following quotes 'Knight K. H.' is the Masonic abbreviation for Knight Kadosh. In the following quote from Leadbeater's book, Ancient Mystic Rites, he defines the scope of Black Masonry and talks about its relationship to evil, suffering, and vengeance.

> Few indeed of our Egyptian Bm. appear to have passed beyond the Rose-Croix, for only the few needed anything further than the splendid revelation of the indwelling Love of God which they received in what we call the Eighteenth Degree. But for those few who felt that there was yet more to learn of the nature of God, and who eagerly wished to understand the meaning of evil and suffering and its relation to the divine plan, the prototype of our Black Masonry existed, the teaching and progress comprised in our degrees from the nineteenth to the thirtieth. This section of the Mysteries was especially concerned with the working out of karma in its different aspects, studied as a law of retribution, from one point of view dark and terrible. This is the inner kernel of truth lying behind the vengeance-elements in the degree of Knight K.H.[181]

Albert Mackey in his Encyclopedia of Freemasonry gives the doctrine of the Masonic Kadosh system. Kadosh doctrine centers around the story of the execution of James de Molay by the Pope and the King of France for satanic crimes. James de Molay was the last head of the Knights Templars and Mackey contends that the Templars continue on in Freemasonry.

> The doctrine of the Kadosh system is that the persecutions of the Knights Templar by Philip the Fair of France, and Pope Clement V, however cruel and sanguinary in its results, did not extinguish the Order, but it continued to exist under the forms of Freemasonry. That the ancient Templars are the modern Kadoshes, and that the Builder at the Temple of Solomon is now replaced by James de Molay, the martyred Grand Master of the Templars, the assassins being represented by the King of France, the Pope, and Naffodei the informer against the Order;[182]

In his book, The Occult Conspiracy, Michael Howard lists the charges against the Knights Templars that stemmed from the October raid of their headquarters in Paris in the year 1307 A.D.

> Specifically the Templars were accused of denying the tenets of the > Christian faith, spitting or urinating on the crucifix during secret rites of initiation, worshipping a skull or head called Baphomet in a dark cave, anointing it with blood or the fat of unbaptized babies, worshipping the Devil in the shape of a black cat and committing acts of sodomy and bestiality....

> Candidates entering the Order also had to kiss their initiator on the mouth, the navel, the penis and at 'the base of the spine'. These kisses were regarded by critics of the Order as proof of their perverted sexual activities but in the occult tradition the naval, sexual organs and the perineum are the physical locations of the psychic centres of the human body, known in the East as chakras.[183]

Freemasons today will argue that de Molay was not a Satanist and will rigorously defend his character, mainly because the Masonic organization for young boys is named after de Molay. This Masonic argument contradicts the facts and de Molay stands in history as a man executed for Satanic crimes. British Historian Nesta H. Webster talks about the convincing evidence against the Knights Templar.

> Moreover, do the confessions of the Knights appear to be the outcome of pure imagination such as men under the influence of torture might devise? It is certainly difficult to believe that the accounts of the ceremony of initiation given in detail by men in different countries, all closely resembling each other, yet related in different phraseology, could be pure inventions. Had the victims been driven to invent they would surely have contradicted each other, have cried out in their agony that all kinds of wild and fantastic rites had taken place in order to satisfy the demands of their interlocutors. But no, each appears to be describing the same ceremony more or less completely, with characteristic touches that indicate the personality of the speaker, and in the main all the stories tally.[184]

The Masonic defense that the confessions of the Knights Templars were extracted under torture is false. While it is true that torture was used in France, torture was not used in Italy and England and the confessions were identical. Leadbeater explains how the Templars went to Scotland and mingled their doctrine with other occult sources and the Egyptian mysteries to create the Black Masonry of the Scottish Rite.

> Certain of the French Knights Templars took refuge with their brethren of the Temple in Scotland, and in that country their traditions became mingled to some extent with the ancient Celtic rites of Heredom, thus forming one of the sources from which the Scottish Rite was later to be evolved. Traditions of vengeance upon the execrable King and Pope and the Traitor passed down throughout the ages, and were interwoven with the Egyptian tradition corresponding to our Black Masonry, culminating in what we now call the 30°.[185]

This is confirmed by Masonic authority Albert Pike who honors James de Molay as the founder of the Scottish Rite.

> "The end of the drama is well known, and how Jacques de Molai and his fellows perished in the flames. But before his execution, the Chief of the doomed Order organized and instituted what afterward came to be called the Occult, Hermetic, or Scottish Masonry. In the gloom of his prison, the Grand Master created four Metropolitan Lodges, at Naples for the East, at Edinburg for the West, at Stockholm for the North, and at Paris for the South." [The initials of his name, J.•. B.•. M.•. found in the same order in the first three Degrees, are but one of the many internal and cogent proofs that such was the origin of modern Free-Masonry. The legend of Osiris was revived and adopted, to symbolize the destruction of the Order, and the resurrection of Khurum, slain in the body of the Temple..[186]

Once again Leadbeater stresses that Karma or revenge is the main element of Black Masonry.

> The whole of what we now call Black Masonry led up to an explanation of karma as divine justice, this having been preserved for us in shadow in what is now the 31°, that of the Grand Inspector Inquisitor Commander, whose symbol is a pair of scales. In Egypt this pair of scales was taken as an emblem of the perfect balance of divine justice; the aspirant learnt that all the evil and horror associated with the working out of karma was indeed based on perfect justice, although it had appeared as evil to the lesser vision of the profane.[187]

What was the revenge that was taken in the death of convicted Satanist James de Molay? According to former Grand Commander Albert Pike, it was the death of the Pope, the King, and the informer against the order.

> "The Pope and the King soon after perished in a strange and sudden manner. Squin de Florian, the chief denouncer of the Order, died assassinated.[188]

In this quote Leadbeater makes it plain that Black Masonry is DEVOTED TO THE KNOWLEDGE OF EVIL.

> Thus the first stage of the higher instruction, that of the Rose-Croix or Red Masonry, was devoted to the knowledge of good, while the second stage, that of K. H. or Black Masonry, was devoted to the knowledge of evil.[189]

Is it possible that there are Freemasons today that follow Leadbeater's doctrine of Black Masonry, dedicated to the knowledge of evil? We will have to admit that it is indeed possible. Is it also possible that there are people in Freemasonry who take revenge against the Pope, the State, and the revealer of secrets, seriously? Once again we have to admit - IT IS AT LEAST POSSIBLE! It is interesting that in America the Scottish Rite has a black uniform for the Knights Templar degree presumably because of their great admiration for de Molay.

> There have been considerable discussions about the black uniform of the American branch of the Knights Templar, which does not conform to the dress of the Medieval Order, which was white with a red cross on the breast, the latter being used in British and Canadian priories or preceptories. The theory followed in the United States seems to have been that black was adopted in respect of the martyred de Molai and his associates.[190]

The frightening thing about Freemasonry is that any interpretation can be given to Masonic ritual and symbols that does not violate basic Masonic landmarks. As the Mason is encouraged to seek the deeper understanding of the Masonic symbols, this leaves a huge door wide open for a Mason to plunge deeper into the occult. This has been used by occultists for hundreds of years to develop their own system of Satanic teaching. The following is from the Indiana Freemasons Monitor:

> Fortunately for the peace of mind of the modern initiate there are no arbitrary tests of faith in these matters, so there can be no trials for heresy or danger or sorcerer burning. There are certain ancient doctrines known as the Landmarks which every duly obligated Freemason is bound to respect; there are prescriptions of Masonic conduct which he is bound to obey. But if he chooses to believe that the Fraternity descended by some mysterious process from the planet Neptune he is as free to do so as he would be to believe that Neptune itself is the ghost of a previous planetary incarnation of the world.[191]

From Proofs of a Conspiracy, Adam Weishaupt, the original founder of the Bavarian Illumanati said:

> ...no man can give any account of the Order of Free Masonry, of its origin, or its history, of its object, nor any explanation of its mysteries and symbols, which does not leave the mind in total uncertainty on all these points. Every man is entitled, therefore, to give any explanation of the symbols, and any system of the doctrines, that he can render palatable. Hence have sprung up that variety of systems which for twenty years have divided the Order.[192]

Now we proceed with more shocking information.

CHAPTER 9 - FREEMASONRY AND SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE

> My name is Neil and I experienced at least 18 years of Satanic ritual abuse by several groups of Masons. The Masons all over the country are an organization - a secret order - and part of what they do is ritually abuse children, adults, and animals. The people in my family are to blame, as well as the Masons and our society for allowing it to happen. The Masons are an organized part of society, including politicians, judges, lawyers, policemen, rabbis, priests, doctors, etc. The Masons are all are over the country, including the female chapters, which are called Eastern Star.[193]

This testimony by a SRA (Satanic Ritual Abuse) MPD (Multiple Personality Disorder) survivor should give us reason for concern about the possibility of a connection between Freemasonry and Satanic ritual abuse. What is even more compelling is the fact that this testimony is not unique. All over the United States victims are disclosing that Satanic ritual abuse is being perpetrated by Freemasons and that this type of abuse is taking place on Masonic properties.

There is now a rapidly growing awareness among therapists and Christian counter-cult ministries that high percentages of their victims have a connection with Freemasonry.

One Christian minister, has worked with about 100 SRA MPD victims and reports that 90% of his victims claim that they were abused by Masonic perpetrators and that over 50% of the actual abuse took place on Masonic properties.

A practicing psychotherapist gives the following report:

> I am a psychotherapist in private practice and treat mainly survivors of Satanic cult abuse. About half of the clients I treat report that their fathers were Masons. About half of the others report that a very close friend of the family's was a Mason. They recall going to parties and gatherings at the homes of Masons.[194]

For some time now our ministry has been involved with warning the church about the cancerous anti-Christian menace of Freemasonry. We have also been compiling a record of statements from therapists and ministers and of victims like Neil who have testified to a direct connection between FREEMASONRY and SRA (SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE). These testimonies are becoming too numerous to ignore and the study of the Masonic connection in SRA could open up new areas of understanding and prevention.

Our suspicions were first aroused that there could be a connection between Freemasonry and SRA during our involvement in the "Blue House SRA case" in Evansville, Indiana. The children in Evansville alleged that they were taken from school and subjected to Satanic abuse in a blue house. According to Rick Doninger, the leading children's advocate for the 'blue house children', all of the 'blue house children' claimed that they were abused by Masonic perpetrators. Mr. Doninger also informed us that the police who investigated the 'blue house case' also were Freemasons. No arrests resulted from the investigation.

Some people say there is no reason for unusual concern when Freemasons are accused of SRA because many ministers, teachers, day care workers, and policemen have also been accused. On the surface this argument seems to make sense but the logic is faulty. What has often come out upon closer examination is that those ministers, teachers, etc., accused of SRA have a common denominator - Freemasonry.

Much of our concern and motivation to revise our original EGYPTIAN-MASONIC-SATANIC CONNECTION book was a result of requests for information like the following from a Christian lay counselor.

> Dear David,
>
> I am a Christian lay counselor who works with women who have been sexually and ritually abused. I, and other counselors I know, have had clients report childhood sexual and ritual abuse occurring during Masonic rituals. I have begun seeking confirmation from other counselors as well as those who are exposing the Masons for written material that would confirm that this type of abuse is real.[195]

Our response to this counselor and others is, "Yes, we do believe that this abuse is real and that confirmation is coming from all parts of the country."

The following statement is from a Midwest counter-cult ministry:

> Yes, I have known many SRA's who had Masons in their family - even those who were not themselves involved in the Masonic Lodges have "Masonic programming" in some part of their system....
> I would roughly estimate about one-half the people I've worked with have some connection to Masons.[196]

The following statistics on Freemasonry and SRA are from a major book in the field of SRA by Margaret Smith.

> Historically, certain secret societies and fraternal organizations were accused of practicing a violent, sexualized mass. Survivors in this study also reported a relationship between perpetrator involvement in secret societies and the practice of ritual abuse. Sixty-seven percent of the survivors said > their ritual abuse perpetrators were members of secret societies or fraternal organizations. Thirty-three percent said perpetrating family members were Masons.[197]

These figures of Thirty-three percent SRA victims abused by Masons is staggering. What is even more alarming is the fact that many more could have had strong Masonic ties without the knowledge of the victim. And what is even more disturbing is that this figure is low compared to what we hear from many therapists and ministries.

THE FREEMASONRY - SATANISM - SATANIC RITUAL ABUSE LINKS

From our personal contact with Satanic ritual abuse survivors and the therapists and ministers who have worked with them, we have summarized the following NINE POINTS of the FREEMASONRY - SRA THEORY.

POINT #1 - THE OVERLAPPING MEMBERSHIP

An obvious connection between Masonry and the various occult groups are the many leading occultists who were Freemasons.

Aleister Crowley - Satanist - O.T.O.

Gerald Gardner - Founder of Gardnerian Witchcraft

Alex Sanders - Founder of Alexandrian Witchcraft

Wynn Westcott - Golden Dawn Founder

S. L. MacGregor Mathers - Golden Dawn Founder

Eliphas Levi - Black Magic - Artist who drew the picture of the famous Satanic Baphomet.

British Historian Nesta Webster records that even in our century the Baphomet was used in the Masonic lodge.

> "Baphomets" were preserved in the masonic lodges of Hungary, where a debased form of Masonry, known as Johannite Masonry, survives to this day.[198]

With so many Freemasons known to have been members of serious occult orders, the FREEMASONRY - SRA theory is, as we have previously stated, at least possible.

POINT #2 - OVERLAPPING THEOLOGY

The writings of Masonic authorities Manly P. Hall and Albert Pike, to name two, are appealing to members of occult orders outside of Masonry. The teaching of these men and other Masons who emphasize the universal aspect of Freemasonry and have a Kabbalistic element in their doctrine, help to forge a link between Masonry and other occult orders.

POINT #3 - THE APPEAL OF MASONIC SECRECY

The secret structure of Freemasonry where all who enter the doors of the lodge swear a death oath not to reveal Masonic secrets or conversations that have taken place in the lodge has always held great appeal to members of various occult orders. To our knowledge nothing that was ever said in a lodge has ever been used against anyone to prosecute or convict them for a crime. Even in the first degree of Freemasonry, the Entered apprentice degree, the penalty for revealing the secrets of the Lodge is a ritual murder.

> All this I most solemnly, sincerely promise and swear, with a firm and steadfast resolution to perform the same, without any mental reservation or secret evasion of mind whatever, binding myself under no less penalty than that of having my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by its roots, and my body buried in the rough sands of the sea, at low-water mark, where the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours, should I ever knowingly violate this my Entered Apprentice obligation.[199]

One of the greatest Masonic authors of all time, former Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite, Albert Pike, taught about the importance of Masonic secrecy and how the Masonic oath binds the Mason to every other Mason in the world.

> Secrecy is indispensable in a Mason of whatever Degree. It is the first and almost the only lesson taught to the Entered Apprentice. The obligations which we have each assumed toward every Mason that lives, requiring of us the performance of the most serious and onerous duties toward those personally unknown to us until they demand our aid, –duties that must be performed, even at the risk of life, or our solemn oaths be broken and violated, and we be branded as false Masons and faithless men.[200]

> Upon entering the Order, the Initiate binds to himself every Mason in the world. Once enrolled among the children of Light, every Mason on earth becomes his brother, and owes him the duties, the kindnesses, and the sympathies of a brother.[201]

Many so called Christian Ministers are a mockery to God because they have obligated themselves by a death oath to aid Satanists and Witches.

POINT #4 - THE CO-ORDINATION THEORY

Apparent co-operation between hospitals, law enforcement, politicians, schools, and other institutions have made victims' stories even harder to accept. Could there be a co-ordinating factor between these institutions enabling them to execute their crimes? If we are going to believe the testimony of SRA survivors we have to allow for such a factor, and Freemasonry could theoretically fill that role.

POINT #5 - THE RECRUITMENT POSSIBILITIES

The fact that the Masonic lodge provides a fertile field of recruitment for other occult orders is hard to deny. Freemasonry offers the possibility of inner groups forming within the lodge and operating without the knowledge of some Masons in the lodge who would disapprove of their activities. The first man who was known to have done this was Adam Weishaupt with his Bavarian Illumanati. In this quote Aleister Crowley tells how he was recruited into the O.T.O. by Theodore Reuss.

> Although I was admitted to the thirty-third and last degree of Freemasonry so long ago as 1900, it was not until the summer of 1912 that my suspicion was confirmed. I speak of my belief that behind the frivolities and convivalities of our greatest institution [Freemasonry] lay in truth a secret ineffable and miraculous, potent to control the forces of Nature, and not only to make men brethren, but make them divine. But at the time I speak of a man came to me, a man of those mysterious masters of esoteric Freemasonry who are alike its Eyes and its Brains, and who exist in its midst–unknown, often, even to its acknowledged chiefs....This man [Theodor Reuss (Frater Merlin) form whom Crowley took over the headship of the O.T.O.] had been watching my occult career for some years, and deemed me now worthy to partake in the Greater Mysteries.[202]

POINT #6 - THE COVER-UP THEORY

The oaths that all Masons swear to help one another and the many politically influential Freemasons makes the suspicion of Masons helping other Masons to cover up their crimes an obvious one. The following quote from Duncan's Masonic Ritual Monitor is a portion of the oath of the Royal Arch degree of York Rite Freemasonry. In this oath, which is just one of the many oaths that Masons swear as they move up in the lodge, the Mason obligates himself to help his fellow-Mason whether he is right or wrong and to keep all of his secrets.

> I furthermore promise and swear, that I will assist a Companion royal > Arch Mason when I see him engaged in any difficulty, and will espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, whether he be right or wrong.

> I furthermore promise and swear, that I will keep all the secrets of a Companion Royal Arch Mason (when Communicated to me as such, or I knowing them to be such), without exceptions.[203]

If a Mason tells you that the Masonic oaths are only symbolic and that he doesn't really take them serious, ask the Mason to reveal the 'secret word' that the Worshipful Master whispered in his ear upon the five points of fellowship in the Master Masons degree. The Mason cannot tell you the 'secret word' that the Worshipful Master whispered in his ear when he was symbolically raised him from the dead with the strong grip of the lions paw, BECAUSE HE HAS SWORN A DEATH OATH NOT TO DO SO. Ask the Mason to give this 'secret word' and you will quickly see how serious Masons take their death oaths. The 'secret word' is: MA-HAH-BONE.

POINT #7 - THE DEMONIC LINK

Testimonies have been given that participation in either Freemasonry or Satanism could lead to demon possession. The following statement was made by Dr. C. Fred Dickason, the chairman of the Theology Department at Moody Bible Institute at the 1993 Leadership Conference For Ministry to Masons in Knoxville, Tennessee.

> Since the early 1970's I have counseled more than 550 people who were demonically invaded and many of them were affected by Masonic Lodge backgrounds. Either ancestral lodge backgrounds or personal involvement in the Lodge.[204]

It is rapidly becoming common knowledge among Christian counselors who believe in demonic oppression and possession that participation in Freemasonry at any level can lead to oppression and even possession. Leading Christian counselor Dr. Neil T. Anderson in his book, Released From Bondage, calls on his readers to "renounce your previous or current involvement with Satanically-inspired occult practices or false religions." [205] Dr. Anderson then provides a "Non-Christian Spiritual Inventory"[206] that lists such "Satanically-inspired" practices and false religions. The Masons are on this list by Dr. Anderson as a group with which all involvement should be renounced to find freedom in Christ. Reports are also becoming widespread from deliverance ministries who are discovering the devastating effect that participation in Freemasonry can have. The following quote is from the book Demons Defeated by Bill Subritzky.

> Another form of hereditary oppression can come through the Masonic Lodge. This Lodge which worships the gods of Baal and Ashtaroth, was founded in England in 1717 as a universal religion. Jesus is not central and the oaths taken are totally contrary to the Word of God. The person whose parents have belonged to that Lodge may well find that they are under a spirit of oppression. Until they renounce the involvement of their parents or ancestors in that Lodge, forgive their parents and ancestors and command the familiar spirit of Freemasonry to depart, they will find there is an occultic influence over them. They will have difficulty in witnessing to the presence and power of God in their lives. Many well meaning Christians belong to the Freemasonry Lodge without realizing its origin and the source of oppression upon them.
> I well recall a leading member of a Christian organization who came to me because he and his wife were having some problems. The Holy Spirit quickly showed that this man had been a member of the Freemasonry Lodge approximately twenty-five years earlier, and although he had left the Lodge he had never formally severed his connections with it, and in fact still had some of the regalia in his home. Like the other persons referred to earlier, this man was a Spirit-filled, tongue-speaking Christian of high standing in a Pentecostal church. He readily agreed to renounce again all involvement with the Freemasonry Lodge and to burn the regalia. After he had made this renunciation and the deliverance ministry commenced, a demon clearly manifested itself through this man. It threw him on the floor like a snake and he slithered along the floor and up the wall of the bedroom.[207]

Christians who believe in an intelligent Devil and his Demons can easily see how he could use the system of Freemasonry to accomplish his goals.

POINT #8 - THE GENERATIONAL LINK

Many Freemasons have a tremendous compulsion for their children to continue on in the Lodge. Many people have reported tremendous pressure from their Masonic parents to join Masonic organizations. This is a definite similarity with generation Satanist and Witchcraft families. We believe the similarity is due to demonic influence. Daniel Ryder gives us the following information about transgenerational cults in his book "Breaking The Circle Of Satanic Ritual Abuse."

> Transgenerational cults are those perpetuated through family generations. They are not exclusive to satanism, but may be based on other forms of religious tradition. Children brought up in such environments often view cult activities as the norm. Power, heritage, and programming keep the transgenerational cults flourishing. Some of these cults engage in prayer ritual, mind control, sexual orgies, child sexual abuse, torture, murder/sacrifice.[208]

Alex Sanders who was a Freemason and a witch was initiated into witchcraft by his Grandmother.

> Alex Sanders said he was initiated as a witch when he was seven years old by his grandmother who was a witch. As the story goes, she had him stand nude in a circle with his head down. She took a sharp razor, cut his scrotum to make it bleed slightly, and declared him a witch. He was initiated as a third degree, and he became a black magickian.[209]

POINT #9 - DISSOCIATION

Dissociation is a defense mechanism that develops in people that experience extreme circumstances that they cannot face. A licensed Psychologist, Dr. Loreda L. Fox explains:

> Webster defines dissociation as a split in the conscious process in which a group of mental activities breaks away form the main stream of consciousness and functions as a separate unit, as if belonging to another person.
>
> We all dissociate in certain circumstances, and normal trances include such things as daydreaming, fantasizing, or mental absorption. Everyone can relate to being so engrossed in an activity that the outside world is on the periphery of awareness. An example is watching T.V. while kids are laughing and playing in the background and not even being aware of them. This is dissociation.
>
> In order to not receive certain input we have all developed the ability to tune something out. This is exactly what a person does in order to escape the reality of a harsh stimuli at the time it presents. He dissociates from it and does not experience the full impact of the experience at the time.
>
> Our bodies are made to go into shock if we are severely wounded so that we do not feel the pain. People who are shot or stabbed often say that they felt nothing at the time. Our mind also goes into shock and removes itself from traumatic awareness.
> A client told me that her brother used to describe how he would leave his body and stand and watch while his father beat him. He bragged that when he did this, the beatings did not hurt him at all, and therefore he continued to seperate from similar traumatic events. This is a simple explanation of dissociation.[210]

What is sad is that dissociation is taught to people in Satanic cults. This is so that MPD [Multiple Personality Disorder] will develop in the victim and the memories of the abuse will be hidden in one of the alter-personalities. The victims who cannot dissociate and repress the memories are usually sacrificed. Psychotherapist Wendy Hoffman explains:

> Dissociation is different for survivors of satanic cult abuse. The cult carefully teaches the art of dissociation. Its victims' lives depend on their capacity to learn it young and fast. Dissociation is a required subject taught in its school, like math or satanic writing. Moreover, the cult insists that its victims master simultaneously dissociation and not dissociating. It's easy for cult members to tell by looking at somebody whether he is dissociating. They can check on a member's dissociative skill just as easily as they can check on whether his addition is accurate.[211]

Dissociation also occurs in what the Freemasons and other occultists call initiation. The candidate dissociates and opens his mind up to demons who give him spiritual experience. The goal of occult initiation is what is called "Cosmic Consciousness" or sometimes "Christ Consciousness" where the initiate comes to the point that he believes he is God.

Read carefully how this Freemason talks about the need to dissociate in Masonic initiation and how to be a "Master" you must be able to "shut off consciousness at will". The following quote is from The Masonic Initiation by W. L. Wilmshurst.

> Nevertheless, a measure of dissociation does occur naturally in even the most healthy and well-organized people(and of cases of abnormal psychic looseness of constitution we need not speak). It occurs in sleep, when the consciousness may be vividly active, whether in an orderly or disorderly manner; people "travel" in their sleep. It occurs at times of illness or violent shock. It may be induced by alcohol or drugs; the "anesthetic revelation" is a well recognized phenomenon. Under any of these conditions there may be a complete ec-stasis, or conscious standing out or away of the Ego from the physical body. Apparitions and even action at a distance are well accredited facts. Such phenomena are explicable only upon the suppositions of the existence of a subtler vehicle than the gross body, of the fact that consciousness becomes temporarily transferred from the latter to the former, and that the two are capable of conjoint function in complete independence of the physical brain and body....
> A Master, however, is one who has outgrown the incapacities to which the undeveloped average man is subject. Unlike the latter, he is in full knowledge and control of all his parts; whether his physical body be awake or wrapped in sleep, he maintains unbroken consciousness. He is able at will to shut off consciousness of temporal affairs and apply it to supra-physical ones. He can thus function at a distance from his physical body, whether upon the mundane or upon higher planes of the cosmic ladder.... Initiation always occurs when the physical body is in a state of trance or sleep, and when the temporarily liberated consciousness has been transferred to a higher level.[212]

LET US SET THE RECORD STRAIGHT

NOT ALL FREEMASONS ARE SATANISTS and many of them would heartily oppose the Satanic activity that we have described in this book. FREEMASONRY REMAINS SUPREMELY AN ORGANIZATION THAT DECEIVES GOOD MEN! Not all Freemasons have a "god-hood experience" in initiation. In fact, most do not. Many Masons go through the rituals and give little thought to their deeper meaning. Not all Masons are bad people. Many have a high standard of morality and are concerned and caring people. If you fancy yourself such a Mason, let us say this to you: YOU ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE ACTIONS AND DOCTRINES THAT THE MASONIC LODGE PERPETRATES, YOUR HANDS ARE NOT CLEAN. YOU CANNOT REAP THE BENEFIT OF POWER AND PRESTIGE OF THE LODGE AND REMAIN ALOOF FROM THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR WHAT GOES ON THERE. It would be impossible for a true Christian to participate in even the first degree of Masonry and swear the terrible death oath and not be convicted by the Holy Spirit that what he was doing is wrong. Masonic materials can be obtained by anyone who is interested and much material has been published that exposes the true intent and purpose of the lodge. IGNORANCE IS NO EXCUSE AND A POOR DEFENSE. If you profess Christianity, you cannot justify your participation in Freemasonry because the lodge has been shown to be totally incompatible with Christianity. THERE IS NO EXCUSE - YOUR HANDS ARE NOT CLEAN.

If you are a Mason and have decided to RESIGN from the lodge, a form is provided for your convenience. If a Mason 'demits' from the organization, it means that he is in good standing and can start attending again. YOU WILL NEED TO RESIGN FROM ALL PARTS OF MASONRY, such as the Blue Lodge, the Shrine, and the Scottish Rite, etc. Renounce all ties and demonic influence from your life that you have received from the Freemasons. Plead forgiveness from God through his son Jesus Christ. Call or write us if you have questions.

> (2 Corinthians 6:17 KJV) Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

Jesus said:

> (John 12:46 KJV) I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

This study of FREEMASONRY AND SRA is still in its infancy and it is our prayer that this book will help to focus attention on this problem and open up a floodgate of new information and understanding.

If you are a victim of any kind of abuse including Masonic ritual abuse, please contact us for prayer, literature, information, or counseling advice.

The different types of SRA and Mind Control

The following blog is an excerpt from a chapter in a new book, Prayer Warrior 2, available on Amazon; it was used with permission from the author.

The term "satanic ritual abuse" (also known as "multi-perpetrator, organized abuse") can cover a wide range of groups, each with their own practices and spiritual orientation. The term "mind control" includes the manipulation of an individual through attachment needs, trauma, coercion and other means in order to perform a task or agree with the beliefs of the individuals attempting to exert control over another. Mind control can include the methods used by governmental agencies, for instance, to instill loyalty and specific skills and behaviors on cue.

Almost all occultic groups also use mind control to varying degrees to ensure silence, obedience and loyalty to the group. The distinction between "SRA" and "mind control" often blur and overlap, as many governmental agencies also include occultic rituals and elements in their programming methods.

When working with survivors, it can be helpful to have an overview of some of the major types of multi-perpetrator groups that use mind control methods. These can include: (please note that there may be individual variations within groups)

a. "Dabblers": These are often teens, or curious adults, who read literature regarding satanism or witchcraft, and who want to try it out for themselves. They may go online to learn more, and eventually will attempt to practice some of the more common rites, either alone, or will encourage others to join them. Most do not engage in the active recruiting seen in more organized groups, and are very isolated and localized unless the local get together is noticed by representatives of other groups, who may offer to come and "teach" more. The mind control in a group like this is minimal, either than the oaths and vows made to one another; and the shared guilt if an animal sacrifice is done, with a vow of silence (and threats) made to those who participate. This type of group is the one most likely to leave evidence of their activity, such as mutilated animals in a field, for others to find, since they do not have the training instilled since early childhood to perform meticulous cleanup.

b. Wicca and witchcraft covens: these are often generational, local to a county or region, and may range from white wicca groups (which may be composed of "dabblers" who are not generational) who practice casting spells for healing and "good" purposes; and black wicca groups who actively abuse members starting in childhood. In the more secretive black groups, sexual and ritual abuse are incorporated with activities that may include animal and (rarely) human sacrifice, learning spells to curse others to death; vows of silence (with traumas that can include brief burial alive, to elicit the child's promise to never tell). The black witchcraft groups are matriarchal, with an older woman who often holds a powerful position (the "crone" over the group) and will have close ties to the local community and close-knit relationships among those who are born into the group. Recruiting may be done to individuals who appear highly interested in learning, and marriages may be done to "outsiders" to strengthen the genetic pool. If the "outsider" seeks to leave the group, after a child is conceived, the outsider may be sacrificed.

c. Local satanic covens (generational): these are generational, meaning most of the members are born into the group; they may do some recruitment of outsiders, or may abduct young children to increase their numbers and bring in outside genes (to prevent in-breeding in smaller, more isolated groups). These groups are usually tied to a town, small city or rural region, and can include clans that have existed for years in mountainous regions; or the local coven that "runs" and has almost complete control of a small rural town. The mind control elements are usually mainly physical, such as beatings, whippings, sexual abuse, burial alive, etc. The children may be rented out for use by pornographers, or to be used as breeders for other national groups, for a price. In recent years, the mind control has begun to be more sophisticated, with the use of some programming technology shared by the larger, more organized groups that have representatives come in and teach how to use it. These groups are more likely than national or international groups to leave marks or evidence of the abuse in their members, such as loss of a digit or toe (marking a sacrifice given during an important ceremony), or burn marks on the back.

d. Government mind control.This include intelligence agencies from nations around the world such as Russia's SPETZ, the UK's MI-6, or Israel's Mossad, as well as the US CIA and military lab trainees. Most governmental mind control is well-funded and has an extensive research base that is ongoing; all individuals that have undergone it will have extensive profiles and data tracking to evaluate the person's reactions to the methods used. Shared characteristics include an emphasis on military training, physical strength and "survival of the fittest" setups to weed out the weak and promote the emotionally and physically strongest. These agents will be accomplished assassins, spies with photographic memories used to gather intelligence, and will have undergone extensive programming to be loyal to their country (which may be seen as a "mother" or "creation" figure within who they are bonded to), and to their primary handlers, who will be seen as a "daddy" figure regardless of actual gender. They will often be used in missions both nationally and internationally, and will have extensive mind control to not disclose information related to the national security of the nation they were programmed by; they are programmed to suicide before disclosing this type of information (which will include any information regarding how they themselves were programmed, and the techniques used). Some individuals seeking help may have been used in mind control experiments, which are used to gather data in methodology, or to create "prototypes" for the military. Governmental agencies will often track their programming methods and agents by the generation or other similar designation: Generation 1 (G1) would be the earliest generation programmed; G12 would represent the 12th generation produced using ever newer genetic and programming technologies.

e. Organized criminal groups: There are numerous national and international crime groups that are highly organized, and often use brutal mind control and trauma methods to instill loyalty, silence to outsiders and the skills required of its members. Some of the better known ones include the Italian Mafia, with similar groups in Russia, China and other countries; the Asian Triads; and other groups. These groups are often "go betweens" for the purposes of sales for those who produce child pornography (including snuff films), child trafficking, drug trafficking and gun running, and the national and international groups that may oversee their region's area of commerce. Some members of organized crime groups also belong to local or national occultic groups, so there is some overlap. The occultic practices in these groups tend to be to promote success and prosperity for their own group, rather than to curse or control others. These groups are often generational, with specific families running the group within a nation, are very closed to outsiders, and rarely recruit except (rarely) by marriage.

f. National satanic groups: In the U.S. the Brotherhood is one of the larger, more organized national groups. They have divided the U.S. into sectors, with representative groups in most major cities. These groups are generational; extremely loyal to their family members, and are programmed to lay down their life before betraying a "brother" (which will include close family members). The mind control will begin in late infancy with participation in rituals; and fairly sophisticated use of technology, such as isolation tanks, virtual reality and programming setups to instill beliefs in the young child. The members of this group will often "help out" the international groups in their city or region upon request.

g. Asian occult societies: These clans are generational, with training methods perfected over the centuries. These include the secret ninja clans of Asia, and the wealthy occultic families who in centuries past helped administer the opium trade in China and surrounding countries, among other activities (and still do, to this day). The children undergo extensive mind control starting in infancy, with training in military, herbs for healing and poisons, hand-to-hand combat and other skills. Their mind control involves sophisticated technology as well, including the use of virtual reality. Programmers from the Asian occult societies attend programming conferences with programmers from the international occult societies; some programs commonly used by the internation occult societies were actually developed by programmers from the Asian occult societies. These clans began to be involved in human experiments and mind control research around the same time that the European researchers did prior to World War II (much of this was conducted in Japan), and the exchange of information has gone on for close to a century.

h. International occultic groups: These include the 12 societies such as the Knights Templar; Opus Dei; Knights of Malta; Rosicrucians, Magnificat; Illuminati, the Knights of Jerusalem; Balepheron, and others, and the Jesuit order, which is the 13th and oversees the others. These groups are generational (they do not recruit outsiders; instead, they may purchase DNA from genetic labs to improve the strength, intelligence or other characteristics of each new generation). The mind control methods used to instill loyalty, obedience and skills required are very sophisticated, and may include VR, brain scanning, negative sound rooms, and high-tech machines used to program in specific beliefs and responses. The children raised in these groups will often have extensive military training, as well as training in the sciences (including programming methods and technologies); various languages, as well as spy and assassin training. These groups have various regions of influence accorded to them around the world (for example, the Templar Knights have been accorded most of France, and Canada; while the Illuminati have been given Germany, the Druid Council was given England, much of Russia, and large portions of the US, and the Knights of Malta have been given Switzerland). Because these groups often send their agents on missions around the world, the agents will first contact and be given permission to conduct their assignment by the leader of the group over the region they are entering. An individual raised in an international occultic group will have programming that is started in the womb, with extensive post-natal programming at specialized facilities or camps. Most children will have a primary placement and bond with their genetic family. The exception is the Jesuit order, which programs their children entirely within a facility setting the first three years of life, and then allows them to be hosted within a family setting for short periods during childhood.

Selected Bibliography on Mind Control 61

I. Introduction

One wag has dubbed the problem "Terra and the Pirates."

The pirates, ostensibly, are marauders from another solar system; their victims include a growing number of troubled human beings who insist that they've been shanghaied by these otherworldly visitors. An outlandish scenario — yet through the works of such authors as Budd Hopkins[1] and Whitley Strieber,[2] the "alien abduction" syndrome has seized the public imagination. Indeed, tales of UFO contact threaten to lapse into fashionability, even though, as I have elsewhere noted,[3] they may still inflict a formidable social price upon the claimant.

Some time ago, I began to research these claims, concentrating my studies on the social and political environment surrounding the events. As I studied, the project grew and its scope widened. Indeed, I began to feel as though I'd gone digging through familiar terrain only to unearth Gomorrah.

These excavations may have disgorged a solution.

The Problem

Among ufologists, the term "abduction" has come to refer to an infinitely-confounding experience, or matrix of experiences, shared by a dizzying number of individuals, who claim that travellers from the stars have scooped them out of their beds, or snatched them from their cars, and subjected them to interrogations, quasi-medical examinations, and "instruction" periods. Usually, these sessions are said to occur within alien spacecraft; frequently, the stories include terrifying details reminiscent of the tortures inflicted in Germany's death camps. The abductees often (though not always) lose all memory of these events; they find themselves back in their cars or beds, unable to account for hours of "missing time." Hypnosis, or some other trigger, can bring back these haunted hours in an explosion of recollection — and as the smoke clears, an abductee will often spot a trail of similar experiences, stretching all the way back to childhood.

Perhaps the oddest fact of these odd tales: Many abductees, for all their vividly-recollected agonies, claim to love their alien tormentors. That's the word I've heard repeatedly: love.

Within the community of "scientific ufologists" — those lonely, all-too little-heard advocates of a reasonable and open-minded debate on matters saucerological — these claims have elicited cautious interest and a commendable restraint from conclusion-hopping. Outside the higher realms of scientific ufology, the situation is, alas, quite different. In the popular press, in both the "straight" and sensationalist media, within that journalistic realm where issues are defined and public opinion solidified (despite a frequently superficial approach to matters of evidence and investigation) abduction scenarios have elicited two basic reactions: that of the Believer and the Skeptic.

The Believers — and here we should note that "Believers" and "abductees" are two groups whose memberships overlap but are in no way congruent — accept such stories at face value. They accept, despite the seeming absurdity of these tales, the internal contradictions, the askew logic of narrative construction, the severe discontinuity of emotional response to the actions described. The Believers believe, despite reports that their beloved "space brothers" use vile and inhuman tactics of medical examination — senseless procedures most of us (and certainly the vanguard of an advanced race) would be ashamed to inflict on an animal. The Believers believe, despite the difficulty of reconciling these unsettling tales with their own deliriums of benevolent off-worlders.

Occasionally, the rough notes of a rationalization are offered: "The aliens don't know what they are doing," we hear; or "Some aliens are bad." Yet the Believers confound their own reasoning when they insist on ascribing the wisdom of the ages and the beneficence of the angels to their beloved visitors. The aliens allegedly know enough about our society to go about their business undetected by the local authorities and the general public; they communicate with the abductees in human tongue; they concern themselves with details of the percipients' innermost lives — yet they remain so ignorant of our culture as to be unaware of the basic moral precepts concerning the dignity of the individual and the right to self-determination. Such dichotomies don't bother Believers; they are the faithful, and faith is assumed to have its mysteries. Sancta Simplicitas.

Conversely, the Skeptics dismiss these stories out of hand. They dismiss, despite the intriguing confirmatory details: the multiple witness events, the physical traces left by the ufonauts, the scars and implants left on the abductees. The skeptics scoff, though the abductees tell stories similar in detail — even certain tiny details, not known to the general public.

Philip Klass is a debunker who, through his appearances on such television programs as Nova and Nightline, has been in a position to affect much of the public debate on UFOs. In his interesting but poorly-documented work on abductions,[4] Klass claims that "abduction" is a psychological disease, spread by those who write about it. This argument exactly resembles the professional press-basher's frequent assertion that terrorism metastasizes through media exposure. Yet for all the millions of words expectorated by newsfolk on the subject of terrorism, terrorist actions remain quite rare, as any statistician (though few politicians) will admit, and verifiable linkage between crimes and their coverage remains to be found. For that matter, there have also been books — bestsellers, even — on unicorns and gnomes. People who claim to see those creatures are few. Abductees are plentiful.

Both Believer and Skeptic, in my opinion, miss the real story. Both make the same mistake: They connect the abduction phenomenon to the forty-year history of UFO sightings, and they apply their prejudices about the latter to the controversy about the former.

At first, the link seems natural. Shouldn't our thoughts about UFOs color our thoughts about UFO abductions?

No.

They may well be separate issues. Or, rather, they are connected only in this: The myth of the UFO has provided an effective cover story for an entirely different sort of mystery. Remove yourself from the Believer/Skeptic dialectic, and you will see the third alternative.

As we examine this alternative, we will, of necessity, stray far from the saucers. We must turn our face from the paranormal and concentrate on the occult — if, by "occult," we mean secret.

I posit that the abductees have been abducted. Yet they are also spewing fantasy — or, more precisely, they have been given a set of lies to repeat and believe. If my hypothesis proves true, then we must accept the following: The kidnapping is real. The fear is real. The pain is real. The instruction is real. But the little grey men from Zeti Reticuli are not real; they are constructs, Halloween masks meant to disguise the real faces of the controllers. The abductors may not be visitors from Beyond; rather, they may be a symptom of the carcinoma which blackens our body politic.

The fault lies not in our stars, but in ourselves.

The Hypothesis

Substantial evidence exists linking members of this country's intelligence community (including the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, and the Office of Naval Intelligence) with the esoteric technology of mind control. For decades, "spy-chiatrists" working behind the scenes — on college campuses, in CIA-sponsored institutes, and (most heinously) in prisons have experimented with the erasure of memory, hypnotic resistance to torture, truth serums, post-hypnotic suggestion, rapid induction of hypnosis, electronic stimulation of the brain, non-ionizing radiation, microwave induction of intracerebral "voices," and a host of even more disturbing technologies. Some of the projects exploring these areas were ARTICHOKE, BLUEBIRD, PANDORA, MKDELTA, MKSEARCH and the infamous MKULTRA.

I have read nearly every available book on these projects, as well as the relevant congressional testimony.[5] I have also spent much time in university libraries researching relevant articles, contacting other researchers (who have graciously allowed me access to their files), and conducting interviews. Moreover, I traveled to Washington, DC to review the files John Marks compiled when he wrote The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate."[6] These files include some 20,000 pages of CIA and Defense Department documents, interviews, scientific articles, letters, etc. The views presented here are the result of extensive and ongoing research.

As a result of this research, I have come to the following conclusions:

1. Although misleading (and occasionally perjured) testimony before Congress indicated that the CIA's "brainwashing" efforts met with little success,[7] striking advances were, in fact, made in this field. As CIA veteran Miles Copeland once admitted to a reporter, "The congressional subcommittee which went into this sort of thing got only the barest glimpse."[8]

2. Clandestine research into thought manipulation has not stopped, despite CIA protestations that it no longer sponsors such studies. Victor Marchetti, 14-year veteran of the CIA and author of the renown expose,

http://www.whale.to/b/cannon.html

The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence, confirmed in a 1977 interview that the mind control research continues, and that CIA claims to the contrary are a "cover story."[9]

3. The Central Intelligence Agency was not the only government agency involved in this research.[10] Indeed, many branches of our government took part in these studies — including NASA, the Atomic Energy Commission, as well as all branches of the Defense Department.

To these conclusions I would append the following — not as firmly-established historical fact, but as a working hypothesis and grounds for investigation:

4. The "UFO abduction" phenomenon might be a continuation of clandestine mind control operations.

I recognize the difficulties this thesis might present to those readers emotionally wedded to the extraterrestrial hypothesis, or to those whose political Weltanschauung disallows any such suspicions. Still, the open-minded student of abductions should consider the possibilities. Certainly, we are not being narrow-minded if we ask researchers to exhaust all terrestrial explanations before looking heavenward.

Granted, this particular explanation may, at first, seem as bizarre as the phenomenon itself. But I invite the skeptical reader to examine the work of George Estabrooks, a seminal theorist on the use of hypnosis in warfare, and a veteran of Project MKULTRA. Estabrooks once amused himself during a party by covertly hypnotizing two friends, who were led to believe that the Prime Minister of England had just arrived; Estabrooks' victims spent an hour conversing with, and even serving drinks to, the esteemed visitor.[11] For ufologists, this incident raises an inescapable question: If the Mesmeric arts can successfully evoke a non-existent Prime Minister, why can't a representative from the Pleiades be similarly induced?

But there is much more to the present day technology of mind control than mere hypnosis — and many good reasons to suspect that UFO abduction accounts are an artifact of continuing brainwashing/behavior modification experiments. Moreover, I intend to demonstrate that, by using UFO mythology as a cover story, the experimenters may have solved the major problem with the work conducted in the 1950s — "the disposal problem," i.e., the question of "What do we do with the victims?"

If, in these pages, I seem to stray from the subject of the saucers, I plead for patience. Before I attempt to link UFO abductions with mind control experiments, I must first show that this technology exists. Much of the forthcoming is an introduction to the topic of mind control — what it is, and how it works.

II. The Technology

A Brief Overview

In the early days of World War II, George Estabrooks, of Colgate University, wrote to the Department of War, describing in breathless terms the possible uses of hypnosis in warfare.[12] The Army was intrigued; Estabrooks had a job. The true history of Estabrooks' wartime collaboration with the CID, FBI[13] and other agencies may never be told: After the war, he burned his diary pages covering the years 1940-45, and thereafter avoided discussing his continuing government work with anyone, even with close members of the family.[14] Occasionally, he strongly intimated that his work involved the creation of hypno-programmed couriers and hypnotically-induced split personalities, but whether he succeeded in these areas remains a controversial point. Nevertheless, the eccentric and flamboyant Estabrooks remains a pivotal figure in the early history of clandestine behavioral research.

Which is not to say that he worked alone. World War II was the first conflict in which the human brain became a field of battle, where invading forces were led by the most notable names in psychology and pharmacology. On both sides, the war spurred furious efforts to create a "truth drug" for use in interrogating prisoners. General William "Wild Bill" Donovan, director of the OSS, tasked his crack team — including Dr. Winifred Overhulser, Dr. Edward Strecker, Harry J. Anslinger and George White — to modify human perception and behavior through chemical means; their "medicine cabinet" included scopolamine, peyote, barbiturates, mescaline, and marijuana. (This research had its amusing side: Donovan's "psychic warriors" conducted many extensive and expensive trials before deciding that the best method of administering tetrahydrocannabinol, the active ingredient in marijuana, was via the cigarette. Any jazz musician could have told them as much.)[15]

Simultaneously, the notorious Nazi doctors at Dachau experimented with mescaline as a means of eliminating the victim's will to resist. Jews, Slavs, gypsies, and other "Untermenschen" in the camp were surreptitiously slipped the drug; later, mescaline was combined with hypnosis.[16] The results of these tests were made available to the United States after the War.

In 1947, the Navy conducted the first known post-war mind control program, Project CHATTER, which continued the drug experiments. Decades later, journalists and investigators still haven't uncovered much information about this project — or, indeed, about any of the military's other excursions into this field. We know that the Army eventually founded operations THIRD CHANCE and DERBY HAT; other project names remain mysterious, though the existence of these programs is unquestionable.

The newly-formed CIA plunged into this cesspool in 1950, with Project BLUEBIRD, rechristened ARTICHOKE in 1951. To establish a "cover story" for this research, the CIA funded a propaganda effort designed to convince the world that the Communist Bloc had devised insidious new methods of re-shaping the human will; the CIA's own efforts could therefore, if exposed, be explained as an attempt to "catch up" with Soviet and Chinese work. The primary promoter of this "line" was one Edward Hunter, a CIA contract employee operating undercover as a journalist, and, later, a prominent member of the John Birch society. (Hunter was an OSS veteran of the China theatre — the same spawning grounds which produced Richard Helms, Howard Hunt, Mitch Werbell, Fred Chrisman, Paul Helliwell and a host of other noteworthies who came to dominate that strange land where the worlds of intelligence and right-wing extremism meet.[17]) Hunter offered "brainwashing" as the explanation for the numerous confessions signed by American prisoners of war during the Korean War and (generally) un-recanted upon the prisoners' repatriation. These confessions alleged that the United States used germ warfare in the Korean conflict, a claim which the American public of the time found impossible to accept. Many years later, however, investigative reporters discovered that Japan's germ warfare specialists (who had wreaked incalculable terror on the conquered Chinese during WWII) had been mustered into the American national security apparat — and that the knowledge gleaned from Japan's horrifying germ warfare experiments probably was used in Korea, just as the "brainwashed" soldiers had indicated.[18] Thus, we now know that the entire brainwashing scare of the 1950s constituted a CIA hoax perpetrated upon the American public: CIA deputy director Richard Helms admitted as much when, in 1963, he told the Warren Commission that Soviet mind control research consistently lagged years behind American efforts.[19]

When the CIA's mind control program was transferred from the Office of Security to the Technical Services Staff (TSS) in 1953, the name changed again — to MKULTRA.[20] Many consider this wide-ranging "octopus" project — whose tentacles twined through the corridors of numerous universities and around the necks of an army of scientists — the most ominous operation in CIA's catalogue of atrocity. Through MKULTRA, the Agency created an umbrella program of a positively Joycean scope, designed to ferret out all possible means of invading what George Orwell once called "the space between our ears" (Later still, in 1962, mind control research was transferred to the Office of Research and Development; project cryptonyms remain unrevealed.[21])

What was studied? Everything — including hypnosis, conditioning, sensory deprivation, drugs, religious cults, microwaves, psycho-surgery, brain implants, and even ESP. When MKULTRA "leaked" to the public during the great CIA investigations of the 1970s, public attention focused most heavily on drug experimentation and the work with ESP.[22] Mystery still shrouds another area of study, the area which seems to have most interested ORD: psychoelectronics. This research may prove key to our understanding of the UFO abduction phenomenon.

Implants

Perhaps the most interesting pieces of evidence surrounding the abduction phenomenon are the intracerebral implants allegedly visible in the X-rays and MRI scans of many abductees.[23] Indeed, abductees often describe operations in which needles are inserted into the brain; more frequently still, they report implantation of foreign objects through the sinus cavities. Many abduction specialists assume that these intracranial incursions must be the handiwork of scientists from the stars. Unfortunately, these researchers have failed to familiarize themselves with certain little-heralded advances in terrestrial technology.

The abductees' implants strongly suggest a technological lineage which can be traced to a device known as a "stimoceiver," invented in the late '50s-early '60s by a neuroscientist named Jose Delgado. The stimoceiver is a miniature depth electrode which can receive and transmit electronic signals over FM radio waves. By stimulating a correctly-positioned stimoceiver, an outside operator can wield a surprising degree of control over the subject's responses.

The most famous example of the stimoceiver in action occurred in a Madrid bull ring. Delgado "wired" the bull before stepping into the ring, entirely unprotected. Furious for gore, the bull charged toward the doctor — then stopped, just before reaching him. The technician-turned-toreador had halted the animal by simply pushing a button on a black box, held in the hand.[24]

Delgado's Physical Control of the Mind: Toward a Psychocivilized Society[25] remains the sole, full-length, popularly-written work on intracerebral implants and electronic stimulation of the brain (ESB). (The book's ominous title and unconvincing philosophical rationales for mass mind control prompted an unfavorable public reaction — which may have deterred other researchers from publishing on this theme for a general audience.) While subsequent work has long since superceded the techniques described in this book, Delgado's achievements were seminal. His animal and human experiments clearly demonstrate that the experimenter can electronically induce emotions and behavior: Under certain conditions, the extremes of temperament — rage, lust, fatigue, etc. — can be elicited by an outside operator as easily as an organist might call forth a C-major chord.

Delgado writes: "Radio stimulation of different points in the amygdala and hippocampus in the four patients produced a variety of effects, including pleasant sensations, elation, deep, thoughtful concentration, odd feelings, super relaxation, colored visions, and other responses."[26] The evocative phrase "colored vision" clearly indicates remotely-induced hallucination; we will detail later how these hallucinations may be "controlled" by an outside operator.

Speaking in 1966 — and reflecting research undertaken years previous — Delgado asserted that his experiments "support the distasteful conclusion that motion, emotion, and behavior can be directed by electrical forces and that humans can be controlled like robots by push buttons."[27] He even prophesied a day when brain control could be turned over to non-human operators, by establishing two-way radio communication between the implanted brain and a computer.[28]

Of one experimental subject, Delgado notes that "the patient expressed the successive sensations of fainting, fright and floating around. These 'floating' feelings were repeatedly evoked on different days by stimulation of the same point..."[29] Ufologists may recognize the similarity of this sequence of events to abductee reports of the opening minutes of their experiences.[30] Under subsequent hypnosis, the abductee could be instructed to misremember the cause of this floating sensation.

In a fascinating series of experiments, Delgado attached the stimoceiver to the tympanic membrane, thereby transforming the ear into a sort of microphone. An assistant would whisper "How are you?" into the ear of a suitably "fixed" cat, and Delgado could hear the words over a loudspeaker in the next room. The application of this technology to the spy trade should be readily apparent. According to Victor Marchetti, The Agency once attempted a highly-sophisticated extension of this basic idea, in which radio implants were attached to a cat's cochlea, to facilitate the pinpointing of specific conversations, freed from extraneous surrounding noises.[31] Such "advances" exacerbate the already-imposing level of Twentieth-Century paranoia: Not only can our phones be tapped and mail checked, but even Tabby may be spying on us!

Yet the ramifications of this technology may go even deeper than Marchetti indicates. I presume that if a suitably-wired subject's inner ear can be made into a microphone, it can also be made into a loudspeaker — one possible explanation for the "voices" heard by abductees.[32] Indeed, I have personally viewed a strange, opalescent implant within the ear canal of an abductee. I see no reason to ascribe this device to alien intrusion — more than likely, the "intruders" in this case were the technological inheritors of the Delgado legacy. Indeed, not many years after Delgado's experiments with the cat, Ralph Schwitzgebel devised a "bug-in-the-ear" via which a therapist — odd term, under the circumstances — can communicate with his subject.[33]

Subsequent Electrode Implant Research

Other researchers have made notable contributions to this field.

Robert G. Heath, of Tulane University, who has implanted as many as 125 electrodes in his subjects, achieved his greatest notoriety by attempting to "cure" homosexuality through ESB. In his experiments, he discovered that he could control his patients' memory, (a feat which, applied in the ufological context, may account for the phenomenon of "missing time"); he could also induce sexual arousal, fear, pleasure, and hallucinations.[34]

Heath and another researcher, James Olds,[35] have independently illustrated that areas of the brain in and near the hypothalamus have, when electronically stimulated, what has been described as "rewarding" and "aversive" effects. Both animals and men, when given the means to induce their own ESB of the brain's pleasure centers, will stimulate themselves at a tremendous rate, ignoring such basic drives as hunger and thirst.[36] (Using fixed electrodes of his own invention, John C. Lilly had accomplished similar effects in the early 1950s.[37]) Anyone who has studied the abduction phenomenon will find himself on familiar territory here, for the abductee accounts are replete with stories of bewildering and inappropriate sexual response countered by extremely painful stimuli — operant conditioning, at its most extreme, and most insidious, for here we see a form of conditioning in which the manipulator renders himself invisible. Indeed, B.F. Skinner-esque aversive therapy, remotely applied, was Heath's prescription for "healing" homosexuality.[38]

Ralph Schwitzgebel and his brother Robert have produced a panoply of devices for tracking individuals over long ranges; they may be considered the creators of the "electronic house arrest" devices recently approved by the courts.[39] Schwitzgebel devices could be used for tracking all the physical and neurological signs of a "patient" within a quarter of a mile,[40] thereby lifting the distance limitations which restricted Delgado.

In Ralph Schwitzgebel's initial work, application of this technology to ESB seems to have been limited to cumbersome brain implants with protruding wires. But the technology was soon miniaturized, and a scheme was proposed whereby radio receivers would be mounted on utility poles throughout a given city, thereby providing 24-hour-a-day monitoring capability.[41] Like Heath, Schwitzgebel was much exercised about homosexuality and the use of intracranial devices to combat sexual deviation. But he has also spoken ominously about applying his devices to "socially troublesome persons"...which, of course, could mean anyone.[42]

Bryan Robinson, of the Yerkes primate laboratory has conducted fascinating simian research on the use of remote ESB in a social context. He could cause mothers to ignore their offspring, despite the babies' cries. He could turn submission into dominance, and vice-versa.[43]

Perhaps the most disturbing wanderer in this mind-field is Joseph A. Meyer, of the National Security Agency, the most formidable and secretive component of America's national security complex. Meyer has proposed implanting roughly half of all Americans arrested — not necessarily convicted — of any crime; the numbers of "subscribers" (his euphemism) would run into the tens of millions. "Subscribers" could be monitored continually by computer wherever they went. Meyer, who has carefully worked out the economics of his mass-implantation system, asserts that taxpayer liability should be reduced by forcing subscribers to "rent" the implant from the State. Implants are cheaper and more efficient than police, Meyer suggests, since the call to crime is relentless for the poor "urban dweller" — who, this spook-scientist admits in a surprisingly candid aside, is fundamentally unnecessary to a post-industrial economy. "Urban dweller" may be another of Meyer's euphemisms: He uses New York's Harlem as his model community in working out the details of his mind-management system.[44]

Abductee Implants

If we are to take seriously abductee accounts of brain implants, we must consider the possibility that the implanters, properly perceived, don't look much like the "greys" pictured on Strieber's dustjackets. Instead, the visitors may resemble Dr. Meyer and his brethren. We would thus have an explanation for both the reports of abductee brain implants and, as we shall see, the "scoop marks" and other scars visible on other parts of the abductees' bodies. We would also have an explanation for the reports of individuals suffering personality change after contact with the UFO phenomenon.

Skeptics might counter that the time factor of UFO abductions disallows this possibility. If estimates of "missing time" are correct, the abductions rarely take longer than one-to-three hours. Wouldn't a brain surgeon, operating under less-than-ideal conditions (perhaps in a mobile unit) need more time?

No — not if we accept the claims of a Florida doctor named Daniel Man. He recently proposed a draconian solution to the overblown "missing children problem," by suggesting a program wherein America's youngsters would be implanted with tiny transmitters in order to track the children continuously. Man brags that the operation can be done right in the office — and would take less than 20 minutes.[45]

Conceivably, it might take a tad longer in the field.

A Question of Timing

The history of brain implantation, as gleaned from the open literature, is certainly disquieting. Yet this history has almost certainly been censored, and the dates manipulated in a nigh-Orwellian fashion. When dealing with research funded by the engines of national security, one can never know the true origin date of any individual scientific advance. However, if we listen carefully to the scientists who have pioneered this research, we may hear whispers, faint but unmistakable, hinting that remotely-applied ESB originated earlier than published studies would indicate.

In his autobiography The Scientist, John C. Lilly (who would later achieve a cultish renown for his work with dolphins, drugs and sensory deprivation) records a conversation he had with the director of the National Institute of Mental Health — in 1953. The director asked Lilly to brief the CIA, FBI, NSA and the various military intelligence services on his work using electrodes to stimulate directly the pleasure and pain centers of the brain. Lilly refused, noting, in his reply:

Dr. Antoine Remond, using our techniques in Paris, has demonstrated that this method of stimulation of the brain can be applied to the human without the help of the neurosurgeon; he is doing it in his office in Paris without neurosurgical supervision. This means that anybody with the proper apparatus can carry this out on a person covertly, with no external signs that electrodes have been used on that person. I feel that if this technique got into the hands of a secret agency, they would have total control over a human being and be able to change his beliefs extremely quickly, leaving little evidence of what they had done.[46]

Lilly's assertion of the moral high ground here is interesting. Despite his avowed phobia against secrecy, a careful reading of The Scientist reveals that he continued to do work useful to this country's national security apparatus. His sensory deprivation experiments expanded upon the work of ARTICHOKE's Maitland Baldwin, and even his dolphin research has — perhaps inadvertently proved useful in naval warfare.[47] One should note that Lilly's work on monkeys carried a "secret" classification, and that NIMH was a common CIA funding conduit.[48]

But the most important aspect of Lilly's statement is its date. 1953? How far back does radio-controlled ESB go? Alas, I have not yet seen Remond's work — if it is available in the open literature. In the documents made available to Marks, the earliest reference to remotely-applied ESB is a 1959 financial document pertaining to MKULTRA subproject 94. The general subproject descriptions sent to the CIA's financial department rarely contain much information, and rarely change from year to year, leaving us little idea as to when this subproject began.

Unfortunately, even the Freedom of Information Act couldn't pry loose much information on electronic mind control techniques, though we know a great deal of study was done in these areas. We have, for example, only four pages on subproject 94 — by comparison, a veritable flood of documents were released on the use of drugs in mind control. (Whenever an author tells us that MKULTRA met with little success, the reference is to drug testing.) On this point, I must criticize John Marks: His book never mentions that roughly 20-25 percent of the MKULTRA subprojects are “dark” — i.e., little or no information was ever made available, despite lawyers and FOIA requests. Marks seems to feel that the only information worth having is the information he received. We know, however, that research into psychoelectronics was extensive; indeed, statements of project goals dating from ARTICHOKE and BLUEBIRD days clearly identify this area as a high priority. Marks’ anonymous informant, jocularly named “Deep Trance,” even told a previous interviewer that, beginning in 1963, the CIA and military’s mind control efforts strongly emphasized electronics.[49] I therefore assume — not rashly, I hope — that the “dark” MKULTRA subprojects concerned matters such as brain implants, microwaves, ESB, and related technologies.

I make an issue of the timing and secrecy involved in this research to underscore three points: 1. We can never know with certainty the true origin dates of the various brainwashing methods — often, we discover that techniques which seem impossibly futuristic actually originated in the 19th century. (Pioneering ESB research was conducted in 1898, by J.R. Ewald, professor of physiology at Straussbourg.[50]) 2. The open literature almost certainly gives a bowdlerized view of the actual research. 3. Lavishly-funded clandestine researchers — unrestrained by peer review or the need for strict controls — can achieve far more rapid progress than scientists on “the outside.”

Potential critics should keep these points in mind should they attempt to invalidate the “mind control” thesis of UFO abductions by citing an abduction account which antedates Delgado.

The Quandary

We have amply demonstrated, then, that as far back as the 1960s — and possibly earlier still — scientists have had the capability to create implants similar to those now purportedly visible in abductee MRI scans. Indeed, we have no notion just how advanced this technology has become, since the popular press stopped reporting on brain implantation in the 1970s. The research has no doubt continued, albeit in a less public fashion. In fact, scientists such as Delgado have cast their eye far beyond the implants; ESB effects can now be elicited with microwaves and other forms of electromagnetic radiation, used with and without electrodes.

So why — if we take UFO abduction accounts at face value — are the “advanced aliens” using an old technology, an Earth technology, a technology which may soon be rendered obsolescent, if it hasn’t been so rendered already? I am reminded of the charming anachronisms in the old Flash Gordon serials, where swords and spaceships clashed continually.

Do they also watch black-and-white television on Zeta Reticuli?

Remote Hypnosis

Hypnosis provides the (highly controversial) key which opens the door to many abduction accounts.[51] And obviously, if my thesis is correct, hypnosis plays a large part in the abduction itself. One thing we know with certainty: Since the earliest days of project BLUEBIRD, the CIA’s spy-chiatrists spent enormous sums mastering Mesmer’s art.

I cannot here give even a brief summary of hypnosis, nor even of the CIA’s studies in this area. (Fortunately, FOIA requests were rather more successful in shaking loose information on this topic than in the area of psychoelectronics.) Here, we will concentrate on a particularly intriguing allegation — one heard faintly, but persistently, for the past twenty years by those who would investigate the shadow side of politics.

If this allegation proves true, hypnosis is not necessarily a person-to-person affair.

The abductee — or the mind control victim — need not have physical contact with a hypnotist for hypnotic suggestion to take effect; trance could be induced, and suggestions made, via the intracerebral transmitters described above. The concept sounds like something out of Huxley’s or Orwell’s most masochistic fantasies. Yet remote hypnosis was first reported — using allegedly parapsychological means — in the early 1930s, by L.L. Vasiliev, Professor of Physiology in the University of Leningrad.[52] Later, other scientists attempted to accomplish the same goal, using less mystic means.

Over the years, certain journalists have asserted that the CIA has mastered a technology call RHIC-EDOM. RHIC means “Radio Hypnotic Intracerebral Control.” EDOM stands for “Electronic Dissolution of Memory.” Together, these techniques can — allegedly — remotely induce hypnotic trance, deliver suggestions to the subject, and erase all memory for both the instruction period and the act which the subject is asked to perform.

RHIC uses the stimoceiver, or a microminiaturized offspring of that technology to induce a hypnotic state. Interestingly, this technique is also reputed to involve the use of intramuscular implants, a detail strikingly reminiscent of the “scars” mentioned in Budd Hopkin’s Missing Time. Apparently, these implants are stimulated to induce a post-hypnotic suggestion.

EDOM is nothing more than “missing time” itself — the erasure of memory from consciousness through the blockage of synaptic transmission in certain areas of the brain. By jamming the brain’s synapses through a surfeit of acetylcholine, neural transmission along selected pathways can be effectively stilled. According to the proponents of RHIC-EDOM, acetylcholine production can be affected by electromagnetic means. (Modern research in the psycho-physiological effects of microwaves confirm this proposition.)

Does RHIC-EDOM exist? In our discussion of Delgado’s work, I have already cited a strange little book (published in 1969) titled Were We Controlled?, written by one Lincoln Lawrence, a former FBI agent turned journalist. (The name is a pseudonym; I know his real identity.) This work deals at length with RHIC-EDOM; a careful comparison of Lawrence’s work with MKULTRA files declassified ten years later indicates a strong possibility that the writer did indeed have “inside” sources.

Here is how Lawrence describes RHIC in action:

It is the ultra-sophisticated application of post-hypnotic suggestion triggered at will [italics in original] by radio transmission. It is a recurring hypnotic state, re-induced automatically at intervals by the same radio control. An individual is brought under hypnosis. This can be done either with his knowledge — or without it by use of narco-hypnosis, which can be brought into play under many guises. He is then programmed to perform certain actions and maintain certain attitudes upon radio signal.[53]

Other authors have mentioned this technique — specifically Walter Bowart (in his book Operation Mind Control) and journalist James Moore, who, in a 1975 issue of a periodical called Modern People, claimed to have secured a 350-page manual, prepared in 1963, on RHIC-EDOM.[54] He received the manual from CIA sources, although — interestingly — the technique is said to have originated in the military.

The following quote by Moore on RHIC should prove especially intriguing to abduction researchers who have confronted odd “personality shifts” in abductees:

Medically, these radio signals are directed to certain parts of the brain. When a part of your brain receives a tiny electrical impulse from outside sources, such as vision, hearing, etc., an emotion is produced — anger at the sight of a gang of boys beating an old woman, for example. The same emotion of anger can be created by artificial radio signals sent to your brain by a controller. You could instantly feel the same white-hot anger without any apparent reason.[55]

Lawrence’s sources imparted an even more tantalizing — and frightening — revelation:

...there is already in use a small EDOM generator-transmitter which can be concealed on the body of the person. Contact with this person — a casual handshake or even just a touch — transmits a tiny electronic charge plus an ultra-sonic signal tone which for a short while will disturb the time orientation of the person affected. [56]

If RHIC-EDOM exists, it goes a long way toward providing an earthbound rationale for alien abductions — or, at least, certain aspects of them. The phenomenon of “missing time” is no longer mysterious. Abductee implants, both intracerebral and otherwise, are explained. And note the reference to a “recurring hypnotic state, re-induced automatically by the same radio command.” This situation may account for “repeater” abductees who, after their initial encounter, have regular sessions of “missing time” and abduction — even while a bed-mate sleeps undisturbed.

At present, I cannot claim conclusively that RHIC-EDOM is real. To my knowledge, the only official questioning of a CIA representative concerning these techniques occurred in 1977, during Senate hearings on CIA drug testing. Senator Richard Schweicker had the following interchange with Dr. Sidney Gottlieb, an important MKULTRA administrator:

Schweicker: Some of the projects under MKULTRA involved hypnosis, is that correct?

Gottlieb: Yes.

Schweicker: Did any of these projects involve something called radio hypnotic intracerebral control, which is a combination, as I understand it, in layman's terms, of radio transmissions and hypnosis.

Gottlieb: My answer is "No."

Schweicker: None whatsoever?

Gottlieb: Well, I am trying to be responsive to the terms that you used. As I remember it, there was a current interest, running interest, all the time in what affects people's standing in the field of radio energy have, and it could easily have been that somewhere in many projects, someone was trying to see if you could hypnotize someone easier if he was standing in a radio beam. That would seem like a reasonable piece of research to do.

Schweicker went on to mention that he had heard testimony that radar (i.e., microwaves) had been used to wipe out memory in animals; Gottlieb responded, "I can believe that, Senator."[57]

Gottlieb's blandishments do not comfort much. For one thing, the good doctor did not always provide thoroughly candid testimony. (During the same hearing he averred that 99 percent on the CIA's research had been openly published; if so, why are so many MKULTRA subprojects still "dark," and why does the Agency still go to great lengths to protect the identities of its scientists?[58]) We should also recognize that the CIA's operations are compartmentalized on a "need-to-know" basis; Gottlieb may not have had access to the information requested by Schweicker. Note that the MKULTRA rubric circumscribed Gottlieb's statement: RHIC-EDOM might have been the focus of another program. (There were several others: MKNAOMI, MKACTION, MKSEARCH, etc.) Also keep in mind the revelation by "Deep Trance" that the CIA concentrated on psychoelectronics after the termination of MKULTRA in 1963. Most significantly: RHIC-EDOM is described by both Lawrence and Moore as a product of military research; Gottlieb spoke only of matters pertaining to CIA. He may thus have spoken truthfully — at least in a strictly technical sense — while still misleading the Congressional interlocutors.

Personally, I believe that the RHIC-EDOM story deserves a great deal of further research. I find it significant that when Dr. Petter Lindstrom examined X-rays of Robert Naesland, a Swedish victim of brain-implantation, the doctor authoritatively cited Were We Controlled? in his letter of response.[59] This is the same Dr. Lindstrom noted for his pioneering use of ultrasonics in neurosurgery.[60] Lincoln Lawrence's book has received a strong endorsement indeed.

Bowart's Operation Mind Control contains a significant interview with an intelligence agent knowledgeable in these areas. Granted, the reader has every right to adopt a skeptical attitude toward information culled from anonymous sources; still, one should note that this operative's statements confirm, in pertinent part, Lincoln Lawrence's thesis.[61]

Most importantly: The open literature on brain-wave entrainment and the behavioral effects of electromagnetic radiation substantiates much of the RHIC-EDOM story — as we shall see.

That's Entrainment

Robert Anton Wilson, an author with a devoted cult following, recently has taken to promoting a new generation of "mind machines" designed to promote creativity, stimulate learning, and alter consciousness — i.e., provide a drug-less high. Interestingly, these machines can also induce "Out-of-Body-Experiences," in which the percipient mentally "travels" to another location while his body remains at rest.[62] This rapidly-developing technology has spawned a technological equivalent to the drug culture; indeed, the aficionados of the electronic buzz even have their own magazine, Reality Hackers. I strongly suspect that we will hear much of these machines in the future.

One such device is called the “hemi-synch.” This headphone-like invention produces slightly different frequencies in each ear; the brain calculates the difference between these frequencies, resulting in a rhythm known as the “binaural beat.” The brain “entrains” itself to this beat — that is, the subject’s EEG slows down or speeds up to keep pace with its electronic running partner.[63]

The brain has a “beat” of its own.

This rhythm was first discovered in 1924 by the German psychiatrist Hans Berger, who recorded cerebral voltages as part of a telepathy study.[64] He noted two distinct frequencies: alpha (8-13 cycles per second), associated with a relaxed, alert state, and beta (14-30 cycles per second), produced during states of agitation and intense mental concentration. Later, other rhythms were noted, which are particularly important for our present purposes: theta (4-7 cycles per second), a hypnogogic state, and delta (.5 to 3.5 cycles per second), generally found in sleeping subjects.[65]

The hemi-synch — and related mind-machines — can produce alpha or theta waves, on demand, according to the operator’s wishes. A suitably-entrained brain is much more responsive to suggestion, and is even likely to experience vivid hallucinations.

I have spoken to several UFO abductees who describe a “stereophonic sound” effect — exactly similar to that produced by the hemi-synch — preceding many “encounters.” Of course, one usually administers the hemi-synch via headphones, but I see no reason why the effect cannot be transmitted via the above-described stimoceiver. Again, I remind the reader of the abductee with an implant just inside her ear canal.

There’s more than one way to entrain a brain. Michael Hutchison’s excellent book Mega Brain details the author’s personal experiences with many such devices — the Alpha-stim, TENS, the Synchro-energizer, Tranquilite, etc. He recounts dazzling, Dali-esque hallucinations, as a result of using this mind-expanding technology; moreover, he offers a seductive argument that these devices may represent a true breakthrough in consciousness-control, thereby fulfilling the dashed dream of the hallucinogenic ’60s.

I wish to avoid a knee-jerk Luddite response to these fascinating wonder-boxes. At the same time, I recognize the dangers involved. What about the possibility of an outside operator literally “changing our minds” by altering our brainwaves without our knowledge or permission? If these machines can induce a hypnotic state, what’s to stop a skilled hypnotist from making use of this state?

Granted, most of these devices require some physical interaction with the subject. But a tool called the Bio-Pacer can, according to its manufacturer, produce a number of mood altering frequencies — without attachment to the subject. Indeed, the Bio-Pacer III (a high-powered version) can affect an entire room. This device costs $275, according to the most recent price sheet available.[66] What sort of machine might $27,500 buy? Or $275,000? What effects, what ranges might a million-dollar machine be capable of?

The military certainly has that sort of money.

And they’re certainly interested in this sort of technology, according to Michael Hutchison. His interview with an informant named Joseph Light elicited some particularly provocative revelations. According to Light:

There are important elements in the scientific community, powerful people, who are very much interested in these areas...but they have to keep most of their work secret. Because as soon as they start to publish some of these sensitive things, they have problems in their lives. You see, they work on research grants, and if you follow the research being done, you find that as soon as these scientists publish something about this, their research funds are cut off. There are areas in bioelectric research where very simple techniques and devices can have mind-boggling effects. Conceivably, if you have a crazed person with a bit of a technical background, he can do a lot of damage.[67]

http://www.whale.to/b/cannon.html

This last statement is particularly evocative. In 1984, a violent neo-Nazi group called The Order (responsible for the murder of talk-show host Alan Berg) established contact with two government scientists engaged in clandestine research to project chemical imbalances and render targeted individuals docile via certain frequencies of electronic waves. For $100,000 the scientists were willing to deliver this information.[68]

Thus, at least one group of crazed individuals almost got the goods.

Wave Your Brain Goodbye

Every Senator and Congressional representative has a "wavie" file. So do many state representatives. Wavies have even pled their case to private institutions such as the Christic Institute.[69]

And who are the wavies?

They claim to be victims of clandestine bombardment with non-ionizing radiation — or microwaves. They report sudden changes in psychological states, alteration of sleep patterns, intracerebral voices and other sounds, and physiological effects. Most people never realize how many wavies there are in this country. I've spoken to a number of wavies myself.

Are these troubled individuals seeking an exterior rationale for their mental problems? Maybe. Indeed, I'm sure that such is the case in many instances. But the fact is that the literature on the behavioral effects of microwaves, extra-low-frequencies (ELF) and ultra-sonics is such that we cannot blithely dismiss all such claims.

For decades, American science and industry tried to convince the population that microwaves could have no adverse effects on human beings at sub-thermal levels — in other words, the attitude was, "If it can't burn you, it can't hurt you." This approach became increasingly difficult to defend as reports mounted of microwave-induced physiological effects. Technicians described "hearing" certain radar installations; users of radar telescopes began developing cataracts at an appallingly high rate.[70] The Soviets had long recognized the strange and sometimes subtle effects of these radio frequencies, which is why their exposure standards have always been much stricter.

Soviet microwave bombardment of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow prompted the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency's Project PANDORA (later renamed), whose ostensible goal was to determine whether these pulsations (reportedly 10 cycles per second, which puts them in the alpha range) could be used for the purposes of mind control. I suspect that the "war on Tchaikovsky Street," as I call it,[71] was used, at least in part, as a cover story for DARPA mind control research, and that the stories floated in the news (via, for example, Jack Anderson's column) about Soviet remote brainwashing served the same propaganda purposes as did the bleatings of Edward Hunter during the 1950s.[72]

What can low-level microwaves do to the mind?

According to a DIA report released under the Freedom of Information Act,[73] microwaves can induce metabolic changes, alter brain functions, and disrupt behavior patterns. PANDORA discovered that pulsed microwaves can create leaks in the blood/brain barrier, induce heart seizures, and create behavioral disorganization.[74] In 1970, a RAND Corporation scientist reported that microwaves could be used to promote insomnia, fatigue, irritability, memory loss, and hallucinations.[75]

Perhaps the most significant work in this area has been produced by Dr. W. Ross Adey at the University of Southern California. He determined that behavior and emotional states can be altered without electrodes — simply by placing the subject in an electromagnetic field. By directing a carrier frequency to stimulate the brain and using amplitude modulation to "shape" the wave into a mimicry of a desired EEG frequency, he was able to impose a 4.5 cps theta rhythm on his subjects — a frequency which he previously measured in the hippocampus during avoidance learning. Thus, he could externally condition the mind towards an aversive reaction.[76] (Adey has also done extensive work on the use of electrodes in animals.[77]) According to another prominent microwave scientist, Allen Frey, other frequencies could — in animal studies — induce docility.[78]

The controversial researcher Andrijah Puharich asserts that “a weak (1 mW) 4 Hz magnetic sine wave will modify human brain waves in 6 to 10 seconds. The psychological effects of a 4 Hz sine magnetic wave are negative — causing dizziness, nausea, headache, and can lead to vomiting.” Conversely, an 8 Hz magnetic sine wave has beneficial effects.[79] Though some writers question Puharich’s integrity (perhaps correctly, considering his involvement in the confused tale of Uri Geller), his claims here seem in line with the findings of less-flamboyant experimenters.

As investigative journalist Anne Keeler writes:

Specific frequencies at low intensities can predictably influence sensory processes... pleasantness-unpleasantness, strain-relaxation, and excitement-quiescence can be created with the fields. Negative feelings and avoidance are strong biological phenomena and relate to survival. Feelings are the true basis of much “decision-making” and often occur as subthreshold impressions... Ideas including names [my italics] can be synchronized with the feelings that the fields induce.[80]

Adey and compatriots have compiled an entire library of frequencies and pulsation rates which can affect the mind and nervous system. Some of these effects can be extremely bizarre. For example, engineer Tom Jarski, in an attempt to replicate the seminal work of F. Cazamalli, found that a particular frequency caused a ringing sensation in the ears of his subjects — who felt strangely compelled to bite the experimenters![81] On the other hand, the diet-conscious may be intrigued by the finding that rats exposed to ELF (extra-low-frequency) waves failed to gain weight normally.[82]

For our present purposes, the most significant electromagnetic research findings concern microwave signals modulated by hypnoidal EEG frequencies. Microwaves can act much like the “hemi-synch” device previously described — that is, they can entrain the brain to theta rhythms.[83] I need not emphasize the implications of remotely synchronizing the brain to resonate at a frequency conducive to sleep, or to hypnosis.

Trance may be remotely induced — but can it be directed? Yes. Recall the intracerebral voices mentioned earlier in our discussion of Delgado. The same effect can be produced by “the wave.” Frey demonstrated in the early 1960s that microwaves could produce booming, hissing, buzzing, and other intracerebral static (this phenomenon is now called “the Frey effect”); in 1973, Dr. Joseph Sharp, of the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research, expanded on Frey’s work in an experiment where the subject — in this case, Sharp himself — “heard” and understood spoken words delivered via a pulsed-microwave analog of the speaker’s sound vibrations.[84]

Dr. Robert Becker comments that “Such a device has obvious applications in covert operations designed to drive a target crazy with ‘voices’ or deliver undetectable instructions to a programmed assassin.”[85] In other words, we now have, at the push of a button, the technology either to inflict an electronic Gaslight — or to create a true Manchurian Candidate. Indeed, the former capability could effectively disguise the latter. Who will listen to the victims, when the electronically-induced hallucinations they recount exactly parallel the classical signals of paranoid schizophrenia and/or temporal lobe epilepsy?

Perhaps the most ominous revelations, however, concern the mysterious work of J.F. Schapitz, who in 1974 filed a plan to explore the interaction of radio frequencies and hypnosis. He proposed the following:

In this investigation it will be shown that the spoken word of the hypnotist may be conveyed by modulated electromagnetic energy directly into the subconscious parts of the human brain [my italics] — i.e., without employing any technical devices for receiving or transcoding the messages and without the person exposed to such influence having a chance to control the information input consciously.

He outlined an experiment, innocent in its immediate effects yet chilling in its implications, whereby subjects would be implanted with the subconscious suggestion to leave the lab and buy a particular item; this action would be triggered by a certain cue word or action. Schapitz felt certain that the subjects would rationalize the behavior — in other words, the subject would seize upon any excuse, however thin, to chalk up his actions to the working of free will.[86] His instincts on this latter point coalesce perfectly with findings of professional hypnotists.[87]

Schapitz's work was funded by the Department of Defense. Despite FOIA requests, the results have never been publicly revealed.[88]

Final Thoughts on "The Wave"

I must again offer a caveat about possible disparities between the "official" record of electromagnetism's psychological effects and the hidden history. Once more, we face a question of timing. How long ago did this research really begin?

In the early years of this century, Nikola Tesla seems to have stumbled upon certain of the behavioral effects of electromagnetic exposure.[89] Cazamalli, mentioned earlier, conducted his studies in the 1930s. In 1934, E.L. Chaffe and R.U. Light published a paper on "A Method for the Remote Control of Electrical Stimulation of the Nervous System."[90] From the very beginning of their work with microwaves, the Soviets explored the more subtle physiological effects of electromagnetism — and despite the bleatings of certain right-wing alarmists[91] that an "electromagnetic gap" separates us from Soviet advances, East European literature in this area has been closely monitored for decades by the West. ARTICHOKE/BLUEBIRD project outlines, dating from the early 1950s, prominently mention the need to explore all possible uses of the electromagnetic spectrum.

Another point worth mentioning concerns the combination of EMR and miniature brain electrodes. The father of the stimoceiver, Dr. J.M.R. Delgado, has recently conducted experiments in which monkeys are exposed to electromagnetic fields, thereby eliciting a wide range of behavioral effects — one monkey might fly into a volcanic rage while, just a few feet away, his simian partner begins to nod off. Fascinatingly, when monkeys with brain implants felt "the wave," the effects were greatly intensified. Apparently, these tiny electrodes can act as an amplifier of the electromagnetic effect.[92]

This last point is important to our "alien abduction" thesis. Critics might counter that any burst of microwave energy powerful enough to have truly remote effects would probably also create a thermal reaction. That is, if a clandestine operator propagated a "wave" from outside an abductee's bedroom (say, from a low-flying helicopter), or from a truck travelling alongside the subject's car), the power necessary to do the job might be such that the microwave would cook the target before it got a chance to launder his thoughts. Our abductee would end up like the victim of the microwave "hit" in the finale of Jerzy Kozinsky's Cockpit.

It's a fair criticism. But Delgado's work may give us our solution. Once an abductee has been implanted — and if we are to trust hypnotic regression accounts of abductees at all, the first implanting session may occur in childhood — the chip-in-the-brain would act as an intensifier of the signal. Such an individual could have any number of "UFO" experiences while his or her bed partner dozes comfortably.

Furthermore, recent reports indicate that a "waver" can achieve pinpoint accuracy without the use of Delgado-style implants. In 1985, volunteers at the Midwest Research Institute in Kansas City, Missouri, were exposed to microwave beams as part of an experiment sponsored by the Department of Energy and the New York State Department of Health. As The Arizona Republic[93] described the experiment, "A matched control group sat in the same room without being bombarded by non-ionizing radiation." [My italics.] Apparently, one can focus "the wave" quite narrowly — a fact which has wide implications for abductees.

III. Applications

So we now have some idea of the tools available to the "spy-chiatrists." How have these tools been used?

This question necessarily involves some detective work. The Central Intelligence Agency, under duress, provided some, though not enough, documentation of its efforts to commandeer "the space between our ears." We know that these efforts were extensive, long-term, and at least partially successful. We know also that these experiments used human subjects. But who? When?

One paradox of this line of inquiry is that, for many readers, the victims elicit sympathy only insofar as they remain anonymous. Intellectually, we realize that MKULTRA and its allied projects must have affected hundreds, probably thousands, of individuals. Yet we react with deep suspicion whenever one of these individuals steps forward and identifies himself, or whenever an independent investigator argues that mind control has directed some newsworthy person's otherwise inexplicable actions. Where, the skeptic may rightfully ask, is the documentation supporting such accusations? Most of the MKULTRA "paper trail" was (allegedly) burnt at Richard Helms' order; what's left has been censored, leaving black ink smudges wherever the names originally appeared. Claimed mind control victims can, for the most part, only give us testimony — and how reliable can such testimony be, especially in light of the fact that one purpose of MKULTRA was to induce insanity? Anyone asserting that he was victimized by the program might well be seeking an extrinsic excuse for his own psychopathology. If you say that you are a manufactured madman, you were probably mad to begin with: Catch 22.

When John Marks wrote The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate" he received numerous letters from people insisting that they had been drugged, "waved," or otherwise abused by the CIA or the military. Most of these communications went directly into his crank file. Perhaps many deserved that destination; I know of at least one that did not.[94]

Marks did, however, devote much attention to Val Orlikov, a former "patient" of perhaps the most notorious figure in the annals of American medical crime: Dr. Ewen Cameron, a CIA-funded scientist heading the Allan Memorial Institute at McGill University, Montreal, Canada. Cameron, a highly-respected mental health researcher,[95] experimented with a technique he called "psychic driving," a brainwashing program which involved inflicting upon a subject an endless tape loop blaring selected messages, 16-to-24 hours a day, combined with massive electroshock and LSD. The project's "guinea pigs" were patients who had come to Allan Memorial with relatively minor psychological complaints. Cameron's experiments failed and his theories were discredited, which may explain why the CIA and its apologists now feel relatively comfortable discussing the Frankensteinian efforts at Allan Memorial, as opposed to more successful work elsewhere.

Orlikov's testimony has received much respectful attention from those writers who have examined MKULTRA, and correctly so. When I studied the files at the National Security Archives, I was particularly keen to read her original letters to John Marks, for these pages had led to the unmasking of an especially heinous CIA project. The letters, interestingly enough, proved just as vague, disjointed, and bizarre as similar correspondence which researchers routinely dismiss. Orlikov can't be blamed for the hazy nature of her recollections; a certain amount of fog is to be expected, given the nature of the crime perpetrated against her. The important point is that her story, ultimately, was found to be true. All of which leads me to wonder: Why did her claims prompt investigation when those of others prompt only dismissal? Perhaps the answer lies in the fact that Orlikov's husband became a Canadian Member of Parliament. Any victims of CIA experimentation who wish to be taken seriously ought, perhaps, first make sure to marry well.

Of course, we can easily forgive previous writers and readers whose researches into MKULTRA have been biased in favor of complacency.[96] But we can't let this natural prejudice cripple our present investigation. Let us examine, then, a few of the "horror stories" from the mind control literature and highlight possible correlations to abductee testimony.

Palle Hardrup's "Guardian Angel"

As mentioned previously, I have not delved much into the subject of hypnosis in this paper — primarily because of space and time limitations, but also because discussions of the possibilities of hypnosis per se tend to cloud the issue of its use in conjunction with the above-mentioned electronic techniques. Obviously, however, hypnosis is a major weapon in the mind controller's armament; in a forthcoming full-length work, I intend to deal with this subject at much greater length.

Needless to say, one of the primary objectives of MKULTRA and related projects was to determine whether one could hypnotically induce someone to commit an anti-social act. This possibility remains one of the most hotly-debated issues in hypnosis, for conventional wisdom asserts that no individual can be hypnotized to commit an action which violates his interior moral code. Martin Orne, editor of the prestigious International Journal of Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis agrees with this axiom,[97] and he is in a position to codify much of the established view on this topic. Orne, however, is a veteran of MKULTRA, and furthermore seems to have lied — at least in his original communications — to author John Marks about his witting involvement with subproject 84.[98] While I respect much of Orne's ground-breaking work, his pronouncements do not hold, for this layman, an Olympian unassailability.

To be sure, many other hypnosis experts, untainted by Company connections, also discount the possibility that anti-social actions can be induced. But a number of highly-experienced professionals — including Milton Kline, William Kroger, George Estabrooks, John Watkins, and Herbert Spiegel — have argued that such actions can, at least to some degree, be elicited by an outside manipulator.

Occasionally, claims of hypnotically-induced anti-social behavior find their way into the courtroom; one such case, which led to the incarceration of the hypnotist, was the Palle Hardrup affair. This incident occurred in Denmark in 1951.[99] Palle Hardrup robbed a bank, killing a guard in the process, and later claimed that he had been instructed to do so by the hypnotist Bjorn Nielsen. Nielsen eventually confessed to having engineered the crime as a test of his hypnotic abilities.

The most significant aspect of this incident concerns the "pose" Nielsen adopted to work his malicious designs. During the hypnosis sessions, Nielsen hypnotically suggested that he was Hardrup's "guardian angel," represented by the letter X. Hardrup testified that "There is another room next door where Nielsen and I go and talk on our own. It is there that my guardian spirit usually comes and talks to me. Nielsen says that X has a task for me."

One of these tasks was arranging for Hardrup's girlfriend to have sex with the hypnotist. The other tasks, he mentioned, included robbery and murder. Nielsen convinced his victim that "X" wanted the robbery funds to be used for worthwhile political goals. The end, Hardrup was told, justified the means.

Compare this scenario to that encountered in the typical contactee case, in which alien "guardians" convince their victims/subjects that the encounter will eventually serve some unspecified "higher purpose." Indeed, in my interviews with abductees who have established a "long-term" relationship with their visitors, I have found that some of them originally believed themselves in contact with Hardrup-like angelic guardians. Only in recent years was the "angel" pose discarded and the true "alien" form revealed.

Thus we have one possible means of overcoming the proposition that hypnosis cannot induce anti-social behavior. If a hypnotist lacks scruples, and has access to a particularly susceptible subject, he can induce a misperceived reality. Actions which we would abhor in an everyday context become acceptable in specialized circumstances: A citizen who could never commit murder on a suburban street might, if drafted into an army, kill on the field of battle. In hypnosis, the mind becomes that battlefield. In the words of Dr. John Watkins,

We behave on the basis of our perceptions. If our perceptions of a situation can be altered so as to cause us to misconstrue it, or to develop a false belief, then our behavior in relation to it will be drastically altered. It is precisely in the area of changing perceptions that the hypnotic modality demonstrates its most powerful effects. Hallucinations both under hypnosis, and posthypnotic, can easily be induced in the suggestible subject. He can be made to ignore painful stimuli, be apparently unable to hear loud sounds, and "see" individuals who are not present [my italics]. Moreover, attitudes and beliefs can be initiated in him which are quite abnormal and often contrary to those which he previously held.[100]

If traditional hypnosis, unaided, can achieve such changes in perception, one can only imagine the possibilities inherent in the combination of hypnotic techniques with the psychoelectronic research previously described.

Scientists such as Orne and Milton Erickson[101] have taken issue with Watkins' assertions. But the Hardrup case would appear to bear Watkins out. If someone can be convinced that he, like Jeanne D'Arc, acts under the influence of a supernatural higher power, then previously unthinkable capabilities may be evinced and "impossible" actions carried forth. Indeed, when we consider the extreme personality changes — and occasionally, the heinous actions — elicited by leaders of certain cults, and occult groups,[102] we understand the desirability of installing a hypnotic "cover story" within a supernatural matrix. People will do for God — or the Devil, or the Space Brothers — what they would not do otherwise.

The date of the Hardrup affair corresponds to the institution of BLUEBIRD/ ARTICHOKE; it doesn't require much imagination to see how this case could have served as a model to the scientists researching those and subsequent projects.

Screen Memory

According to declassified documents in the Marks files, a major difficulty faced by the MKULTRA researchers concerned the "disposal problem." What to do with the victims of CIA-sponsored electroshock, hypnosis, and drug experimentation? The Company resorted to distressing, but characteristic, tactics: They disposed of their human guinea pigs by incarcerating them in insane asylums, by performing icepick lobotomies, and by ordering "executive actions."[103]

A more sophisticated solution had to be found. One of the goals of the CIA's mind control efforts was the erasure of memory via hypnosis (and drugs, electronics, lobotomies, etc.); not only would this hide what occurred during the experimental indoctrination/programming sessions, it would prove useful in the field. "Amnesia was a big goal," confirms Victor Marchetti, who points out its usefulness in dealing with contract agents: "After you've done it, the agent doesn't even know what he's done...you send him in, he does the job. When he comes out, you clean his head out."[104]

The big problem: Despite hypnotically-induced amnesia, there would be memory leaks — snippets of the repressed material would arise spontaneously, in dreams, as flashbacks, etc. A proposed solution: give the subject a "screen memory," a false story; thus, even if he starts to recall the material, he will recall it incorrectly.

Even the conservative Dr. Orne notes that:

A S [subject] who is able to develop good posthypnotic amnesia will also respond to suggestions to remember events which did not actually occur. On awakening, he will fail to recall the real events of the trance and will instead recall the suggested events. If anything, this phenomenon is easier to produce than total amnesia, perhaps because it eliminates the subjective feeling of an empty space in memory.[105]

Not only would the screen memories fill in the uncomfortable blanks in the subjects' recollection, they would protect against revelation. One fear of the MKULTRA scientists was that a hypno-programmed individual used as, say, a courier, could be un-programmed by another hypnotist, perhaps working for the enemy. Thus, the MKULTRA scientists decided to instill multiple personalities — multiple cover stories, if you will — to confuse any "unauthorized" hypnotist.[106]

One case using this technique centered on an assassin named Luis Castillo, who, after his capture in the Philippines, was extensively de-briefed and studied by experts in the employ of the National Bureau of Investigation, that country's equivalent to our FBI. Castillo was discovered to have had at least four separate personalities hypnotically instilled; each personality could be triggered by a specific cue. In one state, he claimed to be Sgt. Manuel Angel Ramirez, of the Strategic Air Tactical Command in South Vietnam; supposedly, "Ramirez" was the illegitimate son of a certain pipe-smoking, highly-placed CIA official whose initials were A.D.[107] Another personality claimed to be one of John F. Kennedy's assassins.

The main hypnotist involved with this case labelled these hypnotic alter-egos "Zombie states." The report on the case stated that "The Zombie phenomenon referred to here is a somnambulistic behavior displayed by the subject in a conditioned response to a series of words, phrases, and statements, apparently unknown to the subject during his normal waking state."

Upon Castillo's repatriation to the United States, the FBI claimed that he had fabricated the story. In his book Operation Mind Control, Walter Bowart makes a convincing case against the FBI's claims. Certainly, many aspects of the Castillo affair argue for his sincerity — including his hypnotically-induced insensitivity to pain,[108] his maintenance of the story (or stories) even when severely inebriated, and his apparently programmed suicide attempts.

If Castillo told the truth, as I believe he did, then he manifested both hypnotically-induced multiple personality and pseudomemory. The former remains controversial; the latter has been repeatedly replicated in experimental situations.[109]

This point is vitally important for students of the abduction phenomenon. We cannot assume the accuracy of abduction descriptions given during subsequent hypnotic regression. Moreover, we cannot even assume the accuracy of spontaneously-arising recollections (i.e., abduction memories not elicited through hypnotic regression). Indeed, responsible skeptics have argued that hypnotic regression may prove inadvertently harmful, in that it may lock in place a false remembrance. (Note, however, that other psychiatric professionals consider hypnotic regression the best technique, however flawed, in unlocking amnesia.[110] For my part, I maintain an ambivalent and cautious attitude toward the use of hypnosis in abductee work.)

Granted, it is all too easy for the debunkers to cry "confabulation" to dismiss hypnotic testimony which does not conform to our preconceptions about the possible; I do not intend to make this same error. Whenever skeptics offer the phenomenon of pseudomemory to rationalize abduction claims, they cite experimental situations in which pseudomemory was originally created by a hypnotist.[111] These experiments can not be cited as proof that an individual abductee spontaneously conjured up a fantasy (which just happens to correspond to the details of hundreds of similar "fantasies"). Rather, laboratory studies of pseudomemory creation prove my point: Pseudomemory can be induced by previous hypnosis.[112]

In other words, an abductee may talk of aliens — when the reality was something else entirely.

In correspondence with me, a noted abduction researcher noted an instance in which an abductee recounted seeing a helicopter during his experience; as the abductee testimony progressed, the helicopter turned into a UFO. During one of the (quite few) regression sessions I attended, I heard an exactly similar narrative. Hopkins would argue that the helicopter was a "screen memory" hiding the awful reality of the UFO encounter. But does Occam's razor really cut that way? Shouldn't we also consider the possibility that the object in question really was a helicopter — which the abductee was instructed to recall as a UFO?

The Super Spy

Among the released BLUEBIRD/ARTICHOKE/MKULTRA papers was the following handwritten memorandum, unsigned and undated:

I have developed a technic which is safe and secure (free from international censorship). It has to do with the conditioning of our own people. I can accomplish this as a one-man job.

The method is the production of hypnosis by means of simple oral medication. Then (with no further medication) the hypnosis is re-enforced daily during the following three or four days.

Each individual is conditioned against revealing any information to an enemy, even though subjected to hypnosis or drugging. If preferable, he may be conditioned to give false information rather than no information.

In the margin of this document, one of Marks' assistants wrote, "Is this Wendt?" The reference here is to G. Richard Wendt, a professor employed by project CHATTER who, in 1951, led both his Naval employers and the CIA on a mind control merry-goose-chase, when an experiment similar to that described above failed to produce results.[113] Even if the above memorandum does describe an operational failure (and the tactics described in this memo do not seem very feasible to me), we should not rest complacent. We now know that, in at least one case, more sophisticated techniques made the above scenario a reality.

I refer to the case of Candy Jones.

Her story has filled at least one book[114] and ought, one day, to give rise to another. Obviously, I cannot here give all the details of this fascinating and frightening narrative. But a precis is mandatory.

Ms. Jones (born Jessica Wilcox) achieved star status as a model during World War II, and later established her own modelling agency. An FBI man requested her to allow her place of business to be used as a "mail drop" for the Bureau and "another government agency" (presumably, the CIA); Candy, deeply patriotic, accepted the proposition gladly. Toiling on the fringes of the clandestine world, Candy eventually came into contact with a "Dr. Gilbert Jensen," who worked, in turn, with a "Dr. Marshall Burger." (Both names are pseudonyms.) Unknown to her, these doctors had been employed as "spy-chiatrists" by the CIA. Using a job interview as a cover, Jensen induced hypnosis, found Candy to be a particularly responsive subject — and proceeded to use her as other scientists would use a rhesus monkey. She became a test subject for the CIA's mind control program.

Her job — insofar as it is known — was to provide a clandestine courier service.[115] Estabrooks had outlined the basic idea years earlier: Induce hypnosis via a disguised technique, give the messenger information to memorize, hypnotically "erase" the message from conscious memory, and install a post-hypnotic suggestion that the message (now buried within the subconscious) will be brought forth only upon a specific cue. If the hypnotist can create such a courier, ultra-security can be guaranteed; even torture won't cause the messenger to tell what he knows — because he doesn't know that he knows it.[116] According to the highly respected Dr. Milton Kline, "Evidence really does exist that has not been published" proving that Estabrooks' perfect secret agent could be successfully evoked.[117]

Candy was one such success story. Success, in this context, means that she could be — and was — brutally tortured and abused while running assignments for the CIA. All the MKULTRA toys were brought into play: hypnosis, drugs, conditioning — and electronics. Using these devices, Jensen and Burger managed to:

— install a "duplicate personality,"

— create amnesia of both the programming sessions and the field assignments, — turn Candy into a vicious, hate-mongering bigot, the better to isolate her from the rest of humanity (previously, her associates considered her noteworthy for her racial tolerance; her modelling agency was one of the first to break the color barrier), and — program her to commit suicide at the end of her usefulness to the agency.

The programming techniques used on her were flawed. She breached security when she married famed New York radio personality John Nebel,[118] who, using hypnotic regression, elicited the long-repressed truth. Eventually, the "Other Candy" was bade farewell, and the programming broken.

Skeptics might find Candy's story as incredible as the abduction accounts — after all, an amateur had conducted her hypnotic regression, and the possibility of confabulation always lurks. Nevertheless, I feel that the veracity of her narrative has been established beyond reasonable doubt. In her hypnotic regression sessions, she recalled being programmed at a government-connected institute in northern California — which, as John Marks' investigators later proved, was indeed heavily involved with government-funded brainwashing research.[119] Marks himself believes Candy's story — not least, because the details of the programming methods used on her were substantiated by documents released after her book was published.[120] Interviews with Milton Kline, Dr. Frances Jakes, John Watkins and others provided the testimony that the programming of Candy Jones was feasible — and Deep Trance substantiated the story.[121]

Recently, the case has received important "indirect" confirmation: Investigators interested in follow-up research have filed FOIA requests with the CIA for all papers relating to Candy Jones. The agency admits that it has a substantial file on her, but refuses to release any part of it. If her tale is false, then why would the CIA be so reluctant to deliver the information? Indeed, why would they have a file in the first place?[122]

The final confirmation of Candy's tale requires a revelation — one which I make with some trepidation, even though the individual named is dead.

"Marshall Burger" was really Dr. William Kroger.[123]

Kroger, long associated with the espionage establishment, had written the following in 1963:

"...a good subject can be hypnotized to deliver secret information. The memory of this message could be covered by an artificially-induced amnesia. In the event that he should be captured, he naturally could not remember that he had ever been given the message...however, since he had been given a post-hypnotic suggestion, the message would be subject to recall through a specific cue."[124]

If Candy confabulated her story, why did she name this particular scientist, who, writing theoretically in 1963, predicted the subsequent events in her life?[125]

After l'Affair Jones, Kroger transferred his base of operations to UCLA — specifically, to the Neuropsychiatric Institute run by Dr. Louis Jolyon West, an MKULTRA veteran. There he wrote Hypnosis and Behavior Modification,[126] with a preface by Martin Orne (another MKULTRA veteran) and H.J. Eysenck (still another MKULTRA veteran). The finale of this opus contains chilling hints of the possibilities inherent in combining hypnosis with ESB, implants, and conditioning — though Kroger is careful to point out that "we are not concerned that man might be conditioned by rewards and punishments through electronic brain stimulation to be controlled like robots."[127] He may not be concerned — but perhaps we ought to be.

The control of Candy Jones gives us much information useful to our "alien abduction" hypothesis.

1. Her torture sessions — inflicted during her programming by her CIA masters, and on missions by as-yet mysterious persons — seem strikingly like the otherwise senselessly painful "examinations" allegedly conducted aboard alien spacecraft.

2. Her personality shifts roughly parallel those experienced by certain UFO abductees.

3. Despite her brutalization, she remained "loyal" to Drs. Jensen and Burger. This bewildering behavior reminds me of my first abductee interviews, during which I heard ghastly descriptions of UFO torture sessions — followed by protestations of limitless love for the alien pain-mongers.

4. Like many abductees, Candy had to attend regular "conditioning" sessions. Repeated exposure to the programming is necessary to effect continuous control.

5. To maintain their hammerlock on her mind, Candy's handlers programmed her to remain isolated. Specifically, they instilled a deep paranoia toward other human beings; "outsiders" were probable enemies, out to use or abuse her. I have seen this pattern consistently in my own work with abductees.[128] Skeptics would argue that unreasonable abductee fears probably indicate paranoid schizophrenia — one symptom of which can, indeed, be hallucinatory experiences. But most abductees are easily hypnotized, while paranoid schizophrenics are extremely difficult to "put under," according to Dr. Edward Simpson-Kallas, a psychiatrist with wide experience in the area of forensic hypnosis.[129] If, however, those unreasonable fears had been hypnotically induced, the contradiction is resolved.

6. Candy was the product of an unhappy childhood, hence her propensity toward multiple personality.[130] Many of the "repeater" abductees I have interviewed had similarly depressing family histories.[131]

7. The story of Candy Jones also has what we might call a "negative relevance" to the abduction accounts. Because the Controllers did not establish a hypnotic cover story, or pseudomemory, the true facts of the case managed to percolate into her conscious mind. No matter how thorough the post-hypnotic amnesia, leaks will occur — hence the need for a false memory, to fill the gap of recollection. The CIA learns from its mistakes. Candy's hypno-programming broke down in early 1973 — the year the "alien disguise" became (if my hypothesis proves correct) standard operating procedure.[132] (Milton Kline accepted the Candy Jones story, but considered the job amateurish and inconsistent with the best work done at that time.[133] Perhaps the major fault was the lack of a pseudomemory cover story?)

Bases of Suspicion

"Underground base" rumors are as hot as jalapenos in the UFO field right now, and several of these stories involve abductions.

For example, a sideshow of the famous Bentwaters UFO case involves the abduction of an airman named Larry Warren to an underground cavity beneath the military base. There, while in what he later described as "a bit of a drugged state," he saw aliens and human beings — military figures — working side-by-side.[134]

I have spoken to another abductee, Nancy Wright, who was allegedly taken to an underground chamber ten miles north of Edwards AFB, California. As this was a multiple-witness event, and Ms. Wright has not attempted to capitalize on the story for financial gain, I tend to credit her story.[135] According to abduction researcher Miranda Parks, an elderly couple living in the vicinity was also abducted in an exactly similar fashion.[136]

In 1979, Paul Bennewitz and Leo Sprinkle researched a particularly controversial abduction involving a young woman (name unrevealed) who was apparently taken to a facility where aliens processed fluids and body parts from a cattle mutilation. This investigation seems to have led to the government harassment of Bennewitz, in which some form of mind control (or, as I have previously referred to it, "electronic Gaslight") may have played a part.[137]

How do we account for these tales of alleged alien skullduggery carried out in conjunction with the military? I, for one, cannot credit the generally-unsubstantiated tales of "cosmic conspiracy" now promulgated by ex-intelligence agents such as John Lear and William Cooper. While I cannot assert insincerity on the part of these men, I often wonder if they have been used as conduits — witting or unwitting — in a sophisticated disinformation scheme.

A simpler, though no less chilling, explanation for the "base" abductions may be found in the story of Dr. Louis Jolyon West, now notorious for his participation in MKULTRA experiments with LSD.[138] Inspired by Violence and the Brain (a book by Drs. Frank Ervin and Vernon H. Mark which ascribed inner city turmoil to a "genetic defect" within rebellious blacks), West proposed, in 1973, a Center for the Study and Reduction of Violence, where potentially violent individuals could be dealt with prophylactically.

And who were these individuals? According to West's proposal, the noteworthy factors indicating a violent predisposition were "sex (male), age (youthful), ethnicity (black) and urbanicity." How to deal with them? "...by implanting tiny electrodes deep within the brain, electrical activity can be followed in areas that cannot be measured from the surface of the scalp...it is even possible to record bioelectrical changes in the brains of freely-moving subjects, through the use of remote monitoring techniques..." By monitoring the subjects' EEGs remotely, potentially violent episodes could be identified.

For our purposes, the most significant aspect of this proposal had to do with location. In a secret communication to Dr. J.M. Stubblebine, director of the California State Department of Health (fortunately, this missive was "leaked" to the public), West disclosed that he intended to house his Center in an abandoned Nike missile base, whose location was accessible yet relatively remote. "The site is securely fenced," West wrote. "Comparative studies could be carried out there, in an isolated but convenient location, of experimental model programs, for the alteration of undesirable behavior."[139]

Public outcry stopped these plans. But was this scheme truly eliminated? Or was it merely modified, stripped (temporarily) of its overtly racial overtones and relocated to some less-accessible spot?

One thing is certain: A CIA "spy-chiatrist" favored secret behavior control experimentation in a remote military installation. Perhaps someone within the espionage establishment's mind-modification divisions still thinks highly of the idea. If so, the disposal problem would once again rear its ugly head, should "visitors" to these installations ever reappear in outside society. Again, a hypno-programmed cover story — the less believable, the better — would prove invaluable.

The Scandinavian Connection

Many books have been written about abductees, yet few exist about the victims of mind control. I cannot understand this situation; the reality of UFOs is still controversial, yet the existence of mind control was verified in two (heavily compromised) congressional investigations and in thousands of FOIA documents. Nevertheless, the abductees find many a sympathetic ear, while those few who dare to proclaim themselves the victims of known government programs rarely find anyone to hear them out. Our prejudices on this score are regrettable, for if we listened to the "controllees" we would hear many details strikingly similar to those mentioned by UFO abductees.

Two cases in point: Martti Koski and Robert Naeslund.

Koski, a Finnish citizen, claims to have been a victim of mind control experimentation while visiting Canada. Shortly after his experience began, he attempted to broadcast his situation to the world and draw attention to his plight. Few listened. Many of his details were bizarre, and not being a native speaker of English, he could not express himself convincingly to those he approached for help. Yet many aspects of his story correspond closely to known details of MKULTRA and related programs.

Naeslund, a Swedish citizen, tells a similar story. Moreover, his claims were backed by special evidence: X-rays revealed an implant in his brain. Naeslund actually went to the extreme of having his implant tested by electronic technicians employed by Hewlett-Packard. A Greek surgeon performed the necessary trepanation to remove the device.

Many aspects of the Koski and Naeslund stories correspond to my hypothesis. Koski, for example, was at one point told that the doctors afflicting him were actually "aliens from Sirius." At another point, he was led to believe that he was under the direction of "the Lord." (As I previously indicated, manipulation of religious imagery could help induce anti-social behavior; the subject's super-ego can be nullified if he believes that he follows commands from on high. Such manipulation may explain the more bizarre aspects of Betty Andreasson Luca's abduction.[140])

Naeslund's implant was originally placed through his nasal cavity. He first realized that something terrible had happened to him after an experience of missing time, followed by an inexplicable nosebleed.

This detail will be instantly familiar to anyone who has studied abductions; I have encountered it in my own conversations with abductees. For an excellent example in the UFO literature, I refer the reader to the case of Susan Ransted, as detailed in Kevin D. Randle's The UFO Casebook;[141] the background of alleged contactee Diane Tessman is also noteworthy in this regard.[142] Intriguingly, I have located a reference in the open literature to the use, in animal study, of nasally-implanted electrodes for the measurement of electromagnetic radiation effects.[143]

There are other claimed mind control victims bearing evidence of implants; note, especially, the fascinating case of James Petit, a CIA-connected pilot and alleged brainwashing alumnus; X-rays of his cranium have revealed abductee-style implants — fitting, perhaps, since his body bears abductee-style scars.[144] Conversely, certain abductees will, if allowed a thorough and sympathetic hearing, deliver testimony strongly agreeing with Koski's narrative.

Helicopters and Disks

The bizarre story of Rex Niles and his sister (not named in news accounts) may shed interesting light on a variety of abductee cases, particularly that of Betty and Barney Hill.[145] Niles, the high-rolling owner of a Woodland Hills defense subcontracting firm (Rex Rep) was fingered by authorities investigating defense industry kickbacks. He became an extraordinarily cooperative witness in the investigation — until he was targeted by his enemies, who allegedly used psychoelectronics as harassment.

The following excerpt from the Los Angeles Times article on Niles is particularly compelling:

He [Niles] has produced testimony from his sister, a Simi Valley woman who swears that helicopters have repeatedly circled her home. An engineer measured 250 watts of microwaves in the atmosphere outside Niles' house and found a radioactive disc underneath the dash of his car [my italics].

A former high school friend, Lyn Silverman, claimed that her home computer went haywire when Niles stepped close to it.

No aliens in this story — yet how similar it is to tales of alien abduction! The low-flying helicopters, of course, are frequently reported by abduction victims — the Betty Andreasson Luca case provides the best-known example.[146] The haywire electronics equipment is also frequently encountered in putative abduction cases; I have spoken (independently) to three women who claimed to have been able to disturb or shut off televisions and stereos simply by walking past the devices; one woman even claimed she had switched off her TV simply by pointing at it!

But the radioactive disc is especially intriguing. As former FBI agent Ted Gunderson recently explained to my associate Alexander Constantine, magnetic radioactive discs have long been used by the clandestine services as cancer-inducing "silent killers" — i.e., as tools of assassination. Not only that. The disk calls to mind one little-remembered detail of the Hill case — the dozen-or-so circular "shiny spots," each the size of a silver dollar, found on the trunk of her car directly after the abduction. A compass needle reacted wildly when placed near these spots. Could they have marked the location where an electromagnetic or radioactive device, similar to that found by Niles, was placed on the car? (Such a device might have been held to the spot magnetically, hence the circular impressions.) If so, then the disorienting EMR could have helped induce the Hills' "UFO sighting."

The Military and Mind Control

Some time ago, I attended hypnotic regression sessions in which the subject — a claimed UFO abductee — recalled undergoing a mysterious "brain operation" at a veteran's hospital in California. The operation was performed by human beings, not aliens. Interestingly, this same hospital was mentioned in two other cases I encountered. These other claims were not made by abductees, but by people alleged to have been victims of mind control experimentation.

One of these claimants, a former Navy SEAL who undertook numerous dangerous missions in Vietnam, favorably impressed me with the wealth of detail in his story.[147] This individual — I've taken to calling him "the trained SEAL" — had received specialized combat training at a military base in California; he claims that at one point during this training he was drugged, hypnotized, possibly placed under some form of electronic control, and subjected to the extremes of pain/pleasure operant conditioning. One peculiar detail of his story concerns the "reward" aspect of the conditioning: When properly acquiescent, he was given unlimited sexual access to a woman who, the SEAL avers, was herself the victim of brainwashing!

Unbelievable as this last claim may seem, I found it oddly resonant when I later interviewed a prominent abductee in the Southern California area, who bravely offered me details on a puzzling, albeit quite delicate, incident in her past. Still an attractive woman, she recalled for me — indeed, seemed strangely compelled to describe — an early love affair with a young soldier training at a military base near her home. She cannot recall the soldier's name. All she remembers is that one day he started living at her family's house; she has no memory of how the arrangement began, and her parents have never felt comfortable discussing the matter. Although unattracted to this soldier, she felt compelled to become intimate with him, adopting a pliant, obeisant attitude that was quite out of character for her. Later, the soldier went on to covert missions in Vietnam.

Of course, a young person's psycho-sexual development is never smooth, and the incident related above may merely have represented one peculiarly upsetting bump in that notoriously rough road. Still, some of the details of this story — particularly the parents' attitude, the woman's personality shift, and her subsequent memory lapses — are striking, and I treat with respect the abductee's intuition that this minor enigma in her personal history could, if properly understood, shed light on her later "missing time" experiences.

Could the "trained SEAL" have been right? Was there, is there, a coterie of hypno-programmed soldiers conducting particularly hazardous missions? And do the programmers have at their disposal a "ladies' auxiliary," so to speak, of hypnotized camp followers?

If the SEAL's story stood alone, skeptics could easily dismiss it (provided they did not sit, as I did, face-to-face with the story's teller, listening to all the grisly and unsettling details). But other veterans have added their voices to this grim tale. Daniel Sheehan, of the Christic Institute, claims that his organization has spoken to half-a-dozen individuals with narratives similar to my SEAL informant. All had received "processing," so to speak, within the context of standard military training; after programming and specialized combat instruction by mercenaries, the recruits were placed "on hold," to be used as situations arose — and some of those situations occurred within the United States.[148]

Walter Bowart began his own researches into mind control by placing an ad in "Soldier-Of-Fortune"-style publications, asking for correspondence from veterans who experienced inexplicable lapses in memory or strange behavior modification techniques while serving in Vietnam; he received over 100 replies. Bowart devoted an entire chapter to one of these respondents — an Air Force veteran named David, who ended his four-year tour of duty recalling only that he had spent the time "having fun, skin diving, laying on the beach, collecting shells...It never dawned on me until later that I must have done something while I was in the service." (An obvious example of screen memory.) He was also "assigned" a girlfriend whose name he cannot now recall, despite the length and deep intimacy of the affair.[149] The parallels to the SEAL's story and the abductee's account should be obvious.

We even have a confession, of sorts, from a scientist who specialized in one aspect of this sort of training. Lt. Commander Thomas Narut, of the U.S. Naval Hospital at the NATO headquarters in Naples, Florida, admitted during a lecture in Oslo that recruits in Naples underwent "Clockwork-Orange"-style behavior modification sessions. Trainees would be strapped into chairs with their eyelids clamped open while watching films of industrial accidents and African circumcision ceremonies — films frequently used by psychologists as a means of inducing stress in experimental situations. Unlike the protagonist in Clockwork Orange, who learned revulsion at the sight of violence, Narut's soldiers were taught to accept and enjoy bloodshed, to view it with equanimity. Similar techniques were used to dehumanize potential enemies. Graduates of this program became, in Narut's words, "hit men and assassins," to be placed in American embassies throughout the world.

When questioned by reporters about these claims, the American government denied the story; Narut — after a long incommunicado period and apparent coercion — later explained to journalists that he had merely spoken theoretically. If so, why did he originally describe the behavior modification procedure as an ongoing program? [150]

And while it may seem frivolous to return to the subject of abductions after examining such grim data, I should remind the reader of the many abduction accounts in which abductees recall being forced to watch certain stress-inducing motion pictures. The aliens, it seems, have learned a few lessons from Dr. Narut.

Narut, of course, concentrated on selective programming of individual American soldiers; on the other side of the mind control spectrum, Defense Department specialists have also concentrated on methods to render entire enemy battalions "combat ineffective." Electromagnetic weaponry, intended to wipe out the aggression of the enemy, is the province of DARPA, under the direction of Dr. Jack Verona. These projects remain fairly mysterious; we do know, however, that one operation, SLEEPING BEAUTY, employed the services of Dr. Michael Persinger, a scientist who has expressed interesting views regarding UFOs.

Persinger discovered a method of using ELF waves to induce the brain's MAST cells to release histamine; should a battlefield commander wish to subject his enemy to mass bouts of vomiting, Persinger's trick could do the job even faster than a Tobe Hooper movie. The method works on animals. "The question," writes mind control researcher Larry Collins, "is how to get from point A to point B without violating one of the most rigorous commandments of Government ethics — thou shalt not conduct experiments like that on human beings."[151]

If Collins studied the record a little more carefully, he might realize that the government hasn't always regarded this commandment as something graven in stone. As Milton Kline put it:

"Ethical factors involved in most research would preclude having positive results. Those ethical factors don't always hold with government research. The research which has given really positive results has not been limited by ethical constraints."[152] [My italics.]

The Ultimate Motive For Mind Control

Hypnosis hard-liners of the Orne school would almost certainly dismiss the foregoing veterans' accounts of the use of hypnosis, drugs and behavioral conditioning on American fighting men. Why, the skeptics would ask, would anyone attempt to create a "Manchurian Candidate" when the military services, using entirely conventional means, can create a "Rambo"? There have always been recruits for even the most hazardous duties; what need of hypnosis?

The need, in fact, is absolute.

http://www.whale.to/b/cannon.html

The modern battlefield has little place for the traditional soldier. Advanced weaponry requires an increasing level of technical sophistication, which in turn requires a cool-headed operator. But the all-too-human combatant — though capable of extraordinary acts of courage under the most stressful conditions imaginable — does not possess inexhaustible reserves of sang-froid. Eventually, breakdowns will occur. Per-capita psychiatric casualties have increased dramatically in each successive American conflict. As Richard Gabriel, the excellent historian of the role of psychiatry in warfare, writes:

Modern warfare has become so lethal and so intense that only the already insane can endure it...Modern war requiring continuous combat will increase the degree of fatigue on the soldier to heretofore unknown levels. Physical fatigue — especially the lack of sleep — will increase the rate of psychiatric casualties enormously. Other factors — high rates of indirect fire, night fighting, lack of food, constant stress, large numbers of casualties — will ensure that the number of psychiatric casualties will reach disastrous proportions. And the number of casualties will overburden the medical structure to the point of collapse.

The ability to treat psychiatric casualties will all but disappear. There will be no safe forward areas in which to treat soldiers debilitated by mental collapse. The technology of modern war has made such locations functionally obsolete...[153]

According to Gabriel, the military intends to meet this challenge by creating “the chemical soldier,” a designer-drugged zombie in fighting man’s uniform:

On the battlefields of the future we will witness a true clash of ignorant armies, armies ignorant of their own emotions and even of the reasons for which they fight. Soldiers on all sides will be reduced to fearless chemical automatons who fight simply because they can do nothing else...Once the chemical genie is out of the bottle, the full range of human mental and physical actions become targets for chemical control...Today it is already possible by chemical or electrical stimulation to increase the aggression levels of the human being by stimulating the amygdala, a section of the brain known to control aggression and rage. Such “human potential engineering” is already a partial reality and the necessary technical knowledge increases every day.[154]

While this passage speaks of drugs and electronics, we can safely assume that the planners of battle would not refrain from using any other promising technique.

Gabriel writes primarily of large-scale battle scenarios, but based on his information, we can fairly deduce that the mind-controlled soldier will also play a role in the surgical strike, the covert operation, the infiltration behind enemy lines by units of the Special Forces. On such missions, United States personnel have increasingly relied on torture as a means of interrogation and intimidation,[155] and as such barbarism becomes standard procedure the American fighting man of the future will need to find within himself unprecedented reserves of brutality. Will the average recruit, culled from the nation’s suburbs and reared on traditional ideals, possess such reserves?

Vietnam proved that the soldier, despite a barrage of propaganda intended to cloud his discernment, will sense the difference between fighting for legitimate defense interests and fighting to protect political hegemony. To forestall this realization, or to render it irrelevant, military planners must withdraw the human combatant and replace him with a new species of warrior. The soldier of the future will not discern; he will merely do. He will not be a butcher; he will be the butcher’s knife — a tool among other tools, thoughtless and effective.

And it is my contention that to create this soldier of the future, the controllers need a continuing program, one designed to test each new method and combination of methods for conquering the human mind. One primary goal of this program must include expanding the human capacity for stress and violence. Subjects enrolled in such experimental procedures will experience pain, and will learn to accept the pain. Eventually, they will learn to inflict it, without remorse or even remembrance. The nation who first creates this new soldier will possess a decisive advantage on the “conventional” battlefield — as will the nation which first develops a means of using mass mind control techniques to disable entire enemy platoons. This paramount military necessity is the reason why I will never believe any unconvincing reassurances that our nation’s clandestine scientists have foregone or will forego research into behavior modification. This research will never be mere history. What’s past is present, and today’s covert experimentation will become tomorrow’s basic training.

A prototype of the future warrior may already be with us. The Navy SEAL I interviewed spoke in horrifying detail of dismemberment without emotion, of rape as routine, of killing without affect. And then forgetting that he had killed. Even years later, he could not recall the stories behind many of the wounds on his own body. He claims that whenever he would need the services of the veteran's hospital, doctors would re-hypnotize him shortly after his admission, while a physician specifically cleared for such work would examine his medical history, which was highly classified and kept under lock and key.

According to the SEAL's testimony, his memory block cracked little by little, as a result of events too complex to recount here. Finally, years after Vietnam, he was able to remember what he did.

Amnesia was a blessing.

IV. Abductions

Press and public now regard abductees as tony curiosities, yet science, for the most part, still banishes their tales to the domain of the damned, as Charles Fort defined damnation. So too with claimed victims of mind control. The Voice of Authority tells us that MKULTRA belongs to history; like Hasdrubal and Hitler, it threatened once, but no more. Anyone insisting otherwise must be silenced by glib rationalization and selective inattention.

Yet these two topics — UFO abductions and mind control — have more in common than their mutual ostracization. The data overlap. If we could chart these phenomena on a Venn diagram, we would see a surprisingly large intersection between the two circles of information. It is this overlap I seek to address.

Note, however, that I can not address all the other interesting and important issues raised by the UFO abduction experience. For example, I have written, admittedly rather vaguely, of nasal implants reported by abductees — the sort of detail which might place an account in the "high strangeness" category, and of course, a detail central to my thesis. But what percentage of the percipients speak of such implants? A truly scientific analysis would provide a figure. Unfortunately, I haven't the resources to compile a sufficiently large abductee sample from which one could draw statistics. Nor can I make an over-arching qualitative analysis, measuring the value of "high strangeness" reports against other abductee claims. All I can do is note the available literature, and leave the reader to wonder, as I do, whether the compilers of that literature concentrated on exceptional cases or were biased in favor of the less fantastic abductee accounts. I have supplemented readings of the abduction literature with my own interviews with percipients — which, since abductees tend to know other abductees, can give a surprisingly wide view of the phenomenon. This view has been broadened still further by my talks and correspondence with other members of the UFO community.

Of course, we must recognize the difference between testimony and proof. No one can state definitively that abduction reports have a basis in objective reality (however misperceived). Ultimately, all we have are stories. Some of these stories may be of questionable veracity; others may be contaminated by investigator bias; many are insufficiently detailed. No one research paper can resolve all abduction controversies, and many necessary battles must be fought on other fields.

Still, the testimony won't go away — and we certainly have enough to allow for comparisons. I maintain that an unprejudiced overview of abduction reports in the popular press and the less-familiar material on mind control will demonstrate a striking correlation. Once other abduction researchers have been educated in the ways of MKULTRA (and this paper is intended as an introductory text) they may note a similar pattern. If so, we can then begin to write a revisionist history of the phenomenon.

The abduction enigma contains within it sub-mysteries that slide into the mind control scenario with surprising ease, even elegance — mysteries which fit the E.T. hypothesis as uncomfortably as a size 10 foot fits into a size 8 shoe. As we have seen, the MKULTRA thesis explains the reports of abductee intracerebral implants (particularly reports involving nosebleeds), unusual scars, "telepathic" communication (i.e., externally induced intracerebral voices) concurrent with or following the abduction encounter, allegations that some abductees hear unusual sound effects (similar to those created by the hemi-synch and cognate devices), haywire electronic devices in abductee homes, personality shifts, "training films," manipulation of religious imagery, and missing time. Needless to say, the thesis of clandestine government experimentation readily accounts for abductee claims of human beings "working" with the aliens, and for the government harassment that plays so prominent a role in certain abductee reports.

Let's look at some more correlations.

The Hill Case and the "Advanced" Aliens

Earlier, I asked, "Do the aliens also watch black-and-white television?" in reference to their alleged use of old-fashioned, Terra-style brain implantation devices. Abduction accounts abound in other examples of alien "retro-technology." The most striking example can be found in the Betty and Barney Hill incident, the details of which are too well-known to recount here.[156] As we have already glimpsed during our discussion of the Rex Niles affair, the Hills' "interrupted journey" abounds in data which, taken together, permits the construction of an alternative explanation.

At one point during the alleged UFO abduction, the "examiners" inserted a needle in Betty Hill's navel, telling her that this practice constituted a test for pregnancy.[157] Some ufologists[158] rashly assume that Betty Hill's "pregnancy test" is evidence of advanced extraterrestrial technology, since her 1961 account pre-dates the official announcement of amniocentesis, which does indeed make use of a needle inserted into the navel. But we now have much less invasive means of testing for pregnancy than amniocentesis. True, amniocentesis is still sometimes used to gather information about the fetus, but the wielders of a highly evolved technology would certainly use other methods of determining the existence of pregnancy in the first place.

Betty Hill's testimony reminds us of certain other abduction accounts, which contain descriptions of "healings" surprisingly similar to the procedures associated with still-experimental electromagnetic therapy techniques, such as those described in Robert O. Becker's The Body Electric. For example, abductee Deanna Dube described for me an abduction-related "regeneration" of her long-damaged heart; had she been familiar with Becker's work,[159] she might have been a bit less rapid to ascribe her healing to otherworldly influences.

Medical breakthroughs often undergo years of testing before their official "discovery." For some of these tests, finding volunteers presents a major obstacle. If we accept the proposition that the Hill incident originated in an external and objective stimulus, we must then ask ourselves which scenario is more likely: Did Betty Hill encounter human beings using a technique ten years ahead of its time? Or did she encounter aliens (reputedly a "billion years ahead of us") using science from eons before their time?

One must also ask why Betty Hill's aliens seemed to have no grasp of basic human concepts (such as how we measure time) — yet they knew enough about us to speak English fluently and had even mastered our slang. Were these real aliens, or humans engaging in theatricals (and occasionally muffing their lines)? For that matter, why did Betty Hill originally recall her abductors as humanoid, only later describing them as aliens?

The Hill case provided a particularly controversial piece of evidence — the celebrated "star map" recalled by Betty Hill under hypnosis. In later years, an Ohio schoolteacher named Marjorie Fish made an ingenious and laudable attempt to discover a match for this map by constructing an elaborate three-dimensional model of nearby star systems; whether she succeeded remains a matter for keen debate.[160] For now, I prefer to avoid taking sides in this dispute and will confine myself to insisting that pro-ET ufologists answer (without resorting to glib ripostes) a point first raised by Jacques Vallee: The map makes no sense as a navigational aid. Vallee notes that, even if we grant the Fish interpretation, the stars are not drawn to scale — and at any rate, alien spaceships would surely be navigated the same way we guide our own spacecraft: via computers and telemetry.[161] The validity of the Fish interpretation is irrelevant; the point is that any such chart would have no value to an interstellar star-farer.

Fish's work raises other controversies: Allegedly, the map points to Zeta Reticuli as the aliens' home system and pictures Zeta Reticuli as a single star, a view consistent with scientific opinion of the 1960s. Yet in later years scientists discovered that Zeta Reticuli is binary.[162] Moreover, how did our abductee manage to remember so accurately a complex chart glimpsed in passing? Even allowing for the possibility of increased accuracy of recollection under hypnotic regression, the memory feat here seems remarkable. Consider the circumstances of the abduction: Kafka on hallucinogens couldn't have conceived of the nightmare vision confronting Betty Hill that night — yet for some reason this particular arrangement of stars emerged as her most intensely-detailed recollection of the experience.

This memory (if not confabulated during regression, a possibility we should always weigh) is comprehensible only as an example of artificially-induced hypermnesia. In other words, Betty Hill was directed to store that chart within her subconscious. The celebrated star map ought to be recognized for what it was: a prop, a seemingly-confirmatory circumstantial detail meant to convince her — and perhaps us — of the reality of her abduction.

The question of motive arises. Why — if my thesis is correct — were these two fairly innocuous individuals chosen for this new variation on the old MKULTRA tricks?

The selection might, of course, have been arbitrary. Or perhaps circumstances now irretrievably lost to history rendered the couple a convenient target. Interestingly, Barney Hill had become acquainted (through church functions) with the head of Air Force intelligence at Pease Air Force Base; perhaps this relationship first brought the Hills to the attention of members of the intelligence community. Arguably, the Hills could have been fingered for a wide variety of reasons; as a general rule, the clandestine services prefer to satisfy a number of itches with one scratch.

In fact, the espionage establishment had one particularly compelling reason to focus on the Hills. Barney Hill (a black man) and his wife held important positions in several civil rights organizations, including the NAACP.[163] The abduction took place during the 1960s, when the NAACP and allied groups fell victim to an increasingly paranoid series of attacks from the FBI and other governmental agencies (under operations COINTELPRO, CHAOS, GARDEN PLOT, etc.).[164] At that time, infiltration of civil rights groups proved a difficult chore; while most left-leaning groups provided easy targets for FBI stooges, the average undercover operative would have had an exceptionally difficult time posing as a black activist. (In 1961, the only black people on the FBI's payroll were the servants in J. Edgar Hoover's home.)

In light of these facts, we should recall Victor Marchetti's anecdote about the cat that the CIA had "wired for sound." Perhaps an ambitious covert scientist proposed a similar experiment, in which a human being would play the role that had once been assigned to the unfortunate feline? As Estabrooks noted, the ultimate espionage agent would be the spy who doesn't know he is a spy. Barney Hill, a well-regarded figure with a near-genius-level IQ, was a safe bet to obtain a leadership role in any group he joined; he would have been remarkably well-positioned, had any outsiders wished to use his ears to overhear prominent black organizers in confidential discussion.

Of course, many intelligence professionals would counter this suggestion by reminding us that eavesdroppers on the civil rights movement had plenty of less-flamboyant methods: Bugging, "black bag" jobs, paying for information, etc. The point is valid. But if the technology to create a "human bug" was developed circa 1961 — and there is documentation suggesting that such was indeed the case[165] — the intelligence agencies would surely have wanted to test the possibilities in the field. And considering the expense of such a test, why not conduct the experiment in such a way as to reap the maximum benefits? Why not choose a Barney Hill?

Arms and the Abductee

Budd Hopkins told the following story during his lecture at the Los Angeles "Whole Life Expo."[166] He considers the case "very good...lots of corroborating witnesses for parts of it." Though not, presumably, for this part:

Hopkins' informant, after the by-now familiar UFO abduction, was given a gun by the aliens. Not a Buck Rogers laser weapon — this was something Dirty Harry might have packed.

The abductee was also given someone to shoot. Not a little grey alien — another human being, tied to a chair. The "visitors" told their armed abductee that this captive had done "evil on the earth, and he's a bad person. You have to kill him." If the abductee didn't do as asked, he would never leave the ship.

The captive proclaimed his innocence, and pleaded for his life. The abductee, caught in the middle of all this, became quite upset. (Worth noting: he seems to have at least considered the aliens' request to shoot someone he had never met.) Ultimately, the abductee turned the gun on the aliens, and said, "Nobody's going to get shot here."

According to Hopkins, "The aliens said 'Fine. Very good.' They took the gun from him; the man [presumably, the captive] got up, walked away, disappeared, and they went on to the next thing." Obviously, this little drama had been staged — a test of some sort.

I submit that this surreal incident is incomprehensible as either an example of alien incursion or of "Klassical" confabulation. The scenario described here exactly parallels numerous experiments in the hypnotic induction of anti-social action as revealed both in the standard hypnosis literature and in declassified ARTICHOKE/MKULTRA documents. For example, compare Hopkins' account to the following, in which Ludwig Mayer, a prominent German hypnosis researcher, describes a classic experiment in the hypnotic induction of criminal action:

I gave a revolver to an elderly and readily suggestible man whom I had just hypnotized. The revolver had just been loaded by Mr. H. with a percussion cap. I explained to [the subject], while pointing to Mr. H., that Mr. H. was a very wicked man whom he should shoot to kill. With great determination he took the revolver and fired a shot directly at Mr. H. Mr. H. fell down pretending to be wounded. I then explained to my subject that the fellow was not yet quite dead, and that he should give him another bullet, which he did without further ado. [167]

Of course, if a conservative hypnosis specialist were asked to comment on the above account, he would quickly point out that hypnotic suggestions which work in an experimental situation would not easily succeed outside the laboratory; on some level, the subject will probably sense whether or not he's playing the game for real.[168] Similarly, a conservative abduction researcher would, in reviewing Hopkins' material, emphasize the problems inherent in using testimony derived during regression, where the threat of confabulation lurks. I'll concede both arguments — for the moment — only to insist that they are beside the point. The matter of primary importance, the sticking point which neither Klass nor Hopkins can comfortably confront, is the convergence of detail between Mayer's hypnosis experiment and the testing event related by Hopkins' abductee. Why are these two stories so similar? Did the good Dr. Mayer take pupils from Sirius?[169]

Hopkins says he knows of other instances in which abductees found themselves in similar crucibles. So do I.

One person I spoke to can remember (sans hypnosis) being handed a gun inside a ziplock baggy, and receiving instructions that she will have to use this weapon "on a job." Early in my interviews with her (and with no prompting from me) she recited an apparent cue drilled into her consciousness by the "entities" (as she calls them): "When you see the light, you will do it tonight," followed by the command, "Execute." (One can only speculate as to how such commands would be used in the field; we will discuss later the use of photovoltaic hypnotic induction.) Though her personal feelings toward firearms are decidedly negative, she vividly describes periods in her "everyday" life when she feels an uncharacteristic, yet overpowering urge to be near a gun — a quasi-sexual desire to pick one up and touch the metal.[170]

She is not alone. Another has been so affected by gun fever that he became a security guard, just to be near the things.[171] The abductees I have spoken to connect this sudden surge of Ramboism to the UFO experience. But I suggest that the UFO experience may be merely a cover story for another type of training entirely.

One of the primary goals of BLUEBIRD, ARTICHOKE, and MKULTRA was to determine whether mind control could be used to facilitate "executive action" — i.e., assassination.[172]

It isn't difficult to imagine the media's reaction if a public figure were murdered by someone acting at the behest of the "space brothers." Who would dare to speak of conspiracy under such circumstances? The hidden controllers could choose a myth structure that conforms to the abductee's personality, then pose as higher beings, who would whisper violence into the ear of the percipient. Using this ruse, the trick that scientists such as Ludwig Mayer could perform in the lab might now be accomplished in the field. As Estabrooks' associate Jack Tracktir (professor of hypnotherapy at Baylor University) explained to John Marks, anti-social acts can be induced with “no conscience involved” once the proper pretext has been created.[173]

“They Will Think It’s Flying Saucers”

Jenny Randles contributes an anecdote from Great Britain which dovetails nicely with this hypothesis.

In 1965, “Margary” (a pseudonym) lived in Birmingham with her husband, who one night told her to prepare her for a “shock and a test.” As Randles describes what she calls a “rogue case”:

They got into his car and drove off, although her memory of the trip became hazy and confused and she does not know where they went. Then she was in a room that was dimly lit and there were people standing around a long table or flat bed. She was out on it and seemed “drugged” and unable to resist. The most memorable of the men was tall and thin with a long nose and white beard. He had thick eyebrows and supposedly said to Margary, “Remember the eyebrows, honey.” A strange medical examination, using odd equipment, was performed on her.

Both the husband and the scientists, using (apparently) hypnotic techniques, flooded her mind with images that, she was told, would be understood only in the future. According to Randles, “At one point one of the ‘examiners’ in the room said to Margary in a tone that made it seem as if he were amused, ‘They will think it’s flying saucers.’” The husband also revealed that he had a second identity. After the abduction, this husband (am I going too far to assume his employment with MI6 or some cognate agency?) left, never to be seen again.[174] Margary did not recall the abduction until 1978.

This affair can only baffle a researcher who insists on fitting all abduction accounts into the ET hypothesis; once we free ourselves from that set of assumptions, explanations come easily. I interpret this incident as a case in which the controllers applied the flying saucer cover story sloppily, or to an insufficiently receptive subject. If my thesis is correct, the UFO “hypnotic hoax” technique would still have been fairly new in 1965, particularly outside the United States; perhaps the manipulators hadn’t yet got the hang of it. The odd comment about the scientist’s eyebrows may refer to an item of disguise donned for the occasion. The unscrupulous hypnotist, unsure about his ability to induce an impenetrable amnesia — and mindful of the price paid by his forerunners in mesmeric criminality[175] — would understandably want to hedge his bets; by indulging in the British penchant for theatrics, he could further protect his anonymity.

A similar incident was brought to my attention by researcher Robert Durant. The relevant excerpt of his letter follows:

“Now I want to turn to a case that I have been investigating for several months. The subject is an abductee. Standard abduction scenario. Twice regressed under hypnosis, the first time by a well-known abduction researcher, the second time by a psychologist with parapsychology connections.

In the course of many hours of listening to the subject, I discovered that she has had close personal contact over a long period of time with several individuals who have federal intelligence connections. She was hypnotized many years ago as part of a TV program devoted to hypnosis. Her abductions began shortly after she attended several long sessions at a laboratory where, ostensibly, she was being tested for ESP abilities. Two other people who were “tested” at this same laboratory have also had abductions. All three were told by the lab to join a local UFO group. During her abductions, the principal alien spoke to the subject in the English language in a normal manner, not via telepathy. She recognized the voice, which was at one time that of her very close friend of yesteryear who was then and is now employed by the CIA. The other voice was that of an individual who works in Washington, has what I will call very strong federal connections as well as a finger in just about every ufological pie, and who just happened to bump into her at the aforementioned laboratory. He also anticipated, in the course of telephone conversations, her abductions. When the subject confronted him about this and the voice, he claimed to be psychic.” (!)[176]

The “ESP” connection is suggestive; the MKULTRA documents betray an astonishing interest on the part of the intelligence agencies in matters parapsychological.

Some researchers would object that examples such as this are rare; most abductions contain no such overt indications of intelligence involvement. But have investigators looked for them? As mentioned in the introduction, a false dichotomy limits much ufological thought; as long as the abduction argument swings between the ET hypothesis and purely psychological theories, researchers will not recognize the relevance of certain key items of background data.

Glimpses of the Controllers

In an interview with me, a northern-California abductee — call him "Peter" — reported an experience which was conducted not by a small grey alien, but by a human being. The percipient called this man a "doctor." He gave a description of this individual, and even provided a drawing.

Some time after I gathered this information, a southern-California abductee told me her story — which included a description of this very same "doctor." The physical details were so strikingly similar as to erase coincidence. This woman is a leading member of a Los Angeles-based UFO group; three other women in this group report abduction encounters with the same individual.[177]

Perhaps those three women were fantasists, attaching themselves to another's narrative. But my northern informant never met these people. Why did he describe the same "doctor"?

One of the abductees I have dealt with insisted, under hypnosis, that her abduction experience brought her to a certain house in the Los Angeles area. She was able to provide directions to the house, even though she had no conscious memory of ever being there. I later learned that this house is indeed occupied by a scientist who formerly (and perhaps currently) conducted clandestine research on mind control technology.

This same abductee described a clandestine brain operation of some sort she underwent in childhood. The neurosurgeon was a human being, not an alien. She even recalled the name. (Note: This is not the same individual referred to above.) When I heard the name, it meant nothing to me — but later I learned that there really was a scientist of that name who specialized in electrode implant research.

Licia Davidson is a thoughtful and articulate abductee, whose fascinating story closely parallels many found in the abductee literature — except for one unusual detail. In an interview with me, she described an unsettling recollection of a human being, dressed normally, holding a black box with a protruding antenna. This odd snippet of memory did not coincide with the general thrust of her abduction narrative. Could this remembrance represent an all-too-brief segment of accurately-perceived reality interrupting her hypnotically-induced "screen memory"? Peter clearly recalls seeing a similar box during his abduction.

Interestingly, Licia resides in the Los Angeles suburb of Tujunga Canyon, a prominent spot on the abduction map: Many of the abductees I have spoken to first had unusual experiences while living in this area. Near Tujunga Canyon, in Mt. Pacifico, is a hidden former Nike missile base; more than one abductee has described odd, seemingly inexplicable military activity around this location.[178] The reader will recall the connection of Nike missile bases to the disturbing story of Dr. L. Jolyon West, a veteran of MKULTRA.

Cults

Some abductees I have spoken to have been directed to join certain religious/philosophical sects. These cults often bear close examination.

The leaders of these groups tend to be "ex"-CIA operatives, or Special Forces veterans. They are often linked through personal relations, even though they espouse widely varying traditions. I have heard unsettling reports that the leaders of some of these groups have used hypnosis, drugs, or "mind machines" on their charges. Members of these cults have reported periods of missing time during ceremonies or "study periods."

I strongly urge abduction researchers to examine closely any small "occult" groups an abductee might join. For example, one familiar leader of the UFO fringe — a man well-known for his espousal of the doctrine of "love and light" — is Virgil Armstrong, a close personal friend of General John Singlaub, the notorious Iran-Contra player, who recently headed the neo-fascist World Anti-Communist League. Armstrong, who also happens to be an ex-Green Beret and former CIA operative, figured into my inquiry in an interesting fashion:

An abductee of my acquaintance was told — by her "entities," naturally — to seek out this UFO spokesman and join his "sky-watch" activities, which, my source alleges, included a mass channelling session intended to send debilitating "negative" vibrations to Constantine Chernenko, then the leader of the Soviet Union. Of course, intracerebral voices may have a purely psychological origin, so Armstrong can hardly be held to task for the abductee's original "directive."[179] Still, his past associations with military intelligence inevitably bring disturbing possibilities to mind.

Even more ominous than possible ties between UFO cults and the intelligence community are the cults' links with the shadowy I AM group, founded by Guy Ballard in the 1930s.[180] According to researcher David Stupple, "If you look at the contactee groups today, you'll see that most of the stable, larger ones are actually neo-I AM groups, with some sort of tie to Ballard's organization."[181] This cult, therefore, bears investigation.

Guy Ballard's "Mighty I AM Religious Activity," grew, in large part, out of William Dudley Pelly's Silver Shirts, an American Nazi organization.[182] Although Ballard himself never openly proclaimed Nazi affiliation, his movement was tinged with an extremely right-wing political philosophy, and in secret meetings he "decreed" the death of President Franklin Roosevelt.[183] The I AM philosophy derived from Theosophy, and, in this author's estimation, bears a more-than-cursory resemblance to the Theosophically-based teachings that informed the proto-Nazi German occult lodges.[184]

After the war, Pelley (who had been imprisoned for sedition during the hostilities) headed an occult-oriented organization called Soulcraft, based in Noblesville, Indiana. Another Soulcraft employee was the controversial contactee George Hunt Williamson (real name: Michel d'Obrenovic), who co-authored UFOs Confidential with John McCoy, a proponent of the theory that a Jewish banking conspiracy was preventing disclosure of the solution to the UFO mystery.[185] Later, Williamson founded the I AM-oriented Brotherhood of the Seven Rays in Peru.[186] Another famed contactee, George Van Tassel, was associated with Pelley and with the notoriously anti-Semitic Reverend Wesley Swift (founder of the group which metamorphosed into the Aryan nations).[187]

The most visible modern offspring of I AM is Elizabeth Clare Prophet's Church Universal and Triumphant, a group best-known for its massive arms caches in underground bunkers. CUT was recently exposed in Covert Action Information Bulletin as a conduit of CIA funds,[188] and according to researcher John Judge, has ties to organizations allied to the World Anti-Communist League.[189] Prophet is becoming involved in abduction research and has sponsored presentations by Budd Hopkins and other prominent investigators. In his book The Armstrong Report: ET's and UFO's: They Need Us, We Don't Need Them [sic.][190], Virgil Armstrong directs troubled abductees toward Prophet's group. (Perhaps not insignificantly, he also suggests that abductees plagued by implants alleviate their problem by turning to "the I AM force" within.[191])

Another UFO channeller, Frederick Von Mierers, has promulgated both a cult with a strong I AM orientation[192] and an apparent con-game involving over-appraised gemstones. Mierers is an anti-Semite who contends that the Holocaust never happened and that the Jews control the world's wealth.

UFORUM is a flying saucer organization popular with Los Angeles-area abductees; its founder is Penny Harper, a member of a radical Scientology breakaway group which connects the teachings of L. Ron Hubbard with pronouncements against "The Illuminati" (a mythical secret society) and other betes noir familiar from right-wing conspiracy literature. Harper directs members of her group to read The Spotlight, an extremist tabloid (published by Willis Carto's Liberty Lobby) which denies the reality of the Holocaust and posits a "Zionist" scheme to control the world.[193]

More than one unwary abductee has fallen in with groups such as those listed above. It isn't difficult to imagine how some of these questionable groups might mold an abductee's recollection of his experience — and perhaps help direct his future actions.

Some modern abductees, with otherwise-strong claims, claim encounters with blond, "Nordic" aliens reminiscent of the early contactee era. Surely, the "Nordic" appearance of these aliens sprang from the dubious spiritual tradition of Van Tassell, Ballard, Pelley, McCoy, etc. Why, then, are some modern abductees seeing these very same other-worldly Uebermenschen?

One abductee of my acquaintance claims to have had beneficial experiences with these "blond" aliens — who, he believes, came originally from the Pleiades. Interestingly, in the late 1960s, the psychopathically anti-Semitic Rev. Wesley Swift predicted this odd twist in the abduction tale. In a broadcast "sermon," he spoke at length about UFOs, claiming that there were "good" aliens and "bad" aliens. The good ones, he insisted, were tall, blond Aryans — who hailed from the pleiades. He made this pronouncement long before the current trends in abduction lore.

Could some of the abductions be conducted by an extreme right-wing element within the national security establishment? Disagreeable as the possibility seems, we should note that the "lunatic right" is represented in all other walks of life; certainly hard-rightists have taken positions within the military-intelligence complex as well.

Grounds For Further Research

John Keel's ground-breaking Operation Trojan Horse, written in an era when abductees still came under the category of "contactees," includes the following intriguing data, gleaned from Keel's extensive field work:

Contactees often find themselves suddenly miles from home without knowing how they got there. They either have induced amnesia, wiping out all memory of the trip, or they were taken over by some means and made the trip in a blacked-out state. Should they encounter a friend on the way, the friend would probably note that their eyes seemed glassy and their behavior seemed peculiar. But if the friend spoke to them, he might receive a curt reply.

In the language of the contactees this process is called being used...I have known silent contactees to disappear from their homes for long periods, and when they returned, they had little or no recollection of where they had been. One girl sent me a postcard from the Bahama Islands — which surprised me because I knew she was very poor. When she returned, she told me that she had only one memory of the trip. She said she remembered getting off a jet at an airport — she shouldn't recall getting on the jet or making the trip — and there "Indians" met her and took her baggage...The next thing she knew she was back home again.[194]

Puzzling indeed — unless one has read The Control of Candy Jones, which speaks of Candy's "blacked out" periods, during which she travelled to Taiwan as a CIA courier, adopting her second personality. The mind control explanation perfectly solves all the mysteries in the above excerpt — save, perhaps, the odd remark about "Indians."

Hickson and Mendez' UFO Contact At Pascagoula contains the interesting information that Charles Hickson awakes at night feeling that he is on the verge of re-awakening some terribly important memory connected with his encounter — yet ostensibly he can account for every moment of his adventure.

Hickson also received a letter from an apparent abductee who claims that the grey aliens are actually automatons of some sort — perhaps an unconscious recognition of the unreality of the hypnotically-induced "cover story."[195] In this light, the film version of Communion — whose screenplay was written by Whitley Strieber — takes on a new interest: The abduction sequences contain inexplicable images indicating that the "greys" are really props, or masks.

Communion and Transformation contain passages detailing what seems to be a hazily-recalled Candy-Jones-style espionage adventure, in which Strieber was shanghaied by a "coach" and a "nurse" (both human beings) who apparently drugged him.[196] Recall the example of Keel's informants. Moreover, Transformation contains lengthy descriptions of alien beings working in apparent collusion with human beings.

Abductee Christa Tilton also recalls both human beings and aliens playing a part in her experience. Ever since her abduction, she claims, she has been "shadowed" by a mysterious federal agent she calls John Wallis.[197] Christa's husband, Tom Adams, has confirmed Wallis' existence.[198]

In his Report On Communion, Ed Conroy — who seems to have become a participant in, and not merely an observer of, the phenomenon — describes harassment by helicopters, which as we have already noted, seems to be quite a common occurrence in abductee situations.[199] Researchers blithely assume that these incidents represent governmental attempts to spy on UFO percipients. But this assertion is ridiculous. Helicopters are extremely expensive to operate, and the engines of espionage have perfected numerous alternative methods to gather information. After all, we now have a fairly extensive bibliography of FBI, CIA, and military efforts to spy on numerous movements favoring domestic social change. Why have no veterans of CHAOS or COINTELPRO (either victim or victimizer) spoken of helicopters? Obviously the choppers serve some other purpose beyond mere surveillance. One possibility might be the propagation of electromagnetic waves which might affect the perceptions/ behaviors of an implanted individual. (Indeed, I have heard rumors of helicopters being used in electronic "crowd control" operations in Vietnam and elsewhere; alas, the information is far from hard.)

Contactee Eldon Kerfoot has written of his suspicions that human manipulators, not aliens, may be the ultimate puppeteers engineering his experiences. He describes a sudden compulsion to kill a fellow veteran of the Korean conflict — a man Kerfoot had no logical reason to distrust or dislike, yet whom he "sensed" to have been a traitor to his country. Fortunately, the assassination never materialized.[200] But the situation exactly parallels incidents described in released ARTICHOKE documents concerning the remote hypnotic induction of anti-social behavior.

One last speculation:

Renato Vesco's Intercept But Don't Shoot[201] outlines a fascinating scenario for the "secret weapon" hypothesis of UFOs. Vesco points out that if these devices are one day to be used in a superpower conflict, the attacking power would be well-served by the myth of the UFO as an extra-terrestrial craft, for the besieged nation would not know the true nature of its opponent. Perhaps, then, one purpose of the UFO abductions is to engender and maintain the legend of the little grey aliens. For the hidden manipulators, the abductions could be, in and of themselves, a propaganda coup.

Final Thoughts

I do not insist dogmatically on the scenario that I have outlined. I do not wish to dissuade abduction researchers from exploring other avenues — indeed, I strongly encourage such work to continue. Nor can I easily account for some aspects of the abduction narratives — for example, any suggestions I could offer concerning the reports of genetic experimentation would be extremely speculative.

But I do insist on a fair hearing of this hypothesis. Criticism is encouraged; that which does not destroy my thesis will make it stronger. I ask only that my critics refrain from intellectual laziness; mere differences in world-view do not constitute a valid attack. God is found in the details.

I recognize the dangers inherent in making this thesis public. New and distressing abductee confabulations may result. I would prefer that the audience for this paper be restricted to abduction researchers, not victims, who might be unduly influenced. However, in a society that prides itself on its ostensibly free press, such restrictions are unthinkable. Therefore, I can only beg any abduction victims who might read this paper to attempt a superhuman objectivity. The thesis I have outlined is promising, and (should trepanation ever provide us with an example of an actual abductee implant) susceptible of proof. But mine is not the only hypothesis. The abductee's unrewarding task is to report what he or she has experienced as truthfully as possible, untainted by outside speculation.

Whether or not future investigation proves UFO abductions to be a product of mind control experimentation, I feel that this paper has, at least, provided evidence of a serious danger facing those who hold fast to the ideals of individual freedom. We cannot long ignore this menace.

A spectre haunts the democratic nations — the spectre of technofascism. All the powers of the espionage empire and the scientific establishment have entered into an unholy alliance to evoke this spectre: Psychiatrist and spy, Dulles and Delgado, microwave specialists and clandestine operators.

Selected Bibliography on Mind Control

Acid Dreams, by Martin A. Lee and Bruce Shlain (Grove, 1985). Outstanding work on MKULTRA and drugs.

The Body Electric, by Robert Becker (Morrow, 1985). Important.

The Brain Changers, by Maya Pines (Signet, 1973). Outdated, but an excellent chapter on the stimoceiver and related technologies.

Brain Control, by Elliot Valenstein (John Wiley and Sons, 1973). Highly conservative; outdated; still worth reading.

CIA Papers, compiled by the Capitol Information Associates (POB 8275, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 48107). Interesting selection of MKULTRA documents.

The Control of Candy Jones, by Donald Bain (Playboy Press, 1976). Mandatory reading.

Human Drug Testing By the CIA, hearings before the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research of the Committee On Human Resources, United States Senate (Government Printing Office, 1977).

Hypnotism, by George Estabrooks (Dutton, 1957). See especially the chapters on hypnosis in warfare and crime. Some modern experts in clinical hypnosis decry Estabrooks' work. These "experts" tend to have a history of funding by CIA cut-outs and military intelligence. I suspect they denounce Estabrooks not because his work was shoddy, but because he let the cat out of the bag.

Individual Rights and the Federal Role in Behavior Modification, by the Staff of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee of the Judiciary, United States Senate (Government Printing Office, 1974).

Megabrain, by Michael Hutchison (Ballantine, 1986). The only popular book on modern mind machines.

Messengers of Deception, by Jacques Vallee (And/Or, 1979). Vallee has been criticized, correctly, for including in this book invented "conversations" with a composite character he calls Major Murphy. But the section on cults in this book bears a haunting resemblance to stories I have heard in my own investigations.

The Mind Manipulators, by Opton and Scheflin (Paddington Press, 1978). Conservative, but extremely useful as a reference work.

Mind Wars, by Ronald McCrae (St. Martin's Press, 1984).

Operation Mind Control, by Walter Bowart (Dell, 1978). The best single volume on the subject. Difficult to find; indeed, this book's rapid disappearance from bookstores and libraries has aroused the suspicions of some researchers. (Tom Davis Books, POB 1107, Aptos, CA 95001, carries this work.)

Physical Control of the Mind, by Jose Delgado (Harper and Row, 1969). Outdated; still essential.

Project MKULTRA, joint hearing before the Select Committee On Health and Scientific Research of the Committee On Human Resources, United States Senate (Government Printing Office, 1977).

Psychic Warfare: Fact or Fiction? edited by John White (Aquarian, 1988). See especially Michael Rossman's contribution.

Psychotechnology, Robert L. Schwitzgebel and Ralph K. Schwitzgebel (Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, 1973).

The Scientist, by John Lilly (expanded edition: Ronin, 1988). Bizarre — Lilly is an ex-"brainwashing" specialist who claims to be in contact with aliens. Is he controlled or controlling?

The Search for the “Manchurian Candidate”, by John Marks (Bantam, 1978). An invaluable book. However, many people have made the mistake of assuming it tells the full story. It does not.

Were We Controlled? by Lincoln Lawrence (University Books, 1967). Explores possible connections to the JFK assassination. Dr. Petter Lindstrom’s endorsement of this work makes it mandatory reading.

Who Killed John Lennon? by Fenton Bresler (St. Martin’s Press, 1989). Interesting thesis concerning the possible use of mind control on Mark David Chapman. Better in its analysis of Chapman than in its history of mind control. In my own work, I have encountered data which may help confirm Bresler’s theory.

The Zapping of America, by Paul Brodeur. (MacLeod [Canadian edition] 1976). Contains a good chapter on microwave mind control technology.

The important stories of Martti Koski and Robert Naeslund can be obtained by sending three dollars to: Martti Koski, Kiilinpellontie 2, 21290 Rusko, FINLAND. Koski’s description of his “programming” sessions should not be taken at face value: We cannot always trust the perception of someone whose perception has been altered. His research into the technology of mind control is solid.

CIA apologists often proclaim that “brainwashing” research ceased in either 1962 or 1972; these blandishments refer to the TSS projects, not to the ORD work, which remains terra incognita for independent researchers. Marks discovered that the ORD research was so voluminous that retrieving documents via FOIA would have proven unthinkably expensive.

At this writing, both Strieber and Hopkins report initially promising results in their efforts to document the presence of these “extras” in abductees.
[24]. Allegedly, the experiment took place in 1964. However, in Were We Controlled? (New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1967), the pseudonymous “Lincoln Lawrence” makes an interesting argument (on page 36) that the demonstration took place some years earlier.

[32]. Of course, this suggestion raises the knotty question of whether the abductees suffer from a form of schizophrenia, which may also be characterized by “voices.” I refer the reader to the work of Hopkins, Strieber, Thomas Bullard, and others who have described the difficulties of ascribing all abductions to psychotic states.

The decisions of the [CIA] Director, who must of course be familiar with 'the whole picture,' as judges are not, are worthy of great deference...it is conceivable that the mere explanation of why information must be withheld can convey valuable information to a foreign intelligence agency.” How do we square this continuing need for secrecy with the CIA's protestations that MKULTRA achieved little success, that the studies were conducted within the Nuremberg statutes governing medical experiments, and that the research was made available in the open literature?

After the trance was removed, Sirhan was shown tapes of his actions; he insisted that he “acted like a monkey” of his own free will — he claimed he wanted the exercise.

Margaret Cheney's Tesla: A Man Out of Time (New York: Dell, 1981), the most reliable book in the sea of wild speculation surrounding this extraordinary scientist, confirms Tesla's early work with the psychological effects of electromagnetic radiation. See especially pages 101-104; note also the afterword, in which we learn that certain government agencies have kept important research by Tesla hidden from the general public.

[98]. Marks mentions, in a letter to Orne, the latter's claim to have been an unwitting participant in subproject 84. Yet the papers released concerning subproject 84 clearly establish the Agency's willingness to put Orne in the know; Orne's letter admitted to Marks that he was made aware of his CIA sponsorship (Marks, The Search for the “Manchurian Candidate”, 172-173). In an interview with Marks, Orne discounted the story of Candy Jones (which we shall recount later) by insisting that if such an experiment had occurred “someone in some agency would have come to me.” Why would they come to him about a super-secret project, unless Orne had a high security clearance and worked extensively with intelligence agencies? Note also that Orne conducted extensive studies for the Office of Naval Research from June 1, 1968 to May 31, 1971. He has also been funded by DARPA. Moreover, I consider noteworthy the fact that Orne somehow became president of the Society for Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis despite the fact that the organization had decided not to have a president. (This fact was related to Marks by a prominent hypnosis specialist in an off-the-record interview that I probably wasn't supposed to see.)

[99]. The story has been told many times. See Turner and Christian's The Killing of Robert F. Kennedy, 207-208; also Peter J. Reiter, Antisocial or Criminal Acts and Hypnosis (Springfield, Illinois: Charles C. Thomas, 1958).

This argument strikes me as semantic quibbling.

I should like to hear what innocent explanation, if any, the Air Force has to offer to explain their interest in post-hypnotic amnesia.

[112]. Klass argues that ufologists, in conducting hypnotic regression sessions, inadvertently cue their subjects. A close reading of his text reveals that he never proves or claims that such “cues” have taken place in any individual instance; he simply believes that cueing might have occurred. Had Klass been more willing to deal with abductees directly, he might have found evidence of cause and effect; as it stands, his argument really amounts to no more than a suggestion. For all that, I find his ideas regarding the running of “clean” hypnotic regression sessions potentially valuable.

[118]. Or could her marriage have been part of the program? “Long John,” as he was popularly known, was famous in UFO circles, and had provided a forum for such early-day contactees as Howard Menger. He also knew Jackie Gleason, a prominent (if unlikely) name in the “crashed disk” rumor vaults. Could Candy have been assigned to discover what Nebel knew?

[119]. Marks files. John Marks did excellent work on the Candy Jones story; he erred — almost unforgivably — on the side of conservatism when he refused to include information about this incident in his book. I know the name of the institute involved; however, since Candy saw fit to keep this aspect of her story secret (probably for sound legal reasons), I shall follow her lead.

[121]. Interviews, Marks files. One of Marks' informants offered the interesting speculation that Candy's torture sessions were not conducted in the field, but in the lab — her entire mission might have been a hypno-programmed fantasy.
[122]. The information about Candy's CIA files stems from a telephone interview with Candy Jones. A problem looms here: CIA cover stories unravel like the skin of an onion; once you remove the outer layer, the next lie is revealed. In the case of Candy Jones, the substrata of buncombe involves allegations that she willingly complied with the CIA, and used Jensen's hypnosis experiments as a rationalization for her compliance. Such is the explanation offered by certain of Marks' informants; alas, Opton and Scheflin seem to have bought this line. Anyone familiar with the vile acts of self-degradation to which Candy's programmers subjected her will laugh this story out of court. No one, short of a severely psychotic masochist, would willingly undergo what she went through.

[125]. Recently, ufologist Jim Moseley, an acquaintance of Candy's, has claimed that an unidentified source on the Nebel's "inner circle" once, off-the-record, pronounced Candy's story "a crock." This assertion deserves careful and respectful consideration. Still, Moseley won't identify his source, and we have no way of telling if this insider spoke from instinct or certain knowledge, or indeed, what he really meant. Did he feel Candy was fantasizing or fibbing? If the former, why did her hallucinations match details of MKULTRA released only after publication of her book? If the latter, how are we to explain the many hypnotic regression tapes, at least some of which were made available to outside investigators? (Fairly elaborate, for a hoax.) In any case, how could Candy have known the fact (confirmed by Marks' associates) that Kroger taught "Jensen" at a certain West-coast institute? Why, if the story was "a crock," would Candy risk libel suits by naming — to associates and investigators, if not to the general public — real-life hypnotherapists? All in all, I would suggest that Moseley's "insider" was speaking glibly, and did not know the true facts.

[131]. One was ritually abused in an occult setting. If I were a "spy-chiatrist" scouting potential fodder for mind control experiments, I would seek out abused children from military families. (A military background would ensure that the "right" doctor gets access to the child.) Abduction researchers should look for such a pattern.
[132]. I refer here to the vast upsurge in alien abductions which took place that year; see generally Kevin Randle, The October Scenario (Middle Coast, 1988). Of course, abductions (or, according to my hypothesis, disguised mind control operations) occurred previous to this year.

Moreover, one of the few pages released on MKULTRA subproject 119 concerns “a critical review of the literature and scientific developments related to the recording, analysis and interpretation of bioelectric signals from the human organism, and activation of human behavior by remote means.” The review took place in 1960-61. The reader will forgive me for severing relations with this abductee before completing an investigation; she keeps a mini-armory next to her bed.

FOREWARD

In my career as a professional intelligence officer, I had many occasions to access highly classified documents, but during service as a political science officer in the field in Angola, West Africa, I had the opportunity to view a series of top secret classified documents which were unusually explicit. What I saw filled me with anger and resentment and launched me on a course from which I have not deviated, namely to uncover what power it is that controls and manages the British and United States governments.

I was thoroughly familiar with all of the well known secret societies such as the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA), the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), the Bilderbergers, Trilaterals, the Zionists, Freemasonry, Bolshevism-Rosicrucianism and all of the spinoffs of these secret societies. As an intelligence officer, and even before that as a young student in the course of my studies at the British Museum in London, I had cut my eye teeth on all of them, plus a good number of others with whom I imagined Americans were familiar.

But when I came to the United States in 1969, I found that names like the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, Club of Rome the German Marshall Fund, the Cini Foundation, the Round Table, the Fabianists, the Venetian Black Nobility, the Mont Pelerin Society, Hellfire Clubs, and many others were at best totally unknown here, or else their true functions were at best but poorly understood, if at all.

In 1969-1970 set about remedying the situation in a series of monographs and cassette tapes. Much to my surprise I soon found plenty of people willing to quote these names as if they had known of them all of their writing careers, but who were not in the least bit knowledgeable about the subjects, yet quite unwilling to state the source of their lately acquired information. I consoled myself with the thought that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery.

I pursued my investigations, pressing on in the face of severe risks, attacks on myself and my wife, financial losses, continual harassment, threats and calumny, all part of a carefully-crafted and orchestrated program to discredit me, run by government agents and informers, embedded in the so-called Christian rightwing, the "Identity Movement" and rightwing "patriotic" groups. These agents operated, and still operate, under cover of strong and fearless outspoken opposition to Judaism their main enemy, they would have us believe. These agent-informers are led and controlled by a group of homosexuals who are well-liked and well-respected by political and religious conservatives all across the United States.

Their program of calumny, lies and hatred, disinformation about my work, even lately attributing it to other writers, continues unabated but it has not had the desired effect. I shall carry on with my task until I have finally ripped off the mask of the entire secret upper-level parallel government that runs Britain and the U.S. This book is a part of that ongoing effort.

AN OVERVIEW AND SOME CASE HISTORIES

Certainly a fair number of us are aware that the people running our government are not the people who are really in control of political and economic matters, domestic and foreign. This has led many to seek the truth in the alternative press, those newsletter writers who, like me, have sought, but not always found what it is that is making the United States terminally ill. "Seek and ye shall find" has not always been the case with this group. What we did find was that the people walk in great darkness, mostly not caring or bothering to find out where their country is headed, firm in the belief that it will always be there for them. This is the way the largest population group has been manipulated to react, and their attitude plays right into the hands of the secret government.

We frequently hear about "they " doing this, that or the other. "They" seem literally to be able to get away with murder. "They" increase taxes, send our sons and daughters to die in wars that do not benefit our country. "They" seem above our reach, out of sight, frustratingly nebulous when it comes to taking action against "them." No one seems able to clearly identify who "they" are. It is a situation that has pertained for decades. During the course of this book, we shall identify the mysterious "they" and then, after that, it is up to the people to remedy their situation.

On 30th April 1981, I wrote a monograph disclosing the existence of the Club of Rome identifying it as a Committee of 3OO subversive body. This was the first mention of both of these organizations in the United States. I warned readers not to be fooled by the feeling that the article was far-fetched and I drew a parallel between my article and the warning issued by the Bavarian government when the secret plans of the Illuminati fell into its hands. We shall return to the Club of Rome and the role of the Committee of 300 in U.S. affairs later herein.

Many of the predictions made in that 1981 article have since come to pass, such as the unknown Felipe Gonzalez becoming prime minister of Spain, and Mitterand being returned to power in France; the downfall of Giscard D' Estang and Helmut Schmidt, the return to power of Swedish nobleman and Committee of 300 member Olaf Palme, the nullifying of Reagan's presidency and the destruction of our steel, auto and housing industries in terms of the post-industrial zero-growth order handed down by the Committee of 300.

The importance of Palme lies in the use made of him by the Club of Rome to deliver technology to the Soviet Union on the forbidden list of the U.S. Customs, and Palme's world-wide communications network employed to train the spotlight on the phony Iran hostage crisis, while he shuttled back and forth between Washington and Teheran in an effort to undermine the sovereign integrity of the U.S. and place the phony crisis in the realm of a Committee of 300 institution, viz, the World Court at The Hague, Holland.

In what is in fact an open conspiracy against God and man, which includes enslaving the majority of humans left on this earth after wars, plagues and mass-murder have done with them is not well hidden. In the intelligence community, it is taught that the best way to hide something is to place it in open view. As an example of the foregoing, when Germany wanted to hide its prize new Messerschmidt fighter plane in 1938, the aircraft was put on display at the Paris Air Show. While secret agents and spies were collecting information from hollow tree trunks and from behind loose bricks in a wall, the information they sought was staring them right in the face.

The upper-level parallel secret government does not operate from dank basements and secret underground chambers. It places itself in full view in the White House, Congress and in Number 10 Downing Street and the Houses of Parliament. It is akin to those weird and supposedly terrifying "monster" films, where the monster appears with distorted features, long hair and even longer teeth, growling and slavering all over the place. This is distraction, the REAL MONSTERS wear business suits and drive to work on Capitol Hill in limousines.

These men are IN OPEN VIEW. These men are the servants of the One World Government-New World Order. Like the rapist who stops to offer his victim a friendly ride, he does not LOOK like the monster he is. If he did, his intended victim would run off screaming in fright. The same applies to government at all levels. President Bush does not LOOK like a dutiful servant of the upper-level parallel government, but make no mistake about it, he is as much a MONSTER as are those horrors found in horror-movies.

Stop for a moment and consider how President Bush ordered the brutal slaying of 150,000 Iraqi troops, in a convoy of military vehicles carrying white flags, on their way back to Iraq under Geneva Convention rules of agreed disengagement and withdrawal. Imagine the horror of the Iraqi troops when, in spite of waving their white flags, they were mowed down by American aircraft. In another part of the front, 12,000 Iraqi soldiers were buried alive in trenches they occupied. Is that not MONSTROUS in the truest sense of the word? From where did President Bush get his orders to act in this MONSTROUS fashion? He got them from the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA) who received its mandate from the Committee of 300, also known as the "Olympians."

As we shall see, even the "Olympians" do not hide their faces. Often times they put on a show which could be likened to the Paris Air Show, even as conspiracy buffs spend their time in fruitless searching in the wrong places and in the wrong direction. Note how the Queen, Elizabeth II, performs the ceremonial opening of the British Parliament? There, in full view is the head of the Committee of 300. Have you ever witnessed the swearing-in ceremony of a United States President? There in full view is another member of the Committee of 300. The problem is only one of perception.

Who are the conspirators who serve the mighty all-powerful Committee of 300? The better-informed of our citizens are aware that there is a conspiracy and that the conspiracy goes under various names such as the Illuminati, Freemasonry, the Round Table, the Milner Group. To them the CFR and the Trilaterals represent most of what they do not like in regard to domestic and foreign policy. Some even know that the Round Table has a big input into United States affairs through the British ambassador in Washington. The problem is that real hard information on the treasonous activities of members of the invisible Government is very hard to come by.

I quote the profound statement made by the prophet Hosea, which is found in the Christian Bible: "My people perish for lack of knowledge." Some may already have heard my expose of the foreign aid scandal, in which work I named several conspiratorial organizations, whose number is legion. Their final objective was the overthrow of the U.S. Constitution and the merging of this country, chosen by God as HIS country, with a godless One World-New World Order Government which will return the world to conditions far worse than existed in the Dark Ages.

Let us talk about actual case histories, the attempt to communize and deindustrialize Italy. The Committee of 300 long ago decreed that there shall be a smaller—much smaller—and better world, that is, their idea of what constitutes a better world. the myriads of useless eaters consuming scarce natural resources were to be culled. Industrial progress supports population growth. Therefore the command to multiply and subdue the earth found in Genesis had to be subverted.

This called for an attack upon Christianity; the slow but sure disintegration of industrial nation states; the destruction of hundreds of millions of people, referred to by the Committee of 300 as "surplus population," and the removal of any leader who dared to stand in the way of the Committee's global planning to reach the foregoing objectives.

Two of the Committee's earliest targets were Italy and Pakistan. The late Aldo Moro, Prime Minister of Italy, was one leader who opposed "zero growth" and population reductions planned for his country, thereby incurring the wrath of the Club of Rome commissioned by the "Olympians" to carry out its policies in this regard. In a Rome courtroom on November 1Oth, 1982, a close friend of Moro's testified that the former prime minister was threatened by an agent of the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA) who is also a Committee of 300 member while he was still the U.S. Secretary of State. The meteoric rise of the man the witness named as Kissinger will be dealt with later.

It will be recalled that Prime Minister Moro was kidnaped by the Red Brigades in 1978 and subsequently brutally shot to death.

It was at the trial of members of the Red Brigades that several of them testified to the fact that they knew of high-level U.S. involvement in the plot to kill Moro. When threatening Moro, Kissinger was obviously not carrying out U.S. foreign policy, but rather acting according to instructions received from the Club of Rome, the foreign-policy arm of the Committee of 3OO.

The witness who delivered the bombshell in open court was a close associate of Moro's, Gorrado Guerzoni. His explosive testimony was broadcast over Italian television and radio on November lOth, 1982, and printed in several Italian newspapers yet this vital information was suppressed in the U.S. Those famous bastions of freedom with a compelling right to know, the Washington Post and the New York Times, did not think it important to even print a single line of Guerzoni's testimony.

Nor was the news carried by any of the wire services or television stations. The fact that Italy's Aldo Moro had been a leading politician for decades, and who was kidnaped in broad daylight in the spring of 1978, all of his bodyguards butchered in cold blood, was not deemed newsworthy, even though Kissinger stood accused as an accomplice to these crimes? Or was the silence BECAUSE of Kissinger's involvement?

In my 1982 expose of this heinous crime, I demonstrated that Aldo Moro, a loyal member of the Christian Democrat Party, was murdered by assassins controlled by P2 Masonry with the object of bringing Italy into line with Club of Rome orders to deindustrialize the country and considerably reduce its population. Moro's plans to stabilize Italy through full employment and industrial and political peace would have strengthened Catholic opposition to Communism and made the destabilization of the Middle East—a prime goal—that much harder.

From the foregoing it becomes clear just how far ahead the conspirators plan. They do not think in terms of a Five Year Plan. One needs to go back to Weishaupt's statements about the early Catholic Church to understand what was involved in the murder of Aldo Moro. Moro's death removed the roadblocks to the plans to destabilize Italy, and as we now know, enabled conspiracy plans for the Middle East to be carried out in the Gulf War 14 years later.

Italy was chosen as a test-target by the Committee of 300. Italy is important to the conspirators' plans because it is the closest European country to the Middle East linked to Middle East economics and politics. It is also the home of the Catholic Church, which Weishaupt ordered destroyed, and home for some of Europe's most powerful top oligarchical families of the ancient Black Nobility. Should Italy have been weakened by Moro's death, it would have had repercussions in the Middle East which would have weakened U.S. influence in the region. Italy is important for another reason; it is a gateway for drugs entering Europe from Iran and Lebanon, and we shall return to that subject in due course.

Various groups had combined under the name of socialism to bring about the downfall of several Italian governments since the Club of Rome was established in 1968. Among these are the Black Nobility of Venice and Genoa, P2 Masonry and the Red Brigades, all working for the same goals. Police investigators in Rome working on the Red Brigades-Aldo Moro case came across the names of several very prominent Italian families working closely with this terrorist group. The police also discovered evidence that in at least a dozen cases, these powerful and prominent families had allowed their homes and/or property to be used as safe houses for Red Brigades cells.

America's "nobility" were doing their share to destroy the Republic of Italy, a notable contribution having come from Richard Gardner even while in his official capacity as President Carter's ambassador to Rome. At that time Gardner was operating under the direct control of Bettino Craxi, an important member of the Club of Rome and a key man in NATO. Craxi was the leading edge of the conspirators' attempts to destroy the Italian Republic. As we shall see, Craxi was almost successful in ruining Italy, and as the conspirators hierarchy's leading player, was able to get divorce and abortion pushed through the Italian Parliament, resulting in the most far-reaching and destructive religious and social changes ever to strike at the Catholic Church, and consequently, the morals of the Italian nation.

After President Ronald Reagan was elected, an important meeting was held in Washington D.C. in December 1980 under the auspices of the Club of Rome and the Socialist International. Both these organizations are directly responsible to the Committee of 300. The main agenda was to formulate ways and means of how to neutralize the Reagan presidency. A group plan was adopted and, as we look back, it is perfectly clear that the plan the conspirators agreed to follow has been very successful.

In order to get an idea of how vast and how all-pervasive is this conspiracy, it would be appropriate at this point to name the goals set by the Committee of 300 for the pending conquest and control of the world. There are at least 40 known "branch offices" of the Committee of 300, and we shall be listing them all, together with a description of their functions. Once this is studied it becomes easy to understand how one central conspiratorial body is able to operate so successfully and why it is that no power on earth can withstand their onslaught against the very foundations of a civilized, progressive world, based on freedom of the individual, especially as it is declared in the United States Constitution.

Thanks to the sworn testimony of Guerzoni, Italy and Europe but not the U.S. learned that Kissinger was behind the death of Aldo Moro. This tragic affair demonstrates the ability of the Committee of 300 to impose its will upon any government without exception. Secure in his position as a member of the most powerful secret society in the world, and I am not talking about Freemasonry, Kissinger not only terrified Moro, but carried through on his threats to "eliminate" Moro if he did not give up his plan to bring economic and industrial progress to Italy.

In June and July of 1982, the wife of Aldo Moro testified in open court that her husband's murder came about as a result of serious threats against his life, made by what she called "a high ranking United States political figure." Mrs. Eleanora Moro repeated the precise phrase reportedly used by Kissinger in the sworn testimony of Guerzoni: "Either you stop your political line or you will pay dearly for it." Recalled by the judge, Guerzoni was asked if he could identify the person Mrs. Moro was talking about.

Guerzoni replied that it was indeed Henry Kissinger as he had previously intimated.

Guerzoni went on to explain to the court that Kissinger had made his threats in Moro's hotel room during the Italian leaders official visit to the U.S. Moro—then Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Italy, a NATO member-country—was a man of high rank, one who should never have been subjected to Mafia-like pressures and threats. Moro was accompanied on his American visit by the President of Italy in his official capacity. Kissinger was then, and still is, an important agent in the service of the Royal Institute for International Affairs, a member of the Club of Rome and the Council on Foreign Relations.

Kissinger's role in destabilizing the United States by means of three wars, the Middle East, Korea and Vietnam, is well known, as is his role in the Gulf War, in which the U.S. Army acted as mercenaries for the Committee of 300 in bringing Kuwait back under its control and at the same time making an example out of Iraq so that other small nations would not be tempted to work out their own destiny.

Kissinger also threatened the late Ali Bhutto, President of the sovereign nation of Pakistan. Bhutto's "crime" was that he favored nuclear weapons for his country. As a Moslem state, Pakistan felt threatened by continued Israeli aggression in the Middle East. Bhutto was judicially murdered in 1979 by the Council on Foreign Relations representative in the country General Zia ul Haq.

In his planned ascent to power, ul Haq encouraged a frenzied mob to set fire to the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad in an apparent attempt to show the CFR that he was his own man and to secure more foreign aid and, it was later learned, to murder Richard Helms. Several years later, ul Haq paid with his life for intervening in the war raging in Afghanistan. His C-130 Hercules aircraft was hit by an E.L.F. (electricallow frequency) shot shortly after it took off, causing the aircraft to loop into the ground.

The Club of Rome, acting on Committee of 300 orders to eliminate General ul Haq, had no compunction in sacrificing the lives of a number of U.S. servicemen on board the flight, including a U.S. Army Defense Intelligence Agency group headed by Brigadier General Herber Wassom. General ul Haq had been warned by the Turkish Secret Service not to travel by plane, as he was targeted for a mid-air bombing. With this in mind, ul Haq took the United States team with him as "an insurance policy," as he commented to his inner circle advisors.

In my 1989 work "Terror' in the Skies," I gave the following account of what happened: "Shortly before ul Haq's C-130 took off from a Pakistan military base, a suspicious looking truck was seen close to the hangar that had housed the C-130. The control tower warned base security, but by the time action was taken, the C-130 was already airborne and the truck had gone. A few minutes later the plane began looping-the-loop until it hit the ground and exploded in a ball of fire. There is no explanation for such behavior by the C-130, an aircraft with a marvelously reliable record, and a joint Pakistani-United States board of enquiry Found no pilot error or mechanical or structural failure. Looping-the-loop is a recognized trade mark of an aircraft hit by E.L.F. fire.

That the Soviet Union has been able to develop high-peak radio frequency devices is known to the West through the work of Soviet scientists who work in the Kurchatov Atomic Energy Institute's Intensive Relatavistic Electron Beam Division. Two of its specialists were Y. A. Vinograov and A. A. Rukhadze. Both scientists worked in the Lededev Physics Institute, which specializes in electronic and X ray lasers.

After receiving this information, I searched for confirmation from other sources and found that in England the International journal of Electronics had published some material which appeared to confirm the information given to me about the method chosen to shoot down General ul Haq's C-130. In addition, the information was confirmed by two of my intelligence sources. I received some useful information from a Soviet scientific paper on these subjects, published in England under the title "Soviet Radio Electronics and Communications Systems." There was no doubt in my mind that General ul Haq had been murdered. The truck seen near the C-130 hanger undoubtedly carried a mobile E.L.F. device of the type the Soviet Armed Forces are known to possess.

According to written testimony by Bhutto, smuggled out of the country while he was in prison, Kissinger severely threatened him: "I will make a horrible example if you continue with your nation-building policies." Bhutto had fallen afoul of Kissinger and the Club of Rome by calling for a nuclear energy program to bring Pakistan into a modern industrialized state which, in the eyes of the Committee of 300, was a direct contravention of its orders delivered by Kissinger to the Pakistani government. What Kissinger was doing when he threatened Bhutto was not official U.S. policy, but the policy of the modern-day Illuminati.

One needs to have a clear understanding of just why it is that nuclear power is so hated all over the world, and why the fake "environmentalist" movement, established and financially supported by the Club of Rome, was called upon to wage war on nuclear energy. With nuclear energy generating electricity in cheap and abundant supplies, Third World countries would gradually become independent of U.S. foreign aid and begin to assert their sovereignty. Nuclear generated electricity is THE key to bringing Third World countries out of their backward state, a state which the Committee of 300 has ordered to remain in position.

Less foreign aid means less control of a country's natural resources by the I.M.F. It was this idea of developing nations taking charge of their destiny that was an anathema to the Club of Rome and its ruling Committee of 300. We have seen opposition to nuclear power in the United States successfully used to block industrial development in conformity with the Club's "Post-Industrial Zero-Growth" plans.

Dependence upon U.S. foreign aid actually keeps foreign countries in servitude to the Council on Foreign Relations. The people of the recipient countries receive very little of the money as it usually ends up in the pockets of government leaders who allow the natural raw material assets of the country to be savagely stripped by the I.M.F. Mugabe of Zimbabwe, formerly Rhodesia, is a good example of how raw material assets, in this case high grade chrome ore, is controlled through foreign aid. LONRHO, the giant conglomerate run by Angus Ogilvie, an important member of the Committee of 300, on behalf of his cousin, Queen Elizabeth II, now has total control of this valuable resource while the people of the country sink ever deeper into poverty and misery, notwithstanding a hand-out of in excess of $300 million from the United States.

LONRHO now has a monopoly of Rhodesian chrome and charges any price it likes, whereas, under the Smith government this was not allowed. A reasonable price level was maintained for twenty-five years prior to the Mugabe regime taking power. While there were problems during the 14-year rule of Ian Smith, since his departure unemployment has quadrupled and Zimbabwe is in a state of chaos and de facto bankruptcy. Mugabe received enough foreign aid from the U.S. (in the region of $300 million per annum) to enable him to build three hotels on the French Cote d'Azur, Cap Ferat and Monte Carlo, while his citizens grapple with disease, unemployment and malnutrition, not to mention an iron-fisted dictatorship that allows no complaints. Contrast this with the Smith government which never asked for nor received one red cent in aid from the United States. Thus it is clear that foreign aid is a powerful means of exercising control of countries such as Zimbabwe and indeed all African countries.

It also keeps U.S. citizens in a state of involuntary servitude and therefore less able to mount meaningful opposition to government. David Rockefeller knew what he was doing when his foreign aid bill became law in 1946. It has, since then, become one of the most hated laws on the statute books following public exposure of what it is a racket run by government and paid for by we, the people.

How can the conspirators maintain their grip upon the world, and more especially, their chokehold over the U.S. and Britain? One of the most asked questions is, "How can any single entity know at all times what is going on and how is control exercised?" This book will attempt to answer these and other questions. The only way we can come to grips with the reality of the conspirator's success is by mentioning and discussing the secret societies, front organizations, government agencies, banks, insurance companies, international businesses, the petroleum industry and the hundreds of thousands of entities and foundations whose leading lights make up the membership of the Committee of 300—the ULTIMATE controlling body that runs the world and has done so for at least a hundred years.

Since there already are scores of books on the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR) and the Trilaterals, we shall go directly to the Club of Rome and the German Marshall Fund. When I introduced these organizations to the United States, few, if any, had heard of them. My first work, "The Club of Rome," published in 1983 attracted almost no attention. Many uninitiated people thought the Club of Rome was something to do with the Catholic Church and that the German Marshall Fund referred to the Marshal Plan.

This is precisely why the Committee chose these names, to confuse and to deflect attention away from what was happening. Not that the U.S. government didn't know, but as it was part of the conspiracy, it helped to keep the lid on information rather than let the truth be known. A few years after I published my work, a few writers saw in it a wealth of hitherto untapped information and began writing and talking about it as though they had always had full knowledge of it.

It came as a revelation to them that the Club of Rome and its financiers under the title of the German Marshall Fund were two highly-organized conspiratorial bodies operating under cover of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and that the majority of Club of Rome executives were drawn from NATO. The Club of Rome formulated all of what NATO claimed as its policies and, through the activities of Committee of 300 member Lord Carrington, was able to split NATO into two factions, a political (left wing) power group and its former military alliance.

The Club of Rome is still one of the most important foreign policy arms of the Committee of 300—the other being the Bilderbergers. It was put together in 1968 from hard-core members of the original Morgenthau group on the basis of a telephone call made by the late Aurellio Peccei for a new and urgent drive to speed up the plans of the One World Government—now called the New World Order, although I prefer the former name. It is certainly a better job-description than the New World Order, which is somewhat confusing as there have been several "New World Orders" before, but no One World Government.

Peccei's call was answered by the most subversive "future planners" drawn from the United States, France, Sweden, Britain, Switzerland and Japan that could be mustered. During the period 1968-1972, The Club of Rome became a cohesive entity of new-science scientists, globalists, future planners and internationalists of every stripe. As one delegate put it, "We became Joseph's Coat of Many Colors." Peccei's book "Human Quality" formed the basis of the doctrine adopted by NATO's political wing.

The following is extracted from Dr. Peccei's book, "Human Quality":

"For the first time since the first millennium was approached in Christendom, large masses of people are really in suspense about the impending advent of something unknown which could change their collective fate entirely.... Man does not know how to be a truly modern man.... Man invented the story of the Bad Dragon, but if ever there was a bad dragon, IT IS MAN HIMSELF.... Here we have the human paradox: man trapped by his extraordinary capacity and achievements, as in a quicksand—the more he uses his power the more he needs it.

"We must never tire of repeating how foolish it is to equate the present profound pathological state and maladjustment of the entire human system to any cyclic crisis or passing circumstances. Since man has opened Pandora's Box of new technologies, he has suffered uncontrolled human proliferation, the mania for growth, energy crises, actual or potential resource scarcities, degradation of environment, nuclear folly and a host of related afflictions."

This is identical to the program adopted by the much later fake "environmentalist" movement spawned by the same Club of Rome to blunt and turn back industrial development.

Broadly, the anticipated counter-program of the Club of Rome would cover inventing and disseminating "post industrialization" ideas in the United States, coupled with the spread of counterculture movements such as drugs, rock, sex, hedonism, Satanism, witchcraft and "environmentalism." Tavistock Institute, Stanford Research Institute and the Institute for Social Relations, in fact the entire wide spectrum of research organizations in applied social psychiatry either had delegates on the board of the Club of Rome, or acted as advisors and played a guiding role in NATO's attempt to adopt the "Aquarian Conspiracy."

The name, New World Order, is seen as something developed as a consequence of the Gulf War in 1991, whereas the One World Government is recognized as being centuries old. The New World Order is not new, it has been around and developing under one or another guise for a very long time but it is perceived as a DEVELOPMENT OF THE FUTURE, which is not the case; the New World Order is PAST AND PRESENT. That is why I said earlier that the term One World Government is, or ought to be, preferred. Aurellio Peccei once confided in his close friend Alexander Haig that he felt like "Adam Weishaupt reincarnated." Peccei had much of Weishaupt's brilliant ability to organize and control the Illuminati of today, and it showed through in Peccei's control of NATO and formulating its policies on a global scale.

Peccei headed the Atlantic Institute's Economic Council for three decades while he was the Chief Executive Officer for Giovanni Agnellis' Fiat Motor Company. Agnelli, a member of an ancient Italian Black Nobility family of the same name, is one of the most important members of the Committee of 300. He played a leading role in development projects in the Soviet Union.

The Club of Rome is a conspiratorial umbrella organization, a marriage between Anglo-American financiers and the old Black Nobility families of Europe, particularly the so-called "nobility" of London, Venice and Genoa. The key to the successful control of the world is their ability to create and manage savage economic recessions and eventual depressions. The Committee of 300 looks to social convulsions on a global scale, followed by depressions, as a softening-up technique for bigger things to come, as its principal method of creating masses of people all over the world who will become its "welfare" recipients of the future.

The committee appears to base much of its important decisions affecting mankind on the philosophy of Polish aristocrat, Felix Dzerzinski, who regarded mankind as being slightly above the level of cattle. As a close friend of British intelligence agent Sydney Reilly (Reilly was actually Dzerzinski's controller during the Bolshevik Revolution's formative years), he often confided in Reilly during his drinking bouts. Dzerzinski was, of course, the beast who ran the Red Terror apparatus. He once told Reilly, while the two were on a drinking binge, that "Man is of no importance. Look at what happens when you starve him. He begins to eat his dead companions to stay alive. Man is only interested in his own survival. That is all that counts. All the Spinoza stuff is a lot of rubbish."

The Club of Rome has its own private intelligence agency and also "borrows" from David Rockefeller's INTERPOL. Every U.S. intelligence agency cooperates very closely with it, as does the KGB and the Mossad. The only agency that remained beyond its reach was the East-German intelligence service. the STASSY. The Club of Rome also has its own highly organized political and economic agencies. It was they who told President Reagan to retain the services of Paul Volcker, yet another important Committee of 300 member. Volcker stayed on as Federal Reserve Board chairman, notwithstanding the faithful promise of candidate Reagan that he would dismiss him as soon as he, Reagan, was elected.

The Club of Rome, after playing a key role in the Cuban Missile Crisis, attempted to sell its "crisis management" (the forerunner of FEMA) program to President Kennedy. Several Tavistock scientists went to see the President to explain what it meant, but the President rejected the advice they gave. The same year that Kennedy was murdered, Tavistock was back in Washington to talk with NASA. This time the talks were successful. Tavistock was given a contract by NASA to evaluate the effect of its coming space program on American public opinion.

The contract was farmed to the Stanford Research Institute and the Rand Corporation. Much of the material produced by Tavistock, Stanford and Rand never saw the light of day and remains sealed until now. Several Senate oversight committees and sub-committees I approached to obtain information told me they had "never heard of it," nor did they have the slightest idea where I might find what I was seeking. Such is the power and prestige of the Committee of 300.

In 1966 I was advised by my intelligence colleagues to approach Dr. Anatol Rappaport who had written a treatise in which the administration was said to be interested. It was a paper intended to bring an end to NASA's space program, which Rapport said had outlived its usefulness. Rappaport was quite happy to give me a copy of his paper which, without going into fine detail, basically claimed that NASA's space program should be scrapped. NASA has too many scientists who were exerting a bad influence on America because they were always eager to lecture schools and university audiences on how rocketry worked, from construction to propulsion. Rappaport claimed that this would produce a generation of adults who would decide to become space scientists, only to find themselves "redundant" as no one would need their services by the year 2000.

No sooner had Rappaport's profiling report on NASA been presented to NATO by the Club of Rome, than the Committee of 300 demanded action. NATO-Club of Rome officials charged with urgent anti-NASA action were Harland Cleveland, Joseph Slater, Claiborne K. Pell, Walter J. Levy, George McGhee, William Watts, Robert Strausz-Hupe (U.S. ambassador to NATO) and Donald Lesh. In May 1967 a meeting was organized by the Scientific and Technological Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly and the Foreign Policy Research Institute. It was called "Conference on Transatlantic Imbalance and Collaboration" and it was held at Queen Elizabeth's palatial property in Deauville, France.

The basic purpose and intent of the conference at Deauville was to end U.S. technological and industrial progress. Out of the conference came two books, one of which is mentioned herein, Brzezinski's "Technotronic Era." The other was written by conference chairman, Aurellio Peccei, entitled "The Chasm Ahead." Peccei largely agreed with Brzezinski, but added that there world be chaos in a future world NOT RULED BY A ONE WORLD GOVERNMENT. In this regard, Peccei insisted that the Soviet Union must be offered "a convergence with NATO," such a convergence ending in an equal partnership in a New World Order with the United States. Both nations would be responsible for future "crisis management and global planning." The first Club of Rome's "global planning contract" went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), one of the premier Committee of 300's research institutes. Jay Forrestor and Dennis Meadows were placed in charge of the project.

What was their report all about? It did not differ fundamentally from what Malthus and Von Hayek preached, namely the old question of not enough natural resources to go around. The Forrestor-Meadows Report was a complete fraud. What it did not say was that man's proven inventive genius would in all likelihood work its way around "shortages." Fusion energy, the DEADLY enemy of the Committee of 300, could be applied to CREATING natural resources. A fusion torch could produce from one square mile of ordinary rock enough aluminum, for example, to fill our needs for 4 years.

Peccei never tired of preaching against the nation-state an how destructive they are for the progress of mankind. He called for "collective responsibility." Nationalism was a cancer on man was the theme of several important speeches delivered by Peccei. His close friend Ervin Lazlo produced a work in 1977 in a similar vein which was called "Goals of Mankind," a landmark study for the Club of Rome. The entire position paper was a vitriolic attack on industrial expansion and urban growth. Throughout these years, Kissinger, as the designated contact man, kept in close touch with Moscow on behalf of the RIIA. "Global modeling" papers were regularly shared with Kissinger's friends in the Kremlin.

With regard to the Third World, the Club of Rome's Harland Cleveland prepared a report which was the height of cynicism. At the time, Cleveland was United States Ambassador to NATO. Essentially, the paper said it would be up to Third World nations to decide among themselves which populations should be eliminated. As Peccei later wrote (based on the Cleveland Report): "Damaged by conflicting policies of three major countries and blocs, roughly patched up here and there, the existing international economic order is visibly coming apart at the seams....The prospect of the necessity of the recourse to triage-deciding who must be saved—is a very grim one indeed. But, if lamentably, events should come to such a pass, the right to make such decisions cannot be left to just a few nations because it would lend themselves to ominous power over life of the world's hungry."

In this is found the committee policy of deliberately starving African nations to death, as evidenced in the sub-Sahara nations. This was cynicism at its worst, because the Committee of 300 had already abrogated the decisions of life and death unto itself, and Peccei knew it. He had previously so indicated in his book "Limits of Growth." Peccei completely dismissed industrial and agricultural progress and in its place demanded that the world come under one coordinating council, to whit, the Club of Rome and its NATO institutions, in a One World Government.

Natural resources would have to be allocated under the auspices of global planning. Nation states could either accept Club of Rome domination or else survive by the law of the jungle and fight to survive. In its first "test case," Meadows and Forrestor planned the 1973 Arab-Israeli War on behalf of the RIIA to sharply bring home to the world that natural resources like petroleum would in the future come under global planners control, meaning of course, under the control of the Committee of 300.

Tavistock Institute called for a consultation with Peccei to which McGeorge Bundy, Homer Perlmutter and Dr. Alexander King were invited. From London Peccei traveled to the White House where he met with the President and his cabinet, Followed by a visit to the State Department where he conferred with the Secretary of State, the State Department's intelligence service and State's Policy Planning Council. Thus, from the very beginning, the United States government was fully aware of the Committee of 300's plans for this country. That should answer the often asked question, "Why would our government allow the Club of Rome to operate in a subversive manner in the United States?"

Volcker's economic and monetary policies were a reflection of those of Sir Geoffrey Howe, Chancellor of the exchequer and member of the Committee of 300. This serves to illustrate how Britain has controlled the United States, beginning from soon after the War of 1812, and continues to exercise control over this country through the policies of the Committee of 300.

What are the goals of the secret elite group, the inheritors of Illuminism (Moriah Conquering Wind), the Cult of Dionysius, the Cult of Isis, Catharism, Bogomilism? This elite group that also calls itself the OLYMPIANS (they truly believe they are equal in power and stature to the legendary gods of Olympus, who have, like Lucifer their god, set themselves above our true God) absolutely believe they have been charged with implementing the following by divine right:

(1) A One World Government-New World Order with a unified church and monetary system under their direction. Not many people are aware that the One World Government began setting up its "church" in the 1920's/ 1930's, for they realized the need for a religious belief inherent in mankind to have an outlet and, therefore, set up a "church" body to channel that belief in the direction they desired.

(2) The utter destruction of all national identity and national pride.

(3) The destruction of religion and more especially the Christian religion, with the one exception, their own creation mentioned above.

(4) Control of each and every person through means of mind control and what Brzezinski call "technotronics" which would create human-like robots and a system of terror beside which Felix Dzerzinski's Red Terror will look like children at play.

(5) An end to all industrialization and the production of nuclear generated electric power in what they call "the post-industrial zero-growth society." Exempted are the computer and service industries. United States industries that remain will be exported to countries such as Mexico where abundant slave labor is available. Unemployables in the wake of industrial destruction will either become opium-heroin and or cocaine addicts, or become statistics in the elimination process we know today as Global 2000.

(6) Legalization of drugs and pornography.

(7) Depopulation of large cities according to the trial run carried out by the Pol Pot regime in Cambodia. It is interesting to note that Pol Pot's genocidal plans were drawn up here in the United States by one of the Club of Rome's research foundations. It is also interesting that the Committee is presently seeking to reinstate the Pol Pot butchers in Cambodia.

(8) Suppression of all scientific development except for those deemed beneficial by the Committee. Especially targeted is nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. Particularly hated are the fusion experiments presently being scorned and ridiculed by the Committee and its jackals of the press. Development of the fusion torch would blow the Committee's conception of "limited natural resources" right out of the window. A fusion torch properly used could create unlimited untappeed natural resources from the most ordinary substances. Fusion torch uses are legion and would benefit mankind in a manner which is as yet not even remotely comprehended by the public.

(9) Cause by means of limited wars in the advanced countries, and by means of starvation and diseases in Third World countries, the death of 3 billion people by the year 2000, people they call "useless eaters." The Committee of 300 commissioned Cyrus Vance to write a paper on this subject of how best to bring about such genocide. The paper was produced under the title the "Global 2000 Report" and was accepted and approved for action by President Carter, for and on behalf of the U.S. Government, and accepted by Edwin Muskie, then Secretary of State. Under the terms of the Global 2000 Report, the population of the United States is to be reduced by 100 million by the year 2050.

(10) To weaken the moral fiber of the nation and to demoralize workers in the labor class by creating mass unemployment. As jobs dwindle due to the post industrial zero growth policies introduced by the Club of Rome, demoralized and discouraged workers will resort to alcohol and drugs. The youth of the land will be encouraged by means of rock music and drugs to rebel against the status quo, thus undermining and eventually destroying the family unit. In this regard The Committee of 300 commissioned Tavistock Institute to prepare a blueprint as to how this could be achieved. Tavistock directed Stanford Research to undertake the work under the direction of Professor Willis Harmon. This work later became known as "The Aquarian Conspiracy."

(11) To keep people everywhere from deciding their own destinies by means of one created crisis after another and then "managing" such crises. This will confuse and demoralize the population to the extent where faced with too many choices, apathy on a massive scale will result. In the case of the United States, an agency for crisis management is already in place. It is called the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), whose existence I first disclosed in 1980. There will be more on FEMA as we proceed.

(12) To introduce new cults and continue to boost those already functioning which includes rock "music" gangsters such as the filthy, degenerate Mick Jagger's "Rolling Stones" (a gangster group much favored by European Black Nobility) and all of the Tavistockcreated "rock" groups which began with "The Beatles." To continue to build up the cult of Christian fundamentalism begun by the British East India Company's servant, Darby, which will be misused to strengthen the Zionist state of Israel through identifying with the Jews through the myth of "God's Chosen People" and by donating very substantial amounts of money to what they mistakenly believe is a religious cause in the furtherance of Christianity.

(14) To press for the spread of religious cults such as the Moslem Brotherhood, Moslem fundamentalism, the Sikhs, and to carry out experiments of the Jim Jones and "Son of Sam" type of murders. It is worth noting that the late Ayatollah Khomeini was a creation of British Intelligence Military Intelligence Division 6, commonly known as M16, as I reported in my 1985 work, "What Really Happened In Iran."

(15) To export "religious liberation" ideas around the world so as to undermine all existing religions but more especially the Christian religion. This began with "Jesuit Liberation Theology" which brought about the downfall of the Somoza family rule in Nicaragua and which is today destroying EI Salvador, now 25 years into a "civil war," Costa Rica and Honduras. One very active entity engaged in so-called liberation theology is the Communist oriented Mary Knoll Mission. This accounts for the extensive media attention to the murder of four of Mary Knoll's so-called nuns in EI Salvador a few years ago.

The four nuns were Communist subversive agents and their activities were widely documented by the government of EI Salvador. The United States press and news media refused to give any space or coverage to the mass of documentation in possession of the Salvadorian government, documentation which proves what the Mary Knoll Mission nuns were doing in the country. Mary Knoll is in service in many countries, and played a leading role in bringing Communism to Rhodesia, Mozambique, Angola and South Africa.

(16) To cause a total collapse of the world's economies and engender total political chaos.

(17) To take control of all Foreign and domestic policies of the United States.

(18) To give the fullest support to supranational institutions such as the United Nations (UN), the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the Bank of International Settlements (BIS), the World Court and, as far as possible, make local institutions of lesser effect by gradually phasing them out or bringing them under the mantle of the United Nations.

(19) Penetrate and subvert all governments, and work from within them to destroy the sovereign integrity of nations represented by them.

(20) Organize a world-wide terrorist apparatus and negotiate with terrorists whenever terrorist activities take place. It will be recalled that it was Bettino Craxi who persuaded the Italian and U.S. governments to negotiate with the Red Brigades kidnapers of Prime Minister Moro and General Dozier. As an aside, General Dozier is under orders not to talk about what happened to him. Should he break that silence, he will no doubt be made "a horrible example of" in the manner in which Kissinger dealt with Aldo Moro, Ali Bhutto and General Zia ul Haq.

(21) Take control of education in America with the intent and purpose of utterly and completely destroying it.

Much of these goals, which I first enumerated in 1969, have since been achieved or are well on their way to being achieved. Of special interest in the Committee of 300 program is the core of their economic policy, which is largely based on the teachings of Malthus, the son of an English country parson who was pushed to prominence by the British East India Company upon which the Committee of 300 is modeled.

Malthus maintained that man's progress is tied to the earth's natural ability to support a given number of people, beyond which point earth's limited resources would rapidly be depleted. Once these natural resources have been consumed, it will be impossible to replace them. Hence, Malthus observed, it is necessary to limit populations within the boundaries of decreasing natural resources. It goes without saying that the elite will not allow themselves to be threatened by a burgeoning population of "useless eaters," hence culling must be practiced. As I have previously stated, "culling" is going on today, using the methods mandated in the "Global 2000 Report."

All economic plans of the Committee meet at the crossroads of Malthus and Frederick Von Hayek, another doom and gloom economist who is sponsored by the Club of Rome. The Austrian born Von Hayek has long been under the control of David Rockefeller, and Von Hayek theories are fairly widely accepted in the United States. According to Von Hayek, the United States economic platform must be based on (a) Urban Black Markets (b) Small Hong Kong-type industries utilizing sweat-shop labor (c) The Tourist Trade, (d) Free Enterprise Zones where speculators can operate unhindered and where the drug trade can flourish (e) End of all industrial activity and (f) Close down all nuclear energy plants.

Von Hayek's ideas dove-tail perfectly with those of the Club of Rome, which is perhaps why he is so well promoted in rightwing circles in this country. The mantle of Von Hayek is being passed to a new, younger economist, Jeoffrey Sachs, who was sent to Poland to take up where Von Hayek left off. It will he recalled that the Club of Rome organized the Polish economic crisis which led to political destabilization of the country. The exact same economic planning, if one dare call it that, will be forced upon Russia, but if widespread opposition is encountered, the old price-support system will quickly be restored.

The Committee of 300 ordered the Club of Rome to use Polish nationalism as a tool to destroy the Catholic Church and pave the way for Russian troops to reoccupy the country. The "Solidarity" movement was a creation of the Committee of 300's Zbigniew Brzezinski, who chose the name for the "trade union" and selected its office holders and organizers. Solidarity is no "labor" movement, although Gdansk shipyard workers were used to launch it, but rather, it was a high-profile POLITCAL organization, created to bring forced changes in preparation for the advent of the One World Government.

Most of Solidarity's leaders were descendants of Bolshevik Jews from Odessa and were not noted for hating Communism. This helps to understand the saturation coverage provided by the American news media. Professor Sachs has taken the process a step further, ensuring economic slavery for a Poland recently freed from the domination of the USSR. Poland will now become the economic slave of the United States. All that has happened is that the master has changed.

Brzezinski is the author of a book that should have been read by every American interested in the future of this country. Entitled "The Technotronic Era," it was commissioned by the Club of Rome. The book is an open announcement of the manner and methods to be used to control the United States in the future. It also gave notice of cloning and "robotoids," i.e. people who acted like people and who seemed to be people, but who were not. Brzezinski, speaking for the Committee of 300 said the United States was moving "into an era unlike any of its predecessors; we were moving toward a technotronic era that could easily become a dictatorship." I reported fully on "the Technotronic Era" in 1981 and mentioned it in my newsletters a number of times.

Brzezinski went on to say that our society "is now in an information revolution based on amusement focus, spectator spectacles (saturation coverage by television of sporting events) which provide an opiate for an increasingly purposeless mass." Was Brzezinski another seer and a prophet? Could he see into the future? The answer is NO; what he wrote in his book was simply copied from the Committee of 300's blueprint given to the Club of Rome for execution. Isn't it true that by 1991 we already have a purposeless mass of citizens? We could say that 30 million unemployed and 4 million homeless people are a "purposeless mass," or at least the nucleus of one.

In addition to religion, "the opiate of the masses" which Lenin and Marx acknowledged was needed, we now have the opiates of mass spectator sport, unbridled sexual lusts, rock music and a whole new generation of drug addicts. Mindless sex and an epidemic of drug usage was created to distract people from what is happening all around them. In "The Technotronic Era" Brzezinski talks about "the masses" as if people are some inanimate object—which is possibly how we are viewed by the Committee of 300. He continually refers to the necessity of controlling us "masses."

At one point, he lets the cat out of the bag:

"At the same time the capacity to assert social and political control over the individual will vastly increase. It will soon be possible to assert almost continuous control over every citizen and to maintain up-to-date files, containing even the most personal details about health and personal behavior of every citizen in addition to the more customary data.

"These files will be subject to instantaneous retrieval by the authorities. Power will gravitate into the hands of those who control information. Our existing institutions will be supplanted by pre-crisis management institutions, the task of which will be to identify in advance likely social crises and to develop programs to cope with them. (This describes the structure of FEMA which came much later.)

"This will encourage tendencies through the next several decades toward a TECHNOTRONIC ERA, A DICTATORSHIP, leaving even less room for political procedures as we know them. Finally, looking ahead to the end of the century, the possibility of BIOCHEMICAL MIND CONTROL AND GENETIC TINKERING WITH MAN, INCLUDING BEINGS WHICH WILL FUNCTION LIKE MEN AND REASON LIKE THEM AS WELL, COULD GIVE RISE TO SOME DIFFICULT QUESTIONS."

Brzezinski was not writing as a private citizen but as Carter's National Security Advisor and a leading member of the Club of Rome and a member of the Committee of 300, a member of the CFR and as a member of the old Polish Black Nobility. His book explains how America must leave its industrial base behind and enter into what he called "a distinct new historical era."

"What makes America unique is its willingness to experience the future, be it pop-art or LSD. Today, America is the creative society, the others, consciously or unconsciously, are emulative. What he should have said was that America is the proving ground for Committee of 300 policies which lead directly to a dissolution of the old order and an entry into the One World Government-New World Order.

One of the chapters in "The Technotronic Era" explains how new technology will bring in its wake intense confrontation that will strain social and international peace. Oddly enough we are already under intense strains through surveillance. Lourdes in Cuba is one place where this is happening. The other is NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, where a giant computer designated "666" can store data of every type mentioned by Brzezinski, plus possessing an expanded capacity to take in data for several billions more people than presently exist, if it ever comes to that, but which, in the light of the Global 2000 genocidal report, will probably never need to be utilized.

Retrieval of data will be simple in the United States where social security and or driver licence numbers could simply be added to 666 to provide the surveillance recording announced by Brzezinski and his Committee of 300 colleagues. The Committee already in 1981 warned governments, including the government of the USSR, that there "will be chaos unless the Committee of 300 takes complete control of preparations for the New World Order.

CONTROL WILL BE EXERCISED THROUGH OUR COMMITTEE AND THROUGH GLOBAL PLANNIG AND CRISIS MANAGEMENT." I reported this factual information a few months after I received it in 1981. Another item I reported back then was that RUSSIA HAD BEEN INVITED TO JOIN THE PREPARATIONS FOR THE COMING ONE WORLD GOVERNMENT.

When I wrote these things in 1981, the conspirators' global plans were already in an advanced state of preparedness. Looking back over the past 10 years, it can be seen just how rapidly the Committee's plans have advanced. If the information provided in 1981 was alarming, then it should be even more alarming today as we near the final stages of the demise of the United States as we know it. With unlimited funding, with several hundred think tanks and 5000 social engineers, the media banking and control of most governments a reality, we can see that we are tracing a problem of immense proportions, one that cannot he opposed by any nation at this time.

As I have so often stated, we have been misled into believing that the problem I am talking about has its origin in Moscow We have been brainwashed into believing that Communism is the greatest danger we Americans are facing. This is simply not so. The greatest danger arises from the mass of traitors in our midst. Our Constitution warns us to be watchful of the enemy within our gates. These enemies are the servants of the Committee of 300 who occupy high positions within our governmental structure. The UNITED STATES is where we MUST begin our fight to turn back the tide threatening to engulf us, and where we must meet, and defeat these internal conspirators.

The Club of Rome also had a direct hand in creating the 25year old war in EI Salvador, as an integral part of the wider plan drawn up by Elliot Abrams of the U.S. State Department. It was Committee of 300 member Willy Brandt, leader of the Socialist International and a former chancellor of West Germany, who paid for the "final offensive" by the Salvadorian guerrillas which, fortunately, was not successful. EI Salvador was chosen by the committee to turn Central America into a zone for a new Thirty-Year War, which task was allocated to Kissinger to carry out under the innocuous title of "The Andes Plan."

Just to demonstrate how the conspirators operate across all national boundaries, the "final offensive" action planned by Willy Brandt came about as a result of a visit to Felipe Gonzalez, who at the time was preparing himself for his Club of Rome-ordained role as Spain's future prime minister. Apart from myself and one or two of my intelligence colleagues and former colleagues, no one appeared to have heard of Gonzalez before he surfaced in Cuba. Gonzalez was the Club of Rome's case officer for EI Salvador, and the first Socialist to be elevated to political power in Spain since the death of General Franco.

Gonzalez was on his way to Washington to attend the Club of Rome Socialist "get Reagan" meeting which took place in December 1980. Present at the Gonzalez-Castro meeting was the left-wing guerrilla, Guillermo Ungo, run by the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), the Committee of 300's most notorious Washington-based leftwing think tank. Ungo was run by an IPS fellow who died in a mysterious plane crash while enroute from Washington to Havana to visit Castro.

As most of us know, both the left and the right of the political spectrum is controlled by the same people, which will help to explain the fact that Ungo was a life-long friend of the late Napoleon Duarte, leader of the rightwing in EI Salvador. It was after the Cuban meeting that the "final offensive" by the Salvadorian guerrillas was carried out.

The polarizing of South America and the U.S was a special assignment given to Kissinger by the Committee of 300. The Malvinas War (also known as the Falklands War) and the subsequent overthrow of the Argentine government, followed by economic chaos and political upheavals, were planned by Kissinger Associates acting in concert with Lord Carrington, a top-ranking member of the Committee of 300.

One of the principal Committee of 300 assets in the U.S., the Aspen Institute of Colorado, also helped plan events in Argentina even as it did in the case of the fall of the Shah of Iran. Latin America is important to the United States, not only because we have so many mutual defense treaties with countries there, but also because it has the potential of providing a huge market for American exports of technology, heavy industrial equipment which world have galvanized many of our faltering companies and provided thousands of new jobs. This was to be prevented all costs, even if it meant 30 years of war.

Instead of seeing this huge potential in a positive light, the Committee of 300 saw it as a dangerous threat to its postindustrial zero-growth U.S. plans and immediately acted to make an example of Argentina as a warning to other Latin American nations to forget any ideas they may have had to promote nationalism, independence and sovereign integrity. This is the reason why so many Latin American countries turned to drugs as their sole means of support, which may very well have been the intention of the conspirators in the first place.

Americans in general look down on Mexico, which is precisely the attitude with which the Committee wants the people of the United States to regard Mexico. What we need to do is change our thinking about Mexico and South America in general. Mexico represents a potentially huge market for all types of U.S. goods which could mean thousands of jobs for Americans and Mexicans alike. Transferring our industries "south of the border" and paying the maquiladores slave wages is not in the interests of either country. It benefits nobody but the "Olympians."

Mexico received most of its nuclear power technology from Argentina, but the Malvinas War put an end to that. The Club of Rome decreed back in 1986 that it would stop exports of nuclear technology to developing countries. With nuclear power stations generating abundant cheap electricity, Mexico would have become the "Germany of Latin America." Such a state of affairs would have been a disaster for the conspirators who have, by 1991, stopped all exports of nuclear technology except that destined for Israel.

What the Committee of 300 has in mind for Mexico is a feudal peasantry, a condition that allows for easy management and looting of Mexican oil. A stable and prosperous Mexico can only be a plus for the United States. This is what the conspirators wish to prevent, so they have engaged in decades of innuendo, slander and direct economic war on Mexico. Before former President Lopes Portillo took office and nationalized the banks Mexico was losing $200 million a day to capital flight, organized and orchestrated by the Committee of 300's representatives in banks and brokerage houses on Wall Street.

If only we in the United States had statesmen and not politicians running the country, we could act together and set back the One World Government-New World Order plans to return Mexico to a state of helplessness. If we were able to defeat the Club of Rome's plans for Mexico, it would come as a shock to the Committee of 300, a shock from which they would take a long time to recover. The inheritors of the Illuminati pose as great a threat to the United States as they do to Mexico. By seeking common ground with Mexican patriotic movements we in the United States could forge a formidable force to be reckoned with. But such action requires leadership, and we are more lacking in leadership than in any other area of endeavor.

The Committee of 300 through its many affiliated organizations was able to nullify the Reagan presidency. Here is what Stuart Butler of the Heritage Foundation had to say on the subject "The right thought it had won in 1980 but in fact it have lost." What Butler was referring to was the situation in which the Right found itself when it realized that every single position of importance in the Reagan administration was filled by Fabianist appointees recommended by the Heritage Foundation. Butler went on to say that Heritage would use rightwing ideas to impose leftwing radical principles upon the United States, the same radical ideas which Sir Peter Vickers Hall, top Fabianist in the U.S. and the number one man at Heritage, had been openly discussing during the election year.

Sir Peter Vickers Hall remained an active Fabianist even though he was running a conservative "think tank." As a member of the British oligarchical Vickers armament manufacturing family, he had position and power. The Vickers family supplied both sides in the First World War and again during Hitler's rise to power. Vickers' official cover was the University of California's Urban and Regional Development Institute. He was a longtime confidant of British Labour leader and Committee of 300 member Anthony Wedgewood Benn.

Both Vickers and Benn are integrated with the Tavistock Institute for Human Relations, the premiere brainwashing institution in the world. Vickers uses his Tavistock training to very good effect when speech-making. Consider the following example:

"There are two Americas. One is the nineteenth century heavy-industry based society. The other is the growing post industrial society, in some cases built on the shards of the old America. It is the crisis between these two worlds which will produce the economic and social catastrophe of the next decade. The two worlds are in fundamental opposition, they cannot coexist. In the end the post industrial world must crush and obliterate the other one." Remember, this speech was made in 1981 and we can see from the state of our economy and our industries just how accurate was Sir Peter's prediction. When concerned people ask me how long the 1991 recession will last, I refer them to Sir Peter's statements and add my own opinion that it will not end until 1995/1996, and even then what emerges will not be the America we knew in the 1960's and 1970's. That America has already been destroyed.

I reported Sir Peter's speech in my newsletter soon after it was delivered. How prophetic it was, but then it was easy to predict a future already written for America by the Committee of 300 and its executive Club of Rome. What was Sir Peter saying in a euphemistic manner? Translated into ordinary everyday English, he was saying that the old American way of life, our true and trusted republican form of government based upon our Constitution, was going to be crushed by the New World Order. America as we knew it was going to have to go, or be crushed to pieces.

As I said, Committee of 300 members often make themselves highly visible. Sir Peter was no exception. To make it clearly understood where he was coming from, Sir Peter rounded off his speech by declaring:

"I am perfectly happy working with the Heritage Foundation and groups like that. True Fabians look to the New Right to push through some of their more radical ideas. For more than a decade the British population has been subject to a constant propaganda barrage of how it was on the industrial skids. All of this is true, but the net effect of the propaganda was to demoralize the population. (Exactly as intended by the new-science scientist at Tavistock.)

"This will happen in the United States as the economy worsens. This (demoralizing process) is necessary to make people accept difficult choices. If there is no planning for the future or if constituencies block progress there will be social chaos on a scale which is currently hard to imagine. The outlook for urban America is bleak. There is a possibility of doing something with the inner cities, but basically the cities will shrink and the manufacturing base will decline. This will produce social convulsions."

Was Sir Peter a psychic, a magician of great report or merely a charlatan fortune teller with a great deal of luck? The answer is "none of these." All Sir Peter was doing was reading off the blueprint of the Committee of 300-Club of Rome for slow death of the United States as a former industrial giant. Looking back over the ten years of Sir Peter's predictions, can anybody doubt that the Committee of 300's plans for the demise of an industrialized United States has become a fait accompli?

Haven't Sir Peter's predictions proved to be remarkably accurate? Indeed they have, almost down to the last word. It is worth noting that Sir Peter Vickers (Sir Peter Vickers-Hall's father-in-law) worked on the Stanford Research paper, "Changing Images of Man," from which much of the 3000 pages of material advice sent to the Reagan Administration was taken. Moreover, as a senior MJ6 British intelligence officer, Sir Peter Vickers was in a position to give Heritage a great deal of advance information.

As a member of the Committee of 300 and NATO, Sir Peter Vickers was around when NATO directed the Club of Rome to develop a social program which would utterly change the direction in which America wanted to go. The Club of Rome, under Tavistock direction, ordered Stanford Research Institute (SRI) to develop such a program, not only for America, but for every nation in the Atlantic Alliance and the OECD nations.

It was Sir Peter's protege, Stuart Butler, who gave President Reagan 3000 pages of "recommendations," which no doubt contained some opinions expressed by Anthony Wedgewood Benn, a member of parliament and a ranking member of the Committee of 300. Benn told members of the Socialist Internaional who met in Washington on December 8, 1980: "You can thrive under Volcker's credit collapse if you profile Reagan to intensify the credit collapse."

That Butler's advice was taken and applied to the Reagan administration can be seen in the collapse of the Savings and loan and banking industries which accelerated under Reagan economic policies. While Benn called it "profiling," he really meant that Reagan should be brainwashed. It is worth noting that Von Hayek-who is a founder member of Heritage-used his student, Milton Friedman, to preside over the Club of Rome's plans to deindustrialise America using the Reagan presidency to accelerate the collapse of first the steel industry, and then the auto and housing industries, for example.

In this regard a French Black Nobility member, Etienne D'Avignon, as a member of the Committee of 300, was assigned the task of collapsing the steel industry in this country. It is doubtful that any of the hundreds of thousands of steel workers and shipyard workers who have been without jobs for the past decade have ever heard of D'Avignon. I fully reported the D'Avignon Plan in April 1981 Economic Review. Attending that fateful December lOth Club of Rome meeting in Washington D.C. was a mystery man from Iran who turned out to be Bani Sadr, the Ayatollah Khomeini's special envoy.

One speech in particular at the December 1Oth, 1980 conclave caught my attention, mainly because it came from Francois Mitterand, a man the French establishment had discarded and thought to be washed up. But my intelligence source had previously told me that Mitterand was in the process of being picked up, dusted off and returned to power, so what he said carried a good deal of weight for me:

"Industrial capitalist development is the opposite of freedom We must put an end to it. The economic systems of the 20th and 21st century will use machines to crush man, first in the domain of nuclear energy which is already producing formidable results. Mitterand's return to the Elysee Palace was a great triumph for socialism. It proved that the Committee of 3OO was powerful enough to predict happenings and then make them happen, by force, or by whatever means it took to make its point that it could crush any and all opposition even if, as in the case of Mitterand, he had been totally rejected a few short days before by a discerning political power group in Paris.

Another group representative at the December 1980 Washington meetings with "observer status" was John Graham, also known as "Irwin Suall," head of the fact-finding committee of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL). The ADL is an outright British intelligence operation run by all three branches of British intelligence, that is, M16 and the JIO. Suall's extensive bag of dirty tricks was garnered from the sewers of the East End of London. Suall is still a member of the super-secret SIS, an elite James Bond type of operation. Let nobody underestimate the power of the ADL, nor its long reach.

Suall works closely with Hall and other Fabianists. He was singled out as useful to British intelligence while at Ruskir Labour College at Oxford University in England, the same communist education center that gave us Milner, Rhodes, Burgess, McLean and Kim Philby. Oxford and Cambridge Universities have long been the province of the sons and daughters of the elite, those whose parents belong to the "upper crust" of British high society. While at Oxford, Suall joined the Young People's Socialist League, and was recruited by British intelligence shortly thereafter.

Suall was posted to the United States where he came under the protection and sponsorship of one of the most insidious leftists in the country, Walter Lippmann. Lippmann founded and ran the League for Industrial Democracy, and Students for Democratic Society, both leftist spoiler operations to set industrial workers at variance with what it called "the Capitalist class" and management. Both of Lippmann's projects were an integral part of the Committee of 300 apparatus that stretched right across America, of which Lippmann was a most important member.

Suall has strong connections with the Justice Department and can secure FBI profiles of any person he targets. The Justice Department has orders to give Suall everything he wants when he wants it. Most of Suall's activities center around "keeping an eye on rightwing groups and individuals." The ADL has an open door to the State Department and makes good use of State's impressive intelligence agency.

The State Department has a layer of agents in the right wing, posing as "fearless anti-Semitic fighters." There are four leaders in this group of informers, three of whom are discreet Jewish homosexuals. This spy group has been in operation for the past two decades. They publish virulently anti-Jewish "newspapers" and sell a wide variety of anti-Semitic books. One of the principal operators works out of Louisiana. A member of this group is a writer who is dearly beloved in Christian rightwing circles. The group and the individuals who go to make it up are under the protection of the ADL. Suall was deeply involved in ABSCAM and is often called upon by law enforcement agencies to assist them in investigations and sting operations.

Suall was assigned to "dog Reagan," in terms of the course laid out for the newly-elected President by the Heritage Foundation, and to figuratively fire a few warning shots if Reagan looked like deviating or taking off his blinders at any time. Suall helped to get rid of any troublesome rightwing advisor not beholden to Heritage for his or her job with the Reagan administration. Such a person was Ray Donovan, Reagan's Secretary of Labor, who was eventually removed from his post thanks to the Dirty Tricks department of the ADL. James Baker III, one of those on the list of 3000 recommendations made by the Heritage Foundation, was the go-between who carried Suall's messages of hate about Donovan to the President.

Another important conspirator was Philip Agee, the socalled CIA "defector." Although not a member of the Committee, he was nevertheless its case officer for Mexico, and run by the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA) and the Council on Foreign Relations. For the record, nothing that happens in the U.S. happens without the sanction of the RIIA. It is a continuing and ongoing agreement first OPENLY entered into (there were many such secret agreements before that) by Churchill and Roosevelt in 1938, under the terms of which U.S. intelligence services are obliged to share intelligence secrets with British intelligence.

This is the basis of the so-called "special relationship" between the two countries about which Churchill and Lord Halifax boasted and which "special relationship" was responsible for the U.S. fighting the Gulf War against Iraq for and on behalf of British interests, more especially British Petroleum, one of the most important companies in the Committee of 300 in which Queen Elizabeth's immediate family has a big stake.

No intelligence activity has taken place since 1938 except through this special joint command structure. Philip Agee joined the CIA after graduating from Notre Dame where he was inducted into its Jesuit Freemason ring. Agee first came to my attention in 1968 as the intelligence officer behind the riots at the University of Mexico. One of the most important things about the Mexican student riots was that they occurred at the same time as student rioting in New York, Bonn, Prague and West Berlin.

With the coordination expertise and its special intelligence network of which INTERPOL is an integral part, it is not as difficult as it might seem at first sight for the Committee to set in motion carefully timed global actions, whether they be student rioting or deposing leaders of supposedly sovereign nations. It is all in a day's work for the "Olympians." From Mexico, Agee moved on to align himself with Puerto Rican terrorist groups. During this time he became a trusted confidant of the Cuban dictator, Fidel Castro.

It should not be imagined that while Agee was carrying out these operations, he was doing so as a "rogue" agent. On the contrary, he was working for the CIA all during these assignments. Trouble came when Castro's DGI (Cuban intelligence service) was able to "turn" him. Agee continued to work in his capacity as a member of the CIA until his double role was uncovered. This involved the biggest Soviet listening post in the West located at Lourdes, Cuba. Staffed by 3000 Soviet specialists in signals monitoring and deciphering, Lourdes has the capability of monitoring thousands of electronic signals simultaneously. Many a private phone conversation between a member of Congress and his mistress was picked up at Lourdes and used to telling effect.

Although we are told today in 1991 that "Communism is dead," the United States has done nothing to close down the vast spy operation which sits on our doorstep. Incidentally Lourdes has the capability of picking up even the weakest "tempest" signal, which is the type given off by a fax machine or an electric typewriter which, when deciphered, will give the contents of whatever is being typed or faxed. Lourdes remains dagger in the heart of the United States. There is absolutely no reason for its continued existence. If the U.S. and USSR are truly at peace with each other, why the continued need for so massive a spy operation? The simple truth is that, rather than retrenching personnel as we are led to believe, the KGB has taken on additional recruits during 1990 and 1991.

Bernard Levin is probably not a name that is well-known in the United States. Unlike decadent "pop stars" or Hollywood's latest miserable "discovery," academics seldom if ever come before the public eye. Of the hundreds of academics in the United States working under the Control of the Club of Rome, Levin is worthy of special mention, if for no reason other than his role in undermining Iran, the Philippines, South Africa, Nicaragua and South Korea. The demise of the Shah of Iran was run to a plan devised by Bernard Levin and Richard Falk, and supervised by Robert Anderson's Aspen Institute.

Levin was the author of a work entitled "Time Perspective and Morale" which is a Club of Rome publication concerning how to break down the morale of nations and individual leaders. Here is an extract of the document:

"One of the main techniques for breaking morale through a strategy of terror consists in exactly this tactic: keep the person hazy as to where he stands and just what he may expect. In addition, if frequent vacillations between severe disciplinary measures and promise of good treatment together with the spreading of contradictory news make the structure of the situation unclear, then the individual may cease to know whether a particular plan would lead toward or away from his goal. Under these conditions, even those individuals who have definite goals and are ready to take risks are paralyzed by the severe inner conflict in regard to what to do."

This Club of Rome blueprint applies to COUNTRIES as well as to individuals, particularly the government leaders of those countries. We in the U.S. need not think that "Oh well, this is America, and those kinds of things just do not happen here." Let me assure you that they ARE happening in the U.S., and perhaps more so than in any other country.

The Levin-Club of Rome plan is designed to demoralize us all so that in the end we feel we should follow whatever it is that is planned for us. We WILL follow Club of Rome orders like sheep. Any seemingly strong leader who SUDDENLY APPEARS to "rescue" the nation must be regarded with the utmost suspicion. Remember that Khomeini was groomed for years by British intelligence, especially during his time in Paris, before he suddenly appeared as the savior of Iran. Boris Yeltsin is from the same M16-SIS stable.

The Club of Rome feels confident that it has carried out it Committee of 300 mandate to "soften up" the United States. After 45 years of waging war on the people of this nation, who will doubt that it has indeed accomplished its task? Look around and see how we have been demoralized. Drugs, pornography rock and roll "music," free sex, the family unit all but totally undermined, lesbianism, homosexuality and finally the ghastly murder of millions of innocent babies by their own mothers. Has there ever been a crime so vile as mass abortion?

With the U.S. spiritually, morally bankrupted, with our industrial base destroyed throwing 30 million people out of work with our big cities ghastly cesspools of every imaginable crime with a murder rate almost three times higher than any other country, with 4 million homeless, with corruption in government reaching endemic proportions, who will gainsay that the United States is ready to collapse from within, into the waiting arms of the New Dark Age One World Government?

The Club of Rome has succeeded in splitting the Christian churches; it has succeeded in building up an army of charismatics fundamentalists and evangelicals who will fight for the Zionist State of Israel. During the Gulf War of genocide I received scores of letters asking me how I could oppose "a just Christian war against Iraq." How could I doubt that Christian fundamentalist support for the (Committee of 300's) war against Iraq was not Biblical—after all didn't Billy Graham pray with President Bush just before the shooting started? Doesn't the Bible speak of "wars and rumors of wars" ?

These letters give an insight into just how well the Tavistock Institute has done its work. The Christian fundamentalists will be a formidable force behind the state of Israel, exactly as planned. How sad that these fine people do not realize that they have been GROSSLY MISUSED by the Club of Rome and that their opinions and beliefs are NOT THEIR OWN, but those created for them by the hundreds of Committee of 300 "think tanks" that dot the American landscape. In other words, like any other segment of the United States population, the Christian fundamentalists and evangelicals have been thoroughly brainwashed.

We as a nation are ready to accept the demise of the United States of America and the American way of life, once the envy of the entire world. Do not think this has happened on its own-the old "times are changing" syndrome. Time does not change anything, PEOPLE do. It is a mistake to think of the Committee of 300 and the Club of Rome as European institutions. The Club of Rome exercises great influence and power in the United States, and has its own chapter based in Washington D.C.

Senator Claiborne Pell is its leader, and one of its members is Frank M. Potter, a one-time staff director of the House Sub-committee on Energy. It is not difficult to see how the Club of Rome has maintained its grip on U.S. energy policies and where "environmentalist" opposition to nuclear energy is coming from. Perhaps the Club's greatest success story is its hold over Congress in regard to nuclear energy which has had the effect of preventing the U.S. from entering the 21st century as a strong industrial nation. The effect of the anti-nuclear policy of the Club of Rome can be measured in terms of silent blast furnaces. derelict railroad yards, rusting steel mills, shipyards long since closed down and a valuable trained work force scattered across the United States, which may never again be assembled.

Other Club of Rome members in the U.S. are Walter A. Hahn of the Congressional Research Service, Ann Cheatham and Douglas Ross, both senior economists. Ross's task, in his own words, was to "translate Club of Rome perspectives into legislation to help the country get away from the illusion of plenty. " Ann Cheatham was the director of an organization called "Congressional Clearing House For The Future."

Her task was to profile members of Congress who would be susceptible to astrology and New Age mumbo-jumbo. At one stage she had in excess of 100 Congressmen in her classes. Daily sessions were held in which a variety of astrological "forecasts" were made based on her "occult perceptions." Besides Congressmen, other prominent people who attended her sessions were Michael Walsh, Thornton Bradshaw—A LEADING MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE OF 300—and David Sternlight, a senior vice-president of Allstate Insurance Company.

Some of the more important members of the Committee of 300 are also members of NATO, a fact which we ought to remember. These Committee of 300 members often hold several offices. Among the NATO-Club of Rome membership are found Harland Cleveland, a former U.S. ambassador to NATO, Joseph Slater, a director of the Aspen Institute, Donald Lesh, a former staffer in the U.S. National Security Agency, George McGhee and Claiborne Pell, to name a few examples.

It is important that we remember these names, make a list of them if you wish, so as to recall who they are and what they stand for when their names come up in television programs and news services. Following intelligence modus vivendi, leaders of the Committee often appear on television, usually in the most innocent of guises. We ought to be aware that nothing they do is innocent.

The Committee of 300 has planted its agents in the muscle and sinew of the United States, in its government, in Congress, in advisory posts around the President, as ambassadors and as Secretaries of State. From time to time the Club of Rome holds gatherings and conferences which, although they appear under innocuous titles, break up into action committees, each of which is assigned a specific task and a specific target date by which time their assignments must be completed. If it does nothing else, the Committee of 300 is working to a very specific time-table.

The first Club of Rome conference in the United States was called by the Committee of 300 in 1969 under the title: "The Association of the Club of Rome." The next meeting was held in 1970 under the title "Riverdale Center of Religious Research" and was directed by Thomas Burney. Then followed the Woodlands Conference held in Houston, Texas, starting in 1971 Thereafter, regular conferences have been held at Woodlands every year.

Also in 1971, at a later date, the Mitchell Energy and Development Corporation held its energy strategy meeting for the Club of Rome: The recurring theme: LIMIT THE GROWTH OF THE U.S.A. Then to crown it all, the First Global Conference on the Future was held in July of 1980, attended by 4000 social engineers and members of think tanks, all of whom were menbers of or affiliated with various institutions operating under Club of Rome umbrella organizations.

The First Global Conference on the Future had the blessing of the White House which held its own conference based on the transcripts of the First Global Conference forum. It was called the "White House Commission on the 1980's" and OFFICIALLY recommended the policies of the Club of Rome "as a guide to future U.S. policies" and even went so far as to say that the United States economy is moving out of the industrial phase This echoed the theme of Sir Peter Vickers Hall and Zbibniew Brzezinsky and provides further proof of the control exercised by the Committee of 300 over U.S. affairs, both domestic and foreign.

As I said in 1981, we are set up, politically, socially and economically so that we remain locked into the Club of Rome's plans. Everything is RIGGED against us. If we are to survive then we must break the stranglehold the Committee of 300 has on our government. In every election since Calvin Coolidge ran for the White House, the Committee of 300 has been able to plant its agents in key positions in government so that it matters not who gets the White House post. For example, every one of the candidates who ran for the Presidency, from the time of Franklin D. Roosevelt, were selected, some like to call it "hand picked," by the Council on Foreign Relations acting on the instructions of the RIIA.

Especially in the 1980 election, every candidate for the highest office in the United States was run by the CFR. Therefore it was of no consequence to the conspirators who won the presidential race. Through such Trojan Horses as the Heritage Foundation and the CFR, ALL key policy making positions in the new administrations were filled by the Council on Foreign Relations nominees, and before that, since the 1960's, by NATOClub of Rome yes-men, thereby ensuring that key policy decisions bore the indelible stamp of the Club of Rome and the CFR, acting as the executive arms of the Committee of 300.

Both the 1984 and 1988 elections followed this longestablished pattern. Secretary of State George Schultz was the perfect choice of the Committee of 300 for the office of Secretary of State. Schultz was always a creature of Henry Kissinger, the ruling order-giver for the CFR. Moreover, his position with Bechtel, a key Committee of 300 company of global dimensions, gave him access to countries that might otherwise have been suspicious of his Kissinger connection. The Carter Administration accelerated the process of key pro-conspiracy personnel in key positions. Before Carter was elected, his key campaign strategist, Hamilton Jordan, said that if Cyrus Vance or Brzezinski received appointments in the Carter cabinet, he, Jordan, would resign. They did. Jordan did not resign.

Carter's choice of Paul Volcker (in fact he was told to appoint Volcker by David Rockefeller) started the collapse of the U.S. economy according to the plan laid down by the Club of Rome. We are up against powerful forces who are dedicated to the goal of a One World Government. We have been engaged in a devastatingly crippling war for the past 45 years, only it is not perceived as such. We are brainwashed, methodically and systematically, without ever being aware of it. The Tavistock Institute provided the system for this to take place, and then set its operations in motion.

The only way we can fight back is by exposing the conspirators and their multiplicity of front organizations. We need men with experience who can formulate strategy to defend our priceless heritage which, once lost, will never again reappear. We need to learn the methods the conspirators use; learn them and adopt counter-measures. Only a crash program will stop the rot which is consuming our nation.

Some may have difficulty in accepting the idea of a global conspiracy because so many writers have made financial gain from it. Others doubt that activity on a global scale can be successfully advanced. They see the huge bureaucracy of our government and then say, "Well, how are we supposed to believe that private people can do more than the government does? This overlooks the fact that government is part of the conspiracy. Hard evidence is what they want and hard evidence is difficult to come by.

Others say, "So what. What do I care about a conspiracy, I don't even bother to vote." That is exactly the way the general population of America was profiled to react. Our people have become discouraged and confused, the results of 45 years of warfare conducted against us. How this is done is explained in Bernard Lewin's book, but how many people would bother to read an academic's non-fiction book? We are reacting exactly as we were profiled to act. Demoralized and confused people will be far more ready to welcome the sudden appearance of a great man who promises to solve every problem and guarantee a wellordered society in which people are fully employed and domestic strife is minimal. Their dictator, for that is who it will be, will be welcomed with open arms.

Knowing WHO the enemy is a vital necessity. No one can fight and against an unidentified enemy. This book could be used as a military field manual. Study its content and memorize all names. I have mentioned profiling techniques quite frequently in this chapter. A full explanation of "profiling" is contained in the next chapter. One of the most profound pieces of information to come out of the science of profiling is the relative ease in which this can be accomplished in individuals, party groups, political entities and so on right on down the line. Once we wake up as to how easy this is to do, the conspiracy will no longer be more than we can comprehend. The assassination of President Kennedy and the attempt on the life of President Reagan become easy to understand.

INSTITUTIONS THROUGH WHICH CONTROL IS EXERCISED

Profiling is a technique developed in 1922 on command of the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA). Major John Rawlings Reese, a British Army technician, was instructed to set up the largest brainwashing facility in the world at the Tavistock Institute for Human Relations as a part of Sussex University. This became the core of Britain's Psychological Warfare Bureau. When I first introduced the names of Reese and Tavistock into the United States in 1970, very little interest was shown. But over the years, as I revealed more and more about Tavistock and its vital role in the conspiracy, it has become popular to imitate my earlier research.

Britain's Psychological Warfare Bureau made extensive use of the work done by Reese on his 80,000 British Army guinea pigs, captive soldiers who underwent many forms of testing. It was Tavistock-designed methods that got the United States into the Second World War and which, under the guidance of Dr. Kurt Lewin, established the OSS, the forerunner of the CIA. Lewin became the director of the Strategic Bombing Survey, which was a plan for the Royal Air Force to concentrate on bombing German worker housing while leaving military targets, such as munition plants, alone. The munition plants on both sides belonged to the international bankers who had no wish to see their assets destroyed.

Later, after the war was over, NATO ordered Sussex University to establish a very special brainwashing center which became part of Britain's Psychological Warfare Bureau, only now, its research was directed toward civilian rather than military applications. We shall return to that super secret unit which was called Science Policy Research Institute (SPRI) under our chapters on drugs.

The idea behind saturation bombing of civilian worker housing was to break the morale of the German worker. It was not designed to affect the war effort against the German military machine. Lewin and his team of actuaries reached a target figure, that if 65% of German worker housing was destroyed by nightly RAF bombing, the morale of the civilian population would collapse.

The actual document was prepared by the Prudential Assurance Company.

The RAF, under the command of "Bomber" Harris, carried out Lewin's plans, culminating in the terror firestorm bombing of Dresden, in which over 125,000, mainly old men, women and children, were killed. The truth of "Bomber" Harris's horror raids on German civilians was a well kept secret until long after the end of WW II.

Tavistock provided most of the detailed programs that led to the establishing of the Office of Naval Intelligence, (ONI) the number one intelligence service in the United States, one which dwarfs the CIA in size and scope. Contracts worth billions of dollars were given to Tavistock by the United States Government and Tavistock's strategic planners provide most of what the Pentagon uses for our defense establishment, even today. Here again is illustrated the grip the Committee of 300 has on the United States, and the majority of our institutions. Tavistock runs over 30 research institutions in the United States, all of which we will name in our charts at the end of the book.

These Tavistock-U.S. institutions have in many cases grown into gargantuan monsters, penetrating every aspect of our government agencies and taking command of all policy making. One of Tavistock's chief wreckers of our way of life was Dr. Alexander King, a founder member of NATO and a favorite with the Committee of 300, as well as an outstanding member of the Club of Rome. Dr. King was assigned by the Club of Rome to destroy America's education by taking control of the National Teachers Association and working in close conjunction with certain law makers and judges. If it was not generally known how all-pervading is the influence of the Committee of 300, this book should dispel every vestige of that doubt.

The trial run for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) a Club of Rome creation came in a test run against the nuclear power station at Three Mile Island, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. Termed "an accident" by the hysterical media, this was not an accident but a deliberately designed crisis test for FEMA. An additional benefit was the fear and hysteria created by the news media which had people fleeing the area when in fact they were never in any danger.

It was considered a success by FEMA and it scored a lot of points for the anti-nuclear forces. TMI became the rallying point for the so-called "environmentalists," a highly financed and controlled group run out of Aspen Institute on behalf of the Club of Rome. Coverage was provided free of charge by William Paley of CBS television, a former British intelligence agent.

FEMA is a natural successor to the Strategic Bombing Survey of WW II. Dr. Kurt Lewin, theoretician for what the Tavistock conspirators called crisis management, was deeply involved in the study. There is an unbroken chain between Lewin and Tavistock that stretches back for thirty-seven years. Lewin incorporated the Strategic Bombing Survey into FEMA, with only a few small adjustments proving necessary, one of the changes being the target, WHICH WAS NO LONGER GERMANY BUT THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. Forty-five years after the end of WW II it is still Tavistock that has its hands on the trigger, and the weapon is pointed at the United States.

The late Margaret Mead conducted an intensive study of the German and Japanese population, under the aegis of Tavistock, on how they reacted to stress caused by aerial bombardment. Irving Janus was an associate professor on the project which was supervised by Dr. John Rawlings Reese, promoted to Brigadier-General in the British Army. The test results were given to FEMA. The Irving Janus report was of great value in formulating FEMA policies. Janus used it in a book which he later wrote entitled AIR WAR AND STRESS. The ideas in his book were followed TO THE LETTER BY FEMA DURING THE THREE MILE ISLAND "CRISIS." Janus had a really simple idea: Simulate a succession of crises and manipulate the population following the Lewin terror tactics and they will do exactly as required.

In carrying out this exercise, Lewin discovered something new, that social control on a wide scale can be achieved by using the news media to bring home the horrors of a nuclear war via the television media. It was discovered that women's magazines were very effective in dramatizing the terrors of a nuclear war. A trial run conducted by Janus had Betty Bumpers, wife of Senator Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, "writing" for McCalls magazine on that subject.

The article appeared in McCalls January 1983 issue. Actually, Mrs. Bumpers did not write the article, it was created for her by a group of writers at Tavistock whose speciality such subject matters are. It was a collection of untruths, non-facts, innuendoes and conjectures based entirely upon false premises. The Bumpers article was typical of the kind of psychological manipulation at which Tavistock is so very good. Not one of the ladies who read McCalls could have failed to be impressed by the terror-horror story of what a nuclear war looks like.

The Committee of 300 has a major bureaucracy at its disposal made up of hundreds of think tanks and front organizations that run the whole gamut of private business and government leaders. I will mention as many as I can fit in, starting with the German Marshall Fund. Its members, and remember they are also members of NATO and the Club of Rome, consist of David Rockefeller of Chase Manhattan Bank, Gabriel Hague of the prestigious Manufactures Hanover Trust and Finance Corporation, Milton Katz of the Ford Foundation, Willy Brandt, leader of Socialist International, KGB agent and member of the Committee of 300, Irving Bluestone, chairman of the United Auto Workers Executive Board, Russell Train, U.S. president of the Club of Rome and Prince Philip's World Wildlife Fund, Elizabeth Midgely, CBS programs producer, B. R. Gifford, director of the Russell Sage Foundation, Guido Goldman of the Aspen Institute the late Averill Harriman, Committee of 300 extraordinary member, Thomas L. Hughes of the Carnegie Endowment Fund, Dennis Meadows and Jay Forrestor of MIT "world dynamics."

The Committee of 300, although in existence for over 150 years, did not take on its present form until around 1897. It was always given to issuing orders through other fronts, such as the Royal Institute for International Affairs. When it was decided that a super-body would control European affairs, the RIIA founded the Tavistock Institute, which in turn created NATO. For Five years NATO was financed by the German Marshall Fund. Perhaps the most important member of the Bilderbergers, a foreign policy body of the Committee, was Joseph Rettinger, said to have been its founder and organizer, whose annual meetings have delighted conspiracy hunters for several decades.

Rettinger was a well-trained Jesuit priest and a 33rd Degree Freemason. Mrs. Katherine Meyer Graham who is suspected of having murdered her husband in order to get control of the Washington Post, was another ranking member of the Club of Rome, as was Paul G. Hoffman of the New York Life Insurance Company, one of the largest insurance companies in the United States and a leading Rank company, with ties directly to Queen Elizabeth of England's immediate family. John J. McCloy, the man who attempted to wipe post-World War II Germany off the map and last but not least, James A. Perkins of the Carnegie Corporation, were also founding members of the Bilderbergers and the Club of Rome.

What a star-studded cast! Yet strangely enough, few if any outside of genuine intelligence agencies had ever heard of this organization until recent times. The power exercised by these important personages and the corporations, television stations newspapers, insurance companies and banks they represent matches the power and prestige of at least two European countries, and still this is only the tip of The Committee of 300's enormous cross-gridding and interfaced interests.

Not mentioned in the foregoing line-up is Richard Gardner who, although an early member of the Committee of 300, was sent to Rome on a special assignment. Gardner married into one of the oldest Black Nobility families of Venice, thus providing the Venetian aristocracy a direct line to the White House. The late Averill Harriman was another of the committee's direct links with the Kremlin and the White House, a position which Kissinger inherited after the death of Harriman.

The Club of Rome is indeed a formidable agency of the Committee of 300. Although ostensibly working on American affairs, the group overlaps other Committee of 300 agencies and its United States members are often found working with "problems" in Japan and Germany. Some of the front organizations operated by the above committee include the following, although not limited to them:

LEAGUE OF INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

Officials: Michael Novak, Jeane Kirkpatrick, Eugene Rostow, IRWIN SUALL, Lane Kirkland, Albert Schenker.

Purpose: To disrupt and disturb normal labor relations between workers and employees by brain washing labor unions to make impossible demands with special attention to steel, automobile and housing industries.

FREEDOM HOUSE

Officials: Leo Churn and Carl Gershman.

Purpose: To spread socialist disinformation among American blue collar workers, spread dissension and dissatisfaction. Now that these objectives have been largely realized, Gershman has been drafted by Lawrence Eagleburger to CEDC, a newly created body to stop a united Germany from expanding its trade into the Danube Basin.

COMMITTEE FOR A DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY

Officials: Ben Wattenburg, Jean Kirkpatrick, Elmo Zumwa and Midge Dector.

Purpose: To provide a connecting link between the educated socialist class and minority groups with the intent of setting up a solid block of voters who can be counted on to vote for leftwing candidates at election time. It was really a Fabianist operation from start to finish.

FOREIGN POLICY RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Officials: Robert Strausz Hupe.

Purpose: To undermine and eventually end NASA space program.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS U.S.A.

Officials: Bayard Rustin, Lane Kirkland, Jay Lovestone, Carl Gershman, Howard Samuel, Sidney Hook.

Purpose: To spread radical socialism, especially among minority groups, and forge links between similar organizations in socialist countries. Lovestone was for decades the leading advisor to U.S. presidents on Soviet affairs and a strong direct link with Moscow.

INSTITUTE FOR SOCIAL RELATIONS

Officials: Harland Cleveland, Willis Harmon.

Purpose: Change the way America thinks.

THE CITIZENS LEAGUE

Officials: Barry Commoner.

Purpose: To bring "common cause" legal suits against various government agencies, especially in the defense industries.

WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE

Officials: Noam Chomsky and David McReynolds.

Purpose: To organize resistance to the Vietnam War among leftwing groups, students and the Hollywood "in crowd."

THE DEMOCRATIC SOCIALIST ORGANIZING COMMITTEE OF THE INSTITUTE FOR DEMOCRATIC SOCIALISM

Officials: Frank Zeider, Arthur Redier and David McReynolds.

Purpose: A clearing house for leftwing socialist ideas and activities in the U.S and Europe.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE FACT FINDING DIVISION

Officials: IRWIN SUALL, also known as John Graham.

Purpose: A joint FBI-British intelligence operation designed to single out rightwing groups and their leaders and put them out of business before they grow too large and too influential.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS

Purpose: A labor oriented front for the Socialist International and a hot-bed of organized labor unrest polarizing workers and management.

AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS

Officials: Murray Findley, IRWIN SUALL and Jacob Scheinkman.

Purpose: Much the same as the Machinists Union, to socialize and polarize workers in the garment trade.

A. PHILIP RANDOLPH INSTITUTE

Officials: Bayard Rustin.

Purpose: To provide a means of coordinating organizations with a common purpose, an example of which would be the spread of socialist ideas among college students and workers.

CAMBRIDGE POLICY STUDIES INSTITUTE

Officials: Gar Apelrovitz.

Purpose: To expand on the work being done at the Institute for Policy Studies. Founded in February 1969 by international socialist, Gar Apelrovitz, former assistant to Senator Gaylord Nelson. Apelrovitz wrote the controversial book ATOMIC DIPLOMACY for the Club of Rome which work was financed by the German Marshall Fund. It concentrates on research and action projects, with a stated goal of fundamentally changing American society, i.e., to create a Fabianist United States in preparation of the coming One World Government.

ECONOMIC COMMITTEE OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC INSTITUTE

Officials: Dr. Aurellio Peccei.

Purpose: NATO think-tank on global economic issues.

CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF DEMOCRATIC INSTITUTIONS

Officials: Founder Robert Hutchins of the Committee of 300, Harry Ashmore, Frank Kelly and a large group of "Fellows."

Purpose: To spread ideas that will bring on social reforms of the liberal kind with democracy as an ideology. One of its activities is to draft a new constitution for the U.S. which will be strongly monarchical and socialistic as found in Denmark.

The Center is an "Olympian" stronghold. Located in Santa Barbara, it is housed in what is affectionately called "the Parthenon." Former Representative John Rarick called it "an outfit loaded with Communists." By 1973 work on a new United States Constitution was in its thirty-fifth draft which proposes an amendment guaranteeing "environmental right," the thrust of which is to reduce the industrial base of the U.S. to a mere whisper of what it was in 1969. In other words, this institution is carrying out Club of Rome zero-growth post-industrial policies laid down by the Committee of 300.

Some of its other aims are control of economic cycles, welfare, regulation of business and national public works, control of pollution. Speaking on behalf of the Committee of 300, Ashmore says the function of the CSDI is to find ways and means of making our political system work more effectively. "We must change education and we must consider a new U.S Constitution and a Constitution for the world," Ashmore says.

Further goals enunciated by Ashmore are as follows:

(1) Membership of the U.N. must be made universal.

(2) The U.N. must be strengthened.

(3) South East Asia must be neutralized. (For neutralized, read "Communized.")

(4) Cold War must be ended.

(5) Racial discrimination must be abolished.

(6) Developing nations must be assisted. (Meaning assisted to destruct.)

(7) No military solutions to problems. (Pity they didn't tell George Bush that before the Gulf War.)

(8) National solutions are not adequate.

(9) Coexistence is necessary.

HARVARD PSYCHOLOGICAL CLINIC

Officials: Dr. Kurt Lewin and staff of 15 new-science scientists.

Purpose: To create a climate where the Committee of 300 can take unlimited power over the U.S.

INSTITUTE FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

Officials: Dr. Kurt Lewin and staff of 20 new-science scientists.

Purpose: To devise a whole new set of social programs to steer America away from industry.

SCIENCE POLICY RESEARCH UNIT

Officials: Leland Bradford, Kenneth Dam, Ronald Lippert.

Purpose: A "Future Shocks" research institution at Sussex University in England and part of the Tavistock network.

SYSTEMS DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Officials: Sheldon Arenberg and a staff of hundreds, too numerous to mention here.

Purpose: To coordinate all elements of the intelligence communities of the U.S.A. and Britain. It analyzes what "players" have to be assigned the role of a national entity; for example, Spain would come under a supine watered-down Catholic Church, the U.N. under the Secretary General and so forth. It developed the system of "X RAY 2" where think tank personnel, military installations and law enforcement centers are all linked to the Pentagon through a nation-wide network of Teletypes and computers: To apply surveillance techniques on a nation-wide scale. Arenberg says his ideas are non-military, but his techniques are mainly those he learned from the military. He was responsible for the New York State Identification and Intelligence System, a typical George Orwell "1984" project, which is completely illegal under our Constitution. The NYSIIS system is in the process of being adopted nationwide. It is what Brzezinsk referred to as the ability to almost instantaneously retrieve data about any person.

NYSIIS shares data with all law enforcement and government agencies in the state. It provides storage and rapid retrieval of individual records, criminal and social. It is a TYPICAL Committee of 300 project. There is a crying need for a full investigation to be conducted into just what it is that Systems Development Corporation is doing, but that is beyond the scope of this book. One thing is sure, SDC is not there to preserve freedom and liberty guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. How convenient that it should be located in Santa Barbara in easy reach of Robert Hutchins "Parthenon." Some publications put out by these Club of Rome institutions are as follows:

"Center Magazine"
"Counterspy"
"Coventry"
"Covert Action Information Bulletin"
"Dissent"
"Human Relations"
"Industrial Research"
"Inquiry"
"Mother Jones"
"One"
"Progressive"
"Raconteur"
"The New Republic"
"Working Papers for a New Society"

These are by no means all of the publications issued under the auspices of the Club of Rome. There are many hundreds more, in fact each of the foundations puts out its own publication. Given the number of foundations run by the Tavistock Institute and the Club of Rome, a partial listing is all we can include here. Some of the more important foundations and think tanks are in the following list, which includes Army think tanks.

The American public would be astounded if it only knew how deeply the Army is involved in "new war tactics" research with Committee of 300 "think tanks." Americans are not aware that in 1946 the Club of Rome was ordered by the Committee of 300 to further the progress of think tanks which it said offered a new means of spreading the Committee's philosophy. The impact of these think tanks upon our military, just since 1959 when they suddenly proliferated, is truly astounding. There is no doubt that they will play an even greater role in the daily affairs of this nation as we come to the close of the 20th century.

THE MONT PELERIN SOCIETY

Mont Pelerin is an economic foundation devoted to issuing misleading economic theories and influencing economists in the Western world to follow models it lays out from time to time. Its leading practitioners are Von Hayek and Milton Friedman.

THE HOOVER INSTITUTION

Founded originally to fight Communism, the institution has slowly but surely turned toward Socialism. It has an annual budget of $2 million, funded by companies under the umbrella of the Committee of 300. It now concentrates on "peaceful changes" with emphasis on arms control and domestic U.S. problems. It is Frequently used by the news media as a "conservative" organization whose views they seek when a conservative viewpoint is needed. The Hoover Institution is far from that, and following the 1953 take-over of the Institution by a group allied to the Club of Rome, it has become a One World-New World Order outlet for "desirable" policies.

HERITAGE FOUNDATION

Founded by brewery magnate Joseph Coors to act as a conservative think tank, Heritage was soon taken over by Fabianists Sir Peter Vickers Hall, Stuart Butler, Steven Ayzlei, Robert Moss and Frederich Von Hayek under the direction of the Club of Rome. This institute played a major role in carrying out British Labour leader Anthony Wedgewood Benn's order to "Thatcherize Reagan." Heritage is certainly not a conservative operation although at times it may look and sound like one.

HUMAN RESOURCES RESEARCH OFFICE.

This is an Army research establishment dealing in "psychotechnology." Most of its personnel are Tavistock-trained. "Psychotechnology" covers GI motivation, morale and music used by the enemy. In fact a lot of what George Orwell wrote about in his book "1984" appears to be remarkably similar to what is taught at HUMRRO. In 1969, the Committee of 300 took over this important institution and turned it into a private non-profit organization run under the auspices of the Club of Rome. It is the largest behavioral research group in the U.S.

One of its specialities is the study of small groups under stress and HUMRRO teaches the Army that a soldier is merely an extension of his equipment and has brought great influence to bear on the "man/weapon" system and its "human quality control," so widely accepted by the United States Army. HUMRRO has had a very pronounced effect on how the Army conducts itself. Its mind-bending techniques are straight out of Tavistock. HUMRRO'S applied psychology courses are supposed to teach Army brass how to make the human weapon work. A good example of this is the manner in which soldiers in the war against Iraq were willing to disobey their field manual standing orders and bury 12,000 Iraqi soldiers alive.

This type of brainwashing is terribly dangerous because today, it is applied to the Army, the Army applies it to brutally destroy thousands of "enemy" soldiers, and tomorrow the Army could be told that civilian population groups opposed to government policies are "the enemy." We are already a mindless brainwashed flock of sheep, yet it seems that HUMRRO can take mind bending and mind control a step further. HUMRRO is a valuable adjunct to Tavistock and many of the lessons taught at HUMRRO were applied in the Gulf War, which makes it a little easier to understand how it came to be that American soldiers behaved as ruthless and heartless killers, a far cry from the concept of the traditional American fighting man.

RESEARCH ANALYSIS CORPORATION.

This is HUMRRO'S sister "1984" organization situated in McLean, Virginia. Established in 1948, it was taken over by the Committee of 3OO in 1961 when it became part of the Johns Hopkins bloc. It has worked on over 600 projects, including integrating Negroes into the Army, the tactical use of nuclear weapons, psychological warfare programs and mass population control.

Obviously there are many more major think tanks, and we shall come to most of them in this book. One of the most important areas of cooperation between what think tanks turn out and what becomes government and public policy are the "pollsters." It is the job of the polling companies to mold and shape public opinion in the way that suits the conspirators. Polls are constantly being taken by CBS-NBC-ABC, the New York Times, the Washington Post. Most of these efforts are coordinated at the National Opinion Research Center where, as much as it will amaze most of us, a psychological profile was developed for the entire nation.

Findings are fed into the computers of Gallup Poll and Yankelovich, Skelley and White for comparative evaluation. Much of what we read in our newspapers or see on television has first been cleared by the polling companies. WHAT WE SEE IS WHAT THE POLLSTERS THINK WE SHOULD SEE. This is called "public opinion making." The whole idea behind this bit of social conditioning is to find out how responsive the public is to POLICY DIRECTIVES handed down by the Committee of 300. We are called "targeted population groups" and what is measured by the pollsters is how much resistance is generated to what appears in the "Nightly News." Later, we shall learn exactly how this deceptive practice got started and who is responsible for it.

It is all part of the elaborate opinion-making process created at, Tavistock. Today our people believe they are well-informed but what they do not realize is that the opinions they believe are their own were in fact created in the research institutions and think tanks of America and that none of us are free to form our own opinions because of the information we are provided with by the media and the pollsters.

Polling was brought to a fine art just before the United States entered the Second World War. Americans, unbeknown to themselves, were conditioned to look upon Germany and Japan as dangerous enemies who had to be stopped. In a sense, this was true, and that makes conditioned thinking all the more dangerous, because based on the INFORMATlON fed to them, the enemy did indeed appear to be Germany and Japan. Just recently we saw how well Tavistock's conditioning process works when Americans were conditioned to perceive Iraq as a threat and Saddam Hussein as a personal enemy of the United States.

Such a conditioning process is technically described as "the message reaching the sense organs of persons to be influenced." One of the most respected of all pollsters is Committee of 300 member Daniel Yankelovich, of the company, Yankelovich, Skelley and White. Yankelovich is proud to tell his students that polling is a tool to change public opinion, although this is not original, Yankelovich having drawn his inspiration from David Naisbett's book "TREND REPORT" which was commissioned by the Club of Rome.

In his book Naisbett describes all of the techniques used by public opinion makers to bring about the public opinion desired by the Committee of 300. Public opinion making is the jewel in the crown of the OLYMPIANS, for with their thousands of newscience social scientists at their beck and call, and with the news media firmly in their hands, NEW public opinions on almost any subject can be created and disseminated around the world in a matter of two weeks.

This is precisely what happened when their servant George Bush was ordered to make war on Iraq. Within two weeks, not only the U.S. but almost the entire world public opinion was turned against Iraq and its President Saddam Hussein. These media change artists and news manipulators report directly to the Club of Rome which in turn reports to the Committee of 300 at whose head sits the Queen of England ruling over a vast network of closely-linked corporations who never pay taxes and are answerable to no one, who fund their research institutions through foundations whose joint activities have almost total control over our daily lives.

Together with their interlocking companies, insurance business, banks, finance corporations, oil companies, newspapers, magazines, radio and television, this vast apparatus sits astride the United States and the world. There is not a politician in Washington D.C. who is not, somehow, beholden to it. The Left rails against it, calling it "imperialism" which indeed it is, but the left is run by the same people, the very same ones who control the right, so that the left is no more free than we are!

Scientists engaged in the process of conditioning are called "social engineers" or "new-science social scientists" and they play an integral part in what we see, hear and read. The "old school" social engineers were Kurt K. Lewin, Professor Hadley Cantril, Margaret Meade, Professor Derwin Cartwright and Professor Lipssitt who, together with John Rawlings Reese, made up the backbone of new-science scientists at Tavistock Institute.

During the Second World War, there were over 100 researchers at work under the direction of Kurt Lewin, copying slavishly the methods adopted by Reinhard Heydrich of the S.S. The OSS was based on Heydrich's methodology and, as we know, the OSS was the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency. The point of all this is that the governments of Britain and the United States already have the machinery in place to bring us into line in a New World Order with only a slight modicum of resistance materializing, and this machinery has been in place since 1946. Each passing year has added new refinements.

It is this Committee of 300 which has established control networks and mechanisms far more binding than anything ever seen in this world. Chains and ropes are not needed to restrain us. Our fear of what is to come does that job far more efficiently than any physical means of restraint. We have been brainwashed to give up our Constitutional right to bear arms; to give up our Constitution itself; to allow the United Nations to exercise control over our foreign policies and the IMF to take control of our fiscal and monetary policies; to permit the President to break United States law with impunity and to invade a foreign country and kidnap its head-of-state. In short we have been brainwashed to the extent where we, as a nation, will accept each and every lawless act carried out by our government almost without question.

I for one know that we will soon have to fight to reclaim our country from the Committee, or lose it forever. BUT when it comes right down to it, how many will actually take up arms? In 1776 only 3% of the populace took up arms against King George III. This time around, 3% will be woefully inadequate. We should not allow ourselves to be led down dead-end roads, for that is what our mind controllers have planned for us by confronting us with such a complexity of issues that we simply succumb to long range penetration and make no decisions at all on many vital issues.

We shall be looking at the names of those who make up the Committee of 300 but, before we do that, we should examine the massive interfacing of all important institutions, companies and banks under the Committee's control. We must mark them well because these are the people who are deciding who shall live and who shall be eliminated as "useless eaters"; where we will worship God, what we must wear and even what we shall eat. According to Brzezinski, we shall be under endless surveillance around the clock for 365 days a year ad infinitum.

That we have been betrayed from within is being accepted by more and more people each year, and that is good, because it is through knowledge, a word translated from the word BELIEF, that we shall be able to defeat the enemies of all mankind. While we were being distracted by the bogeymen in the Kremlin, the Trojan Horse was moved into position in Washington D.C. The greatest danger free people face today is not from Moscow but from Washington D.C. We need first to conquer the DOMESTIC ENEMY, and after that we will be strong enough to mount an offensive to remove Communism from the earth together with all of its attendant "isms."

The Carter Administration accelerated the collapse of our economy and our military strength, the latter begun by Club of Rome and Lucis Trust member Robert Strange McNamara. In spite of his promises, Reagan continued to undermine our industrial base, starting where Carter left off. While we need to keep our defenses strong, we cannot do that from a weak industrial base for, without a well-run military-industrial complex, we cannot have a viable defense system. The Committee of 300 recognizes this and planned from 1953 its zero-growth post-industrial policies now in full flower.

Thanks to the Club of Rome our technology potential has dropped below that of Japan and Germany, nations we are supposed to have defeated in the Second World War. How has this come about? Because of men like Dr. Alexander King and our blindfolded state of mind, we have failed to recognize the destruction of our educational institutions and systems of teaching. As a result of our blindness, we are no longer training engineers and scientist in sufficient numbers to keep us among the industrialized nations of the world. Thanks to Dr. King, a man very few people in America know about, education in the U.S. is at its lowest level since 1786. Statistics produced by the Institute for Higher Learning show that the reading and writing capabilities of high school children the United States are LOWER than they were among high school children in 1786.

What we face today is not only the loss of our freedom and the very fabric of our nation, but far worse, the possibility of the loss of our souls. The steady chipping away at the foundation upon which this republic rests has left an empty void, which satanists and cultists are rushing to fill with their synthetic soul material. This truth is difficult to accept and appreciate because there was nothing SUDDEN about these events. If a sudden shock were to hit us, a cultural and religious shock, we would be shaken out of our apathy.

But gradualism—which is what Fabianism is, does nothing to raise the alarm. Because the vast majority of Americans can see no MOTIVATION for the things I have described, they cannot accept it, and so the conspiracy is scorned and often mocked. By creating chaos through presenting hundreds of daily choices our people have to make, we have come down to a position where, unless motivation can be clearly shown, all information is rejected.

This is both the weak and the strong link in the conspiratorial chain. Most thrust aside anything that has no motive, so the conspirators feel safe behind the ridicule poured upon those who point to the coming crisis in our nation and our individual lives. However, if we can get enough people to see the truth, the motivation block gets weaker until it will eventually be forced aside as more and more people become enlightened and the notion that "this cannot happen in America" is dispensed with.

The Committee of 300 is counting on our maladaptive responses to govern our reaction to created events, and it will not be disappointed as long as we as a nation continue in the present way we respond. We must turn responses to created crises into ADAPTIVE responses by identifying the conspirators and exposing their plans for us, so that these things become public knowledge. The Club of Rome has already made THE TRANSITION TO BARBARISM. Instead of waiting to be "raptured," we must stop the Committee of 300 before it can accomplish its goal of making us prisoners of the" New Dark Age" planned for us. It is not up to God, IT IS UP TO US. We have to take the necessary action.

All information that I provide in this book comes from years of research backed up by impeccable intelligence sources. Nothing is exaggerated. It is factual and precise so do not fall into the trap set by the enemy that this material is "disinformation." For the past two decades I have provided information which has proved to be highly accurate and which has explained a lot of puzzling events. My hope is that through this book, a better, clearer and wider understanding of the conspiratorial forces ranged against this nation will come about. That hope is being realized as more and more young people are beginning to ask questions and seek information about what is REALLY going on.

It is difficult for people to comprehend that these conspirators are real and that they have the power I and many others have attributed to them. Many have written to ask how it is that our government does nothing about the terrible threat to civilization? The problem is that our government is PART of the problem, part of the conspiracy, and nowhere and at no time has this become more clearly evident than during the Bush Presidency. Of course President Bush knows precisely what the Committee of 300 is doing to us. HE WORKS FOR THEM. Others have written to say, "We thought we were fighting the government." Of course we are, but behind government stands a force so powerful and all-encompassing that intelligence agencies are even afraid to mention the name "Olympians."

Proof of the Committee of 300 is found in the vast number of powerful institutions owned and controlled by it. Listed here are some of the more important ones, all of which come under the

MOTHER OF ALL THINK TANKS AND RESEARCH INSTITUTIONS, THE TAVISTOCK INSTITUTE OF HUMAN RELATIONS with its far-flung network of hundreds of "branches." STANFORD RESEARCH CENTER

Stanford Research Center (SRC) was founded in 1946 by the Tavistock Institute For Human Relations. Stanford was created to help Robert 0. Anderson and his ARCO oil company, who had secured for the Committee of 300 the oil rights on the North Slope of Alaska. Basically, the job was too large for Anderson's Aspen Institute to handle, so a new center had to be founded and funded. That new center was Stanford Research Center. Alaska sold its rights on a downpayment of $900 million, a relatively small amount for the Committee of 300. The governor of Alaska was steered to SRI for help and advice. This was no accident but the result of judicious planning and a process of long-range conditioning.

Following the governor's call for help, three SRI scientists set up shop in Alaska where they met with the Alaskan Secretary of State and the State Planning Office. Francis Greehan, who headed the SRI team, assured the Governor that his problem of how to handle the rich oil find would be safe in the hands of SRI. Naturally Greehan did not mention the Committee of 300 or the Club of Rome. In less than a month Greehan assembled a team of economists, petroleum scientists and new-science scientists numbering in the hundreds. The report SRI gave to the Governor ran to eighty-eight pages.

The proposal was adopted virtually without change by the Alaska legislature in 1970. Greehan had indeed done a remarkable job for the Committee of 300. From this beginning SRI developed into an institution employing 4000 people with an annual budget of $160 million plus. Its President, Charles A. Anderson, has seen much of this growth during his tenure, as has Professor Willis Harmon, director of the SRI Center for the Study of Social Policies, employing hundreds of new-science scientists, many of the top staffers having been transferred from Tavistock's London base. One of those was RCA board chairman and former British intelligence agent, David Sarnoff, who was closely involved with Harmon and his team for twenty-five years. Sarnoff was something of a "watchdog" for the mother institute in Sussex.

Stanford claims to make no moral judgments on projects it accepts, working for Israel and the Arabs, South Africa and Libya but, as one would imagine, by adopting this attitude it ensures an "inside edge" with foreign governments that the CIA has found most useful. In Jim Ridgeway's book, "THE CLOSED CORPORATION," SRI spokesman Gibson brags about SRI's non-discriminatory stance. Although not on the Federal Contract Research Center lists, SRI is today the largest military think tank, dwarfing Hudson and Rand. Among SRl's speciality departments are chemical and biological warfare experimental centers.

One of Stanford's more dangerous activities is counter-insurgency operations aimed at civilian populations—just the sort of "1984" things government is already using against its own people. The U.S. government pays SRI millions of dollars each year for this kind of highly controversial "research." Following student protests against chemical warfare experiments conducted at Stanford, SRI "sold" itself to a private group for just $25 million. Of course nothing really changed, SRI was still a Tavistock project and the Committee of 300 still owned it, but the gullible appeared to be satisfied by this meaningless cosmetic change.

In 1958 a startling new development arose. Advanced Research Products Agency (ARPA), a contracting agency for the Defense Department, approached SRI with a top secret proposal. John Foster at the Pentagon told SRI that what was needed was a program to insure the United States against "technological surprise." Foster wanted to perfect a condition where the environment became a weapon; special bombs to trigger volcanos and/or earthquakes, behavioral research on potential enemies and minerals and metals with potential for new weapons. The project was accepted by SRI and code-named "SHAKY."

The massive electronic brain in SHAKY was capable of carrying out many commands, its computers having been constructed by IBM for SRI. Twenty-eight scientists worked on what is called "Human Augmentation." The IBM computer even has the capability to solve problems by analogy and recognizes and identifies scientists who work with it. The "special applications" of this tool can be better imagined than described. Brzezinski knew what he was talking about when he wrote "THE TECHNOTRONIC ERA."

Stanford Research Institute works closely with scores of civilian consulting firms, trying to apply military technology to domestic situations. This has not always been a success, but as techniques improve, the prospects for massive all-pervading surveillance, as described by Brzezinski, daily becomes more real. IT ALREADY EXISTS AND IS IN USE, EVEN THOUGH SLIGHT MALFUNCTIONS FROM TIME TO TIME HAVE TO BE IRONED OUT. One such civilian consulting firm was Schriever McKee Associates of McLean, Virginia, run by retired General Bernard A. Schriever, a former chief of the Air Force Systems Command, who developed the Titan, Thor, Atlas and Minuteman rockets.

Schriever put together a consortium of Lockheed, Emmerson Electric, Northrop, Control Data, Raytheon and TRW under the name of URBAN SYSTEMS ASSOCIATES, INC. The purpose of the consortium? To solve social and psychological "urban problems" by means of military techniques using advanced electronic systems. It is interesting to note that TRW became the largest credit information collecting company in the credit-reporting business as a result and an outcome of its work with Urban Systems Associates, Inc.

This should tell us a great deal about just how far this nation is already under TOTAL SURVEILLANCE, which is the first requirement of the Committee of 300. No dictatorship, especially not one on a global scale, can function without total control over each and every individual. SRI was well on its way to becoming a key Committee of 300 research organization.

By the 1980's, 60% of SRI's contracts were devoted to "Futurism" with both military and civilian applications. Its major clients were the U.S. Department of Defense-Directorate of Defense Research and Engineering, Office of Aerospace Research which dealt with "Applications of the Behavioral Sciences to Research Management," Executive Office of the President, Office of Science and Technology, U.S. Department of Health. On behalf of the Department of Health, SRI ran a program called "'Patterns in ESDEA Title I Reading Achievement Tests." Other clients were the U.S. Department of Energy, the U.S. Department of Labor, U.S. Department of Transportation and the National Science Foundation (NSF). Of significance was the paper developed for NSF, entitled "Assessment of Future and International Problems."

Stanford Research, under the tutelage of Tavistock Institute in London, put together a far reaching and chilling system it called "Business Intelligence Program." In excess of 600 companies in the U.S. and abroad became subscribers. The program covered research in Japanese Foreign Business Relations, Consumer Marketing in a Period of Change, The Mounting Challenge of International Terrorism, Sensory Evaluation in Consumer Products, Electronic Funds Transfer System, Opto-Electric Sensing, Exploratory Planning Methods, the U.S. Defense Industry and Capital Availability. Among the TOP Committee of 300 companies who became clients of this program were Bechtel Corporation (George Schultz was on its board), Hewlett Packard, TRW, Bank of America, Shell Company, RCA, Blyth, Eastman Dillon, Saga Foods Corporation, McDonnell Douglas, Crown Zellerbach, Wells Fargo Bank and Kaiser Industries.

But one of the most sinister of all SRI programs with the possibilities of doing tremendous damage in altering the direction in which the United States will go, socially, morally and religiously, was Stanford's Charles F. Kettering Foundation's "CHANGING IMAGES OF MAN" under Stanford official reference "Contract Number URH (489)-2150 Policy Research Report Number 4/4/74, Prepared by the SRI Center for the Study of Social Policy, Director Willis Harmon." This is probably one of the most far-reaching investigations into how man might be changed that has ever been conducted.

The report, covering 319 pages, was written by 14 new science scientists under the supervision of Tavistock and 23 top controllers including B. F. Skinner, Margaret Meade, Ervin Lazlo and Sir Geoffrey Vickers, a high-level British intelligence officer in M16. It will be recalled that his son-in-law, Sir Peter Vickers Hall, was a founding member of the so-called conservative "Heritage Foundation." Much of the 3000 pages of "recommendations" given to the Reagan administration in January 1981 were based upon material taken from Willis Harmon's "CHANGING IMAGES OF MAN."

I was privileged to receive a copy of "THE CHANGING IMAGES OF MAN" from my intelligence colleagues five days after it was accepted by the United States government. What I read shocked me, as I realized I was looking at a blueprint for a future America, unlike anything I had ever seen before. The nation was to be programmed to change and become so accustomed to such planned changes that it would hardly be noticeable when profound changes did occur. We have gone downhill so fast since "THE AQUARIAN CONSPIRACY" (the book title of Willis Harmon's technical paper) was written, that today, divorce draws no stigma, suicide is at an all time high and raises few eyebrows, social deviations from the norm and sexual aberrations, once unmentionable in decent circles, are now commonplace and excite no special protest.

As a nation we have not noticed how "CHANGING IMAGES OF MANKIND" has radically altered our American way of life forever. Somehow we were overcome by the "Watergate Syndrome." For a while we were shocked and dismayed to learn that Nixon was nothing but a cheap crook who hobnobbed with Earl Warren's Mafia friends at the beautiful home they built for him adjoining the Nixon estate. When too many "future shocks" and news headlines demanded our attention, we lost our way, or rather, the huge number of choices with which we were and still are daily confronted, confused us to such a degree that we were no longer able to make the necessary choices.

Worse yet, having been subjected to a barrage of crimes in high places, plus the trauma of the Vietnam War, our nation seemed no longer to want truths. Such reaction is carefully explained in Willis Harmon's technical paper, in short, the American nation was reacting exactly as profiled. Worse yet, in not wishing to accept truth, we took matters a step further: We looked to government to shield us from the truth.

The corrupt stench of the Reagan-Bush Administrations we wanted covered with six feet of earth. The crimes committed under the title of Iran/Contra affair (or scandals), we didn't want uncovered. We let our President lie to us regarding his where abouts in the period October 20-23rd, 1980. Yet these crimes far exceed in quantity and scope anything Nixon did while he was in office. Do we as a nation recognize it as going downhill with our brakes off?

No, we do not. When those whose business it is to bring the truth to the American people that a private, well-organized little government inside the White House was busy committing one crime after another, crimes which attacked the very soul of this nation and the republican institutions upon which it rested, we were told not to bother the public with such things. "We really don't want to know about all this speculation," became a standard response.

When the highest elected official of the land blatantly put U.N. law above the Constitution of the United States—an impeachible offense, the majority accepted it as "normal." When the highest elected official of the land went to war without a Congressional declaration of war, the fact was censored out by the news media and, again, we accepted it rather than face the truth.

When the Gulf War, which our President plotted and planned, began, not only were we happy with censorship of the most blatant kind, we even took it to our hearts, believing that it was "good tor the war effort." Our President lied, April Glaspie lied, the State Department lied. They said the war was justified because President Hussein had been warned to leave Kuwait alone. When Glaspie's cables to the State Department were finally made public, one United States Senator after another went charging to defend Glaspie, the harlot. It mattered not that they came from both the Democrats and the Republicans. We, the people, let them get away with their vile lies.

In this public attitude of the American people, the wildest dreams of Willis Harmon and his teams of scientists became a reality. The Tavistock Institute was elated at its success in destroying the self respect and self esteem of this once great nation. We are told that we won the Gulf War. What is not yet perceived by the vast majority of Americans is that, in winning the war, it cost the self respect and honor of our nation. That lies rotting in the desert sands of Kuwait and Iraq, alongside the corpses of the Iraqi soldiers we butchered in the agreed retreat from Kuwait and Basra—we could not keep our word that we would abide by the Geneva Conventions and not attack them. "What do you want," our controllers asked us, "victory or self respect? You can't have both."

One hundred years ago, this could not have happened, but now it has happened and excites no comment. We have succumbed to the long range penetration warfare waged against this nation by Tavistock. Like the German nation, defeated by the Prudential Bombing Survey, enough of us have succumbed to make this nation the kind that totalitarian regimes of the past would have only envisaged in their dreams. "Here," they would say, "is a nation, one of the largest in the world, that doesn't want the truth. All of our propaganda agencies can be dispensed with. We don't have to struggle to keep the truth from this nation, they have willingly rejected it of their own volition. This nation is a pushover."

Our once proud Republic of the United States of America became no more than a series of criminal front organizations, which history shows is always the start of totalitarianism. This is the stage of permanent alteration we are at in America as 1991 drew to a close. We live in a throw-away society, programmed not to last. We do not even flinch at the 4 million homeless nor the 30 million jobless, nor the 15 million babies murdered thus far. They are "throw-aways" of the Age of Aquarius, a conspiracy so damnable that, when first confronted with it, the majority will disavow its existence, rationalizing these events as "times have changed."

This is how the Tavistock Institute and Willis Harmon programmed us to react. Dismantling of our ideals goes on without protest. The spiritual and intellectual drive of our people has been destroyed! On May 27th, 1991, President Bush made a very profound statement, the thrust of which appears to have been totally misused by most political commentators:

"The moral dimension of American policy requires us to chart a moral course through a world of lesser evils. That is the real world, not black and white. Very few moral absolutes."

What else could we expect from a President who is most probably the most evil man ever to occupy the White House? Consider this in the light of his order to the military to bury alive 12,000 Iraqi soldiers. Consider this in the light of his ongoing war of genocide against the Iraqi people. President Bush was delighted to characterize President Saddam Hussein as the "Hitler of our times." He never bothered to offer a single scrap of proof. It was not needed. Because President Bush made the statement, we accepted it without question. Consider this in the bright light of truth, that he did all of these things in the name of the American people while secretly taking his orders from the Committee of 300. But, more than anything else, consider this: President Bush and his controllers feel so secure that they no longer deem it necessary to hide their evil control of the American people, or to lie about it. This is self-evident in the statement that he, as our leader, will make all manner of compromises with truth, honesty and decency if his controllers (and ours) deem it necessary. On May 27th, 1991, the President of the United States abandoned each and every principle embodied in our Constitution and boldly proclaimed that he was no longer bound by it. This is a great victory for the Tavistock Institute and the Prudential Bombing Survey, whose target changed from German worker housing in 1945 to the soul of the American people in a war that began in 1946 and runs through to 1992.

Increased pressure on this nation for change was applied by Stanford Research Institute in the early 1960's. SRI's offensive gathered power and momentum. Switch on your television set and you will see Stanford's victory in front of your very eyes: talk shows featuring heavy sexual details, special video channels where perversion, rock and roll and drugs reign supreme. Where once John Wayne ruled, we now have a made-over apology for a man (or is he?) called Michael Jackson, a parody of a human being who is held up as a hero, as he gyrates, shuffles, mumbles and screams his way across television screens in millions of American homes.

A woman who has been through a series of marriages gets national coverage. One filthy, half-washed drug-ridden decalent rock band after another has hours of air time devoted to its inane sounds and mad gyrations, clothes fashions and language aberrations. Soap operas showing as near as "dammit" is to wearing pornographic scenes draw no comment. Whereas in early 1960 this would never have been tolerated, today it is accepted as normal. We have been subjected and we have succumbed to what Tavistock Institute calls "future shocks" whose future is NOW and we are so numbed by one cultural shock after another that to protest seems like a futile gesture and, therefore, logically we think, it does no good to protest.

In 1986 the Committee of 300 ordered the pressure turned up. The U.S. was not going down fast enough. The United States began the process of "recognizing" the butchers of Cambodia, the criminal Pol Pot regime, self confessors to the murder of 2 million Cambodian citizens. In 1991, the wheel turned the full circle. The United States went to war against a friendly nation that had been programmed to trust the Washington traitors. We accused President Hussein of the small nation of Iraq of all manner of evil, NONE OF WHICH WAS EVEN REMOTELY TRUE. We killed and maimed its children, we left them to starve and to die of all manner of diseases.

In the same breath we sent the Bush emissaries of the Committee of 300 to Cambodia to RECOGNIZE THE EVIL MASS MURDERERS OF 2 MILLION CAMBODIANS, who were sacrificed by the Committee of 300's depopulation of cities experiment, which the big cities of the United States will experience in the not too distant future. Now, President Bush and his Committee of 300-ridden administration say, in effect, "Look people, what do you want from me? I told you that I will compromise where I see fit, even when that means sleeping with the Pol Pot murderers. SO WHAT—KISS MY HIPS."

The level of pressure for change will reach its peak in 1993 and we shall witness scenes such as we would never have thought possible. Punch drunk America will react, but ever so slightly. Not even the latest threat to our freedom, the personal computer card disturbs us. Willis Harman's "CHANGING IMAGES OF MAN" would have been too technical for most so the service of Marilyn Ferguson was obtained to make it more easily understood. "THE AGE OF AQUARIUS" heralded nude stage shows and a song which made the top of the charts: "The Dawning of the Age of the Aquarius" swept the globe.

The personal computer card which, when fully distributed, will deprive us of our familiar environment and, as we shall see, environment means a lot more than the usually accepted meaning of the word. The United States has gone through a period of intense trauma such as has never been visited on any other nation in the history of the world, and the worst is yet to come.

Everything is going according to what Tavistock ordered and what the social scientists at Stanford mapped out. Times do not change; they are made to change. All changes are preplanned and come as the result of careful action. We have been changed gradually at first, but now the pace of change is picking up. The United States is being transformed from One Nation Under God to a polyglot of nations under several gods. The U.S. is no longer One nation under God. The framers of the Constitution have lost the battle.

Our forebears spoke a common language and believed in a common religion Christianity, and held common ideals. There were no aliens in our midst; that came later in a deliberately planned attempt to break up the United States into a series of fragmented nationalities, cultures and beliefs. If you doubt this, go down to the East Side of New York, or the West Side of Los Angeles on any given Saturday and look around you. The United States has become several nations struggling to coexist under a common system of government. When the floodgates of immigration were opened wide by Franklin D. Roosevelt, a cousin of the head of the Committee of 300, the cultural shock caused great confusion and dislocation and made "One Nation" an unworkable concept. The Club of Rome and NATO have exacerbated the situation. "Love thy neighbor" is an ideal that will not work unless your neighbor "is as yourself."

To the framers of our Constitution, the truths they laid out For future generations were "self evident"—to themselves Being unsure that future generations would also find the truths to which they bound this nation self evident, THEY SET ABOUT SPELLING THEM OUT. IT SEEMS THAT THEY WERE AFRAID OF A TIME THAT MIGHT COME WHEN THE TRUTHS THEY ESPOUSED WOULD NO LONGER BE SELF-EVIDENT. The Tavistock Institute for Human Relations has made sure that what the framers feared might come to pass has indeed come to pass. That time has arrived with Bush and his "no absolutes" and his New World Order under the Committee of 300.

This is part of the concept of social changes forced upon Americans which Harmon and the Club of Rome said would make for severe trauma and a great building up of pressure. The social upheavals that have taken place since the advent of Tavistock, the Club of Rome and NATO will continue in the U.S. for as long as the limit of absorption is ignored. Nations are made up of individuals and, like individuals, there is a limit to their ability to absorb changes, no matter how robust they may be.

This psychological truth was well proven by the Strategic Bombing Survey which called for saturation bombing of German worker housing. As mentioned earlier, the project was the work of the Prudential Insurance Company and no one doubts today that Germany suffered its defeat because of this operation. Many of the scientists who worked on that project are working on saturation bombing of America, or else they have passed on, leaving their skilled techniques in the hands of others who followed behind them.

The legacy they left behind them can be found in the fact that we have not so much lost our way as a nation, but that we have been steered in a direction opposite to that which the framers of the Declaration guided us for over 200 years. We have, in short, lost contact with our historical genes, our faith, which inspired countless generations of Americans to move forward as a nation, benefiting from the patrimony left to us by the framers of the Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution. That we are lost is clear to all who seek the truth, as unpleasant as it may be.

With President Bush and his "no absolute morals" guiding us, we blunder ahead as lost nations and individuals tend to do. We are collaborating with the Committee of 300 for our own downfall and our own enslavement. Some sense it—and feel a strong sense of unease. The various conspiracy theories they are familiar with do not seem to cover it all. This is because they know nothing of the Conspirators'Hierarchy, The Committee of 300.

These souls who feel a deep sense of unease and that something is radically wrong, yet cannot put their collective fingers on the problem, walk in darkness. They look to a future they see slipping away from them. The American dream has become a mirage. They place their faith in religion but take no steps to help that faith along by ACTION. Americans will never experience a retracing of steps such as the Europeans experienced when at the height of the Dark Ages. By determined ACTlON, they awoke in themselves a spirit of renewal which resulted in the glorious Renaissance.

The enemy that has directed them to this point decided to make a strong move against the United States in 1980, so that Renaissance of America would be impossible. Who is the enemy? The enemy is no faceless "they." The enemy is clearly identifiable as the Committee of 300, the Club of Rome, NATO and all of its affiliated organizations, the think tanks and research institutions controlled by Tavistock. There is no need to use "they" or "the enemy" except as shorthand. WE KNOW WHO "THEY," THE ENEMY, IS. The Committee of 300 with its Eastern Liberal Establishment "aristocracy," its banks, insurance companies, giant corporations, foundations, communications networks, presided over by a HIERARCHY OF CONSPIRATORS—THIS IS THE ENEMY.

This is the power that brought to life the reign of terror in Russia, the Bolshevik Revolution, World Wars I and II, Korea, Vietnam, the fall of Rhodesia, South Africa, Nicaragua, and the Philippines. This is the secret upper-level government that brought into existence the controlled disintegration of the U.S. economy and deindustrialized what was once the greatest indusrial power, for good, that the world had ever known.

America today can be compared with a soldier who falls asleep in the thick of battle. We Americans have fallen asleep, given way to apathy caused by being confronted with a multplicity of choices which has confused us. These are the changes that alter our environment, break down our resistance to change so that we become dazed, apathetic and eventually fall asleep in the thick of battle.

There is a technical term for this condition. It is called "long range penetration strain." The art of subjecting a very large group of people to continued long range penetration strain was developed by scientists working out of the Tavistock Institute of Human Relations and their U. S. subsidiaries, Stanford Research and Rand Corporation, and at least another 150 research institutions here in the U.S.

Dr. Kurt Lewin, the scientist who developed this fiendish warfare, has caused the average American patriot to fret over various conspiracy theories, leaving him or her with a feeling of uncertainty and insecurity, isolated and perhaps even afraid, as he searches, but fails to understand the decay and rot caused by "THE CHANGING IMAGES OF MANKIND," unable to identify or combat the social, moral, economic and political changes he deems undesirable and does not want, yet which increase in intensity on every hand.

Dr. Lewin's name will not be found in any of our establishment history books which, in any event, are a record of events mostly from the side of the ruling class or the victors of wars. Therefore, it is with pride that I introduce his name to you. As mentioned before, Dr. Lewin organized the Harvard Psychological Clinic and the Institute for Social Research under the auspices of the Tavistock Institute. The names do not give much indication of the purpose of the two organizations.

This reminds me of the infamous bill to reform coinage and mint laws passed in 1827. The title of the bill was harmless enough or sounded harmless, which was the intention of its backers. Through this Act, Senator John Sherman betrayed the nation into the hands of the international bankers. Sherman allegedly sponsored the bill "without reading it." As we know, the bill's true purpose was to demonetize silver and give the thieving bankers unlimited power over the credit of our nation; powers to which the bankers were clearly not entitled under the clear and unmistakable terms of the U.S. Constitution.

Kurt Lewin gave the Tavistock Institute, the Club of Rome and NATO unlimited power over America, to which no organization, entity or society is entitled. These institutions have used the usurped powers to destroy the will of the nation to resist the plans and intentions of the conspirators to rob us of the fruits of the American Revolution and steer us on a course leading directly to a New Dark Ages under a One World Government.

Lewin's colleagues in this long range penetration objective were Richard Crossman, Eric Trist, H. V. Dicks, Willis Harmon, Charles Anderson, Garner Lindsay, Richard Price and W. R. Bion. Again, these names never appear in the evening news; in fact, they only appear in scientific journals—so very few Americans are aware of them and not at all aware of what the men behind the names have done and are doing to the United States.

President Jefferson once said he pitied those who thought they knew what was taking place through reading the newspaper. Disraeli, the British prime minister, said much the same thing. Indeed, down through the ages, rulers have delighted in running things from behind the scenes. Man has always felt the need to dominate and nowhere and at no time is the desire more prevalent than in this modern era.

If it were not so, why all the need for secret societies? If we are ruled by an open system run by democratically elected officials, why the need for a secret Masonic order in every village, town and city across the United States? How is it that Freemasonry can operate so openly and yet keep its secrets so well hidden? We can't ask the Nine Unknown Men of the Nine Sisters Lodge in Paris that question, nor can we ask it of their nine fellows in the Quatuar Coronati Lodge in London. Yet these eighteen men form part of an even more secret government, the RIIA, and beyond that, the Committee of 3OO.

How is it that the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry could brainwash John Hinckley to shoot President Reagan? Why do we have such secret orders as the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, the Round Table, the Milner Group and so on down line upon line of secret societies? They form part of a world-wide chain of command and control running through the Club of Rome, NATO, the RIIA and finally right up to the Conspirators' Hierarchy, The Committee of 300. Men need these secret societies because their deeds are evil and must be hidden. Evil cannot stand in the light of truth.

In this book we shall find an almost complete list of the conspirators, their institutions, fronts and publications. In 1980 the Aquarian Conspiracy was in full swing and its success can be seen in every facet of our private and national life. The overwhelming rise in mindless violence, serial killers, teenage suicides, the unmistakable signs of lethargy—"long range penetration" is a part of our new environment, as dangerous, if not more so, than the polluted air that we breathe.

The coming of the Age of Aquarius caught America totally unprepared. We as a nation were not prepared for the changes about to be forced upon us. Who ever had heard of Tavistock, Kurt Lewin, Willis Harmon and John Rawlings Reese? They were not even on the American political scene. What we would have noticed, if we bothered to look at all, was a falling off of our ability to withstand futuristic shock as we became more fatigued, distressed and eventually entered a period of psychological shock followed by widespread apathy as an outward manifestation of long range penetration warfare.

The Age of Aquarius was best described by Tavistock Institute as the vehicle for delivering turbulence: "There are three distinct phases in the response and reaction to stress displayed by large social groups. First, there is superficiality; the population under attack will defend itself with slogans; this does not identify the source of the crisis and therefore does nothing to address it, hence the crisis will persist. The second is fragmentation. This occurs as the crisis continues and social order breaks down. Then, there is the third phase where the population group goes into 'self realization' and turns away from the induced crisis and there follows a maladaptive response, accompanied with active synoptic idealism and disassociation."

Who can deny that with the huge increase in drug usage-"crack" making thousands of instant new addicts each day—the shocking rise in the murder of infants each day (aborticide), which by now far exceeds casualties suffered by our armed forces in both World Wars, Korea and Vietnam, the open acceptance of homosexuality and lesbianism whose "rights" are protected by more and more laws each year, the terrible plague we call "AIDS" washing over our towns and cities, total failure of our education system, the stunning increase in the divorce rate, a murder rate that shocks the rest of the world into disbelief, satanic serial killings, the disappearance of thousands of young children, snatched off our streets by perverts, a virtual tidal wave of pornography accompanied by "permissiveness" on our television screens—who can deny that this nation is in crisis, which we are not addressing and from which we are turning away.

Well-meaning people who specialize in these things blame a lot of the problem on education, or what passes for it in the United States. Criminals now abound in the age groups 9-15. Rapists are quite commonly as young as 10. Our social specialists, our teacher's unions, our churches say it is all due to a faulty education system. Witness how test scores keep dropping. The specialists bewail the fact that the United States now ranks around 39th in the level of education in the world.

Why do we bemoan what is so obvious? OUR EDUCATlON SYSTEM WAS PROGRAMMED TO SELF-DESTRUCT. THAT WAS WHAT DR. ALEXANDER KING WAS SENT HERE BY NATO TO ARRANGE. THAT IS WHAT JUSTICE HUGO BLACK WAS ORDERED TO ARRANGE. THE FACT IS, THE COMMITTEE OF 300, WITH THE APPROVAL OF OUR GOVERNMENT, DOES NOT WANT OUR YOUTH TO BE PROPERLY EDUCATED. The education that Freemason Justice Hugo Black, Alexander King, Gunnar Myrdal and his wife came to give the children of the United States is that CRIME PAYS, EXPEDIENCY IS WHAT COUNTS.

They taught our children that United States law is unequally applied, and that is perfectly in order. Our children were properly educated by a decade of corrupt examples; Ronald Reagan and George Bush were ruled by greed and became totally corrupted by it. Our education system hasn't failed. Under the guidance of King, Black and the Myrdals it is actually a great success, but it all depends from whose point of view we look at it. The Committee of 300 is DELIGHTED with our education system, and will not allow one comma of it to be changed.

According to Stanford and Willis Harmon, the induced trauma of long range penetration of which our education is a part, has been going on for 45 years, yet how many are aware of the insidious pressures being applied to our society and the constant exposure to brainwashing that goes on every day? The mysterious gang wars that broke out in New York in the 1950's is an example of how the conspirators can create and stage-manage any type of disruptive elements they like. Where those gang wars came from nobody knew until the 1980's when researchers uncovered the hidden controllers who directed the so-called "social phenomena."

Gang wars were carefully planned at Stanford, deliberately designed to shock society and cause ripples of disturbances. By 1958 there were in excess of 200 of these gangs. They were made popular by a musical and a Hollywood movie, "West Side Story." After making the news for a decade, suddenly, in 1966, they disappeared off the streets of New York, Los Angeles New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia and Chicago.

Throughout the near decade of gang violence, the public reacted according to the profiled response Stanford expected; society as a whole could not comprehend gang warfare and the public responded in a maladaptive manner. Had there been those wise enough to recognize in gang wars a Stanford experiment in social engineering and brainwashing, the conspirator's plot would have been exposed. Either we did not have trained specialists who could see what was going on—which is highly unlikely—or else they were threatened and remained silent. The cooperation with Stanford by the news media brought to light a "new age" attack on our environment just as predicted by the social engineers and new-science scientists at Tavistock.

In 1989 gang warfare, as a social conditioning to change, was reintroduced to the streets of Los Angeles. Within a few short months of the first incidents, gangs began to proliferate-first in the scores, then in the hundreds on the streets of the East Side of Los Angeles. Crack houses and rampant prostitution proliferated; drug dealers dominated the streets. Anybody who got in their way was gunned down. The outcry in the press was loud and long. Stanford's targeted large population group began defending itself with slogans. This is what Tavistock called the first phase, with the targeted group failing to identify the source of the crisis.

The second phase of the gang war crisis was "fragmentation." People not living in the areas frequented by gangs said, "Thank God they are not in our neighborhood." This ignored the fact that the crisis continued with or without recognition and that social order in Los Angeles had begun to break down. As profiled by Tavistock, those groups not affected by gang war "broke away to defend themselves" because the source of the crisis was not identified, the so called "maladaptation" process the period of disassociation.

Apart from the proliferation of drug sales, what is the purpose of gang wars? First, it is to show the targeted group that they are not safe, i.e., insecurity is generated. Secondly, it is to show that organized society is helpless in the face of such violence and thirdly to bring about a recognition of the fact that our social order is collapsing. The present wave of gang violence will go away just as quickly as it started, once the three phases of the Stanford program are completed.

An outstanding example of social conditioning to accept change, even when it is recognized as unwelcome change by the large population group in the sights of Stanford Research Institute, was the "advent" of the BEATLES. The Beatles were brought to the United States as part of a social experiment which would subject large population groups to brainwashing of which they were not even aware.

When Tavistock brought the Beatles to the United States nobody could have imagined the cultural disaster that was to follow in their wake. The Beatles were an integral part of "THE AQUARIAN CONSPIRACY," a living organism which sprang From "THE CHANGING IMAGES OF MAN," URH (489)2150-Policy Research Report No. 4/4/74. Policy Report prepared by SRI Center for the study of Social Policy, Director, Professor Willis Harmon.

The phenomenon of the Beatles was not a spontaneous rebellion by youth against the old social system. Instead it was a carefully crafted plot to introduce by a conspiratorial body which could not be identified, a highly destructive and divisive element into a large population group targeted for change against its will. New words and new phrases—prepared by Tavistock-were introduced to America along with the Beatles. Words such as "rock" in relation to music sounds, "teenager," "cool," "discovered" and "pop music" were a lexicon of disguised code words signifying the acceptance of drugs and arrived with and accompanied the Beatles wherever they went, to be "discovered" by "teenagers." Incidentally, the word "teenagers" was never used until just before the Beatles arrived on the scene, courtesy of the Tavistock Institute for Human Relations.

As in the case of gang wars, nothing could or would have been accomplished without the cooperation of the media, especially the electronic media and, in particular, the scurrilous Ed Sullivan who had been coached by the conspirators as to the role he was to play. Nobody would have paid much attention to the motley crew from Liverpool and the 12-atonal system of "music" that was to follow had it not been for an overabundance of press exposure. The 12-atonal system consisted of heavy, repetitive sounds, taken from the music of the cult of Dionysus and the Baal priesthood by Adorno and given a "modern" flavor by this special friend of the Queen of England and hence the Committee of 300.

Tavistock and its Stanford Research Center created trigger words which then came into general usage around "rock music" and its fans. Trigger words created a distinct new break-away largely young population group which was persuaded by social engineering and conditioning to believe that the Beatles really were their favorite group. All trigger words devised in the context of "rock music" were designed for mass control of the new targeted group, the youth of America.

The Beatles did a perfect job, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that Tavistock and Stanford did a perfect job, the Beatles merely reacting like trained robots "with a little help from their friends"—code words for using drugs and making it "cool." The Beatles became a highly visible "new type"—more Tavistock jargon—and as such it was not long before the group made new styles (fads in clothing, hairstyles and language usage) which upset the older generation, as was intended. This was part of the "fragmentation-maladaptation" process worked out by Willis Harmon and his team of social scientists and genetic engineering tinkerers and put into action.

The role of the print and electronic media in our society is crucial to the success of brainwashing large population groups. Gang wars ended in Los Angeles in 1966 as the media withdrew its coverage. The same thing will happen with the current wave of gang wars in Los Angeles. Street gangs will wither on the vine once media saturation coverage is toned down and then completely withdrawn. As in 1966, the issue would become "burned out." Street gangs will have served their purpose of creating turbulence and insecurity. Exactly the same pattern will be followed in the case of "rock" music. Deprived of media attention, it will eventually take its place in history.

Following the Beatles, who incidentally were put together by the Tavistock Institute, came other "Made in England" rock groups, who, like the Beatles, had Theo Adorno write their cult lyrics and compose all the "music." I hate to use these beautiful words in the context of "Beatlemania"; it reminds me of how wrongly the word "lover" is used when referring to the filthy interaction between two homosexuals writhing in pigswill. To call "rock" music, is an insult, likewise the language used in "rock lyrics."

Tavistock and Stanford Research then embarked on the second phase of the work commissioned by the Committee of 300. This new phase turned up the heat for social change in America. As quickly as the Beatles had appeared on the American scene, so too did the "beat generation," trigger words designed to separate and fragment society. The media now focused its attention on the "beat generation." Other Tavistock-coined words came seemingly out of nowhere: "beatniks," "hippies," "flower children" became part of the vocabulary of America. It became popular to "drop out" and wear dirty jeans, go about with long unwashed hair. The "beat generation" cut itself off from mainstream America. They became just as infamous as the cleaner Beatles before them.

The newly-created group and its "lifestyle" swept millions of young Americans into the cult. American youth underwent a radical revolution without ever being aware of it, while the older generation stood by helplessly, unable to identify the source of the crisis, and thus reacting in a maladaptive manner against its manifestation, which were drugs of all types, marijuana, and later Lysergic acid, "LSD," so conveniently provided for them by the Swiss pharmaceutical company, SANDOZ, following the discovery by one of its chemists, Albert Hoffman, how to make synthetic ergotamine, a powerful mind-altering drug. The Committee of 300 financed the project through one of their banks, S. C. Warburg, and the drug was carried to America by the philosopher, Aldous Huxley.

The new "wonder drug" was promptly distributed in "sample" size packages, handed out free of charge on college campuses across the United States and at "rock" concerts, which became the leading vehicle for proliferating the use of drugs. The question that cries out for an answer is, what was the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) doing at the time? There is compelling circumstantial evidence that would appear to indicate that the DEA knew what was going on but was ordered not to take any action.

With very substantial numbers of new British "rock" bands arriving in the U.S., rock concerts began to become a fixture on the social calender of American youth. In tandem with these "concerts," the use of drugs among the youth rose in proportion. The devilish bedlam of discordant heavy beat sounds numbed the minds of listeners so that they were easily persuaded to try the new drug on the basis that "everybody is doing it." Peer pressure is a very strong weapon. The "new culture" received maximum coverage from the jackal media, which cost the conspirators not one single thin dime.

Great anger was felt by a number of civic leaders and churchmen over the new cult but their energies were misdirected against the RESULT of what was going on and not against the CAUSE. Critics of the rock cult made the same mistakes that had been made in the prohibition era, they criticized law enforcement agencies, teachers, parents anybody but the conspirators.

Because of the anger and resentment I feel toward the great drug plague, I make no apology for using language which is not customary for me to use. One of the worst drug slobs ever to walk the streets of America was Alan Ginsberg. This Ginsberg pushed the use of LSD through advertising which cost him nothing, although under normal circumstances it would have cost millions of dollars in TV advertising revenues. This free advertising for drugs, and LSD in particular, reached a new high in the late 1960's, thanks to the ever-willing cooperation of the media. The effect of Ginsberg's mass advertising campaign was devastating; the American public was subjected to one cultural future shock after another in rapid succession.

We became over-exposed and over stimulated and, again, may I remind you that this is Tavistock jargon, lifted from the Tavistock training manual, overwhelmed by its new development and, when we reached that point, our minds began to lapse into apathy; it was just too much to cope with, that is to say, "long range penetration had taken hold of us." Ginsberg claimed to be a poet but no greater rubbish was ever written by anyone who ever aspired to becoming a poet. Ginsberg's designated task had little to do with poetry; his main function was to push the new subculture and force acceptance of it upon the large targeted population group.

To assist him in his task, Ginsberg coopted the services of Norman Mailer, a writer of sorts who had spent some time in a mental institution. Mailer was a favorite of the leftwing Hollywood crowd and so had no problem with getting maximum television time for Ginsberg. Naturally Mailer had to have a pretext—not even he could blatantly come out with the true nature of Ginsberg's television appearances. So a charade was adopted: Mailer would talk "seriously" on camera with Ginsberg about poetry and literature.

This method of getting wide television coverage at no cost to themselves was followed by every rock group and concert promoter who followed the example set by Ginsberg. The electronic media moguls had big hearts when it came to giving free time to these dirty verminous creatures and their even dirtier products and filthy ideas. Their promotion of horrible garbage spoke volumes and, without abundant help from the print and electronic media, the drug trade could not have spread as rapidly as it did in the late 1960's-early 197O's, and probably would have been confined to a few small local areas.

Ginsberg was able to give several nationally televised performances extolling the virtues of LSD and marijuana, under the guise of "new ideas" and "new cultures" developing in the art and music world. Not to be outdone by the electronic media, Ginsberg's admirers wrote glowing articles about "this colorful man" in the art and social columns of all of America,s largest newspapers and magazines. There had never been such an acrossthe-media-board free advertising campaign in the history of newspaper, radio and television and it cost the promoters of the Aquarian conspiracy, NATO and the Club of Rome not one red cent. It was all absolutely free advertising for LSD, only thinly disguised as "art" and "culture."

One of Ginsberg's closest friends, Kenny Love, published a Five-page report in the New York Times. This is in accordance with the methodology used by Tavistock and Stanford Research: If something is to be promoted which the public has not yet been fully brainwashed to accept, then have someone write an article, covering all sides of the subject matter. The other method is to have live television talk shows in which a panel of experts promotes the product and or idea under the pretext of "discussing", it. There are point and counter-point, both pro and con participants airing their support or opposition. When it is all over, the subject to be promoted has been dinned into the public mind. While this was new in the early 1970's, today it is standard practice on which talk shows thrive.

Love's Five-page pro LSD pro Ginsberg article was duly printed by the New York Times. Had Ginsberg tried to buy the same amount of space in an advertisement, it would have cost him at least $50,000. But Ginsberg didn't have to worry; thanks to his Friend Kenny Love, Ginsberg got the massive advertising all for free. With newspapers like the New York Times and the Washington Post under the control of the Committee of 300, this kind of free advertising is given to any subject matter, and more especially to those promoting decadent life styles—drugs-hedonism—anything that will confuse the American people. After the trial run with Ginsberg and LSD, it became standard Club of Rome practice to call upon major newspapers in America to give free advertising on demand to people and ideas they were promoting.

Worse yet—or better yet, depending upon the viewpoint-United Press (UP) picked up Kenny Love's free advertising for Ginsberg and LSD and telexed it to HUNDREDS of newspapers and magazines around the country under the guise of a "news" story. Even such highly respectable establishment magazines as "Harpers Bazaar" and "TIME" made Mr. Ginsberg respectable. If a nation-wide campaign of this magnitude were presented to Ginsberg and the promoters of LSD by an advertising agency, the price tag would have run into at least $1 million in terms of 1970 dollars. Today the price tag would be nothing less than $15-$16 million dollars. It is no wonder that I refer to the news media as "jackals."

I suggest that we try to find any media outlet to do an expose on the Federal Reserve Board, which is what I did. I took my article, which was a good expose of the greatest swindle on earth, to every major newspaper, radio and television station, magazine house and several talk-show hosts. A few made promises that sounded good—they would definitely air the article and have me discuss it—give them about a week and they would get back to me. Not one of them ever did, nor did my article ever appear in the pages of their newspapers and journals. It was as if a blanket of silence had been thrown over me and the subject I was endeavoring to promote, and indeed that was precisely what had happened.

Without massive media hype, and without almost around the clock coverage, the hippy-beatnik rock, drug cult would never have gotten off the ground; it would have remained a localized oddity. The Beatles, with their twanging guitars, silly expressions, drug language and weird clothes, would not have amounted to a hill of beans. Instead, because the Beatles were given saturation coverage by the media, the United States has suffered one cultural shock after another.

The men buried in the think tanks and research institutions, whose names and faces are still not known to but a few people, made sure that the press played its part. Conversely, the media's important role in not exposing the power behind the future cultural shocks made certain that the source of the crisis was never identified. Thus was our society driven mad through psychological shocks and stress. "Driven mad" is taken from Tavistock's training manual. From its modest beginnings in 1921, Tavistock was ready in 1966 to launch a major irreversible cultural revolution in America, which has not yet ended. The Aquarian Conspiracy is part of it.

Thus softened up, our nation was now deemed ripe for the introduction of drugs which was to rival the prohibition era in scope and the huge amounts of money to be made. This too was an integral part of the Aquarian Conspiracy. The proliferation of drug usage was one of the subjects under study at the Science Policy Research Unit (SPRU) at Tavistock's Sussex University facility. It was known as the "future shocks" center, a title given to so-called future oriented psychology designed to manipulate whole population groups to induce "future shocks." It was the first of several such institutions set up by Tavistock.

"Future shocks" is described as a series of events which come so fast that the human brain cannot absorb the information. As I said earlier, science has shown that there are clearly marked limits to the amount of changes and the nature of them that the mind can deal with. After continuous shocks, the large targeted population group discovers that it does not want to make choices any more. Apathy takes over, often preceded by mindless violence such as is characteristic of the Los Angeles street gangs, serial killers, rapists and child kidnapers.

Such a group becomes easy to control and will docilely follow orders without rebelling, which is the object of the exercise.

"Future shocks," says SPRU, "is defined as physical and psychological distress arising from the excess load on the decision-making mechanism of the human mind." That is Tavistock jargon lifted straight from Tavistock manuals—which they don't know I have.

Just as an overloaded electrical circuit will activate a trip switch, so do humans "trip out," which is a syndrome that medical science is only now beginning to understand, although John Rawlings Reese conducted experiments in this field as far back as the 1920's. As can be appreciated, such a targeted group is ready to "trip out" and take to drugs as a means of escape from the pressures of so many choices having to be made. This is how Drug usage was spread so rapidly through America's "beat generation." What started with the Beatles and sample packages of LSD has grown into a flood-tide of drug usage which is swamping America.

The drug trade is controlled by the Committee of 300 from the Top down. The drug trade started with the British East India Company and was closely followed by the Dutch East India Company. Both were controlled by a "Council of 300." The list of names of members and stockholders of the BEIC read like something out of Debretts Peerage. BEIC established the "China Inland Mission," whose job it was to get The Chinese peasants, or coolies, as they were called, addicted to opium. This created the market for opium which the BEIC then filled.

In much the same way the Committee of 300 used "The "Beatles" to popularize "social drugs" with the youth of America and The Hollywood "in-crowd." Ed Sullivan was sent to England To become acquainted with The first Tavistock Institute "rock group" to hit the shores of the United States. Sullivan then returned to the United States to draft the strategy for the electronic media on how to package and sell the group. Without the full cooperation of the electronic media and Ed Sullivan, in particular, "The Beatles" and their "music" would have died on the vine. Instead, our national life and the character of the United States was forever changed.

Now that we know, it is all too clear how successful the "Beatles" campaign to proliferate the use of drugs became. The fact that "The Beatles" had their music and lyrics written for them by Theo Adorno was concealed from public view. The prime function to "The Beatles" was to be discovered by teenagers, who where then subjected to a non-stop barrage of "Beatle music," until they became convinced that they liked the sound and adopted it, along with all that accompanied it. The Liverpool group performed up to expectations, and with "a little help from their friends," i.e., illegal substances we call drugs created a whole new class to young Americans in the precise mold ordained by the Tavistock Institute.

Tavistock had created a highly visible "new type" to act as their drug-runners. The China Inland Mission "Christian missionaries" would not have fitted in with the 1960's. "New type" is social-science scientist jargon; what it meant was that the Beatles created new social patterns, first and foremost being to normalize and popularize the use of drugs, new tastes in clothes and hair styles which really distinguished them from the older generation as was intended by Tavistock.

It is important to note the deliberate fragmentation-inducing language used by Tavistock. The "teenagers" never once dreamed that all the "different" things they aspired to were the product of older scientists working in think tanks in England and Stanford Research. How mortified they would have been if they had discovered that most of their "cool" habits and expressions were deliberately created for their use by a group of older social science scientists!

The role of the media was, and remains, very important in promoting the use of drugs on a nation-wide scale. When coverage of the street warfare gangs was abruptly terminated by the media, they became "burned out" as a social phenomena; the "new age" of drugs followed. The media has always served as a catalyst and has always pushed "new causes" and now media attention was focused on drug usage and its supporters, the "beat generation," yet another phrase fashioned at Tavistock, in its determined efforts to bring about social changes in The United States.

Drug usage now became an accepted part of everyday life in America. This Tavistock-designed program took in millions of American youth, and the older generation began to believe that America was undergoing a natural social revolution, failing all the while to realize that what was happening to their children was not a spontaneous movement, but a highly artificial creation designed to force changes in America's social and political life.

The descendants of the British East India Company were delighted with the success of their drug pushing program. Their disciples became adept in the use of lysergic acid (LSD) so conveniently made available by patrons of the drug trade like Aldous Huxley, courtesy of the highly respected Sandoz company of Switzerland and financed by the great Warburg banking dynasty. The new "wonder drug" was promptly distributed at all rock concerts and on college campuses in free sample packages. The question that begs to be asked is, "What was the FBI doing while all this was going on?"

The purpose of the Beatles had become abundantly clear. The British East India Company's descendants in the upperclass society in London must have felt very good about the billions of dollars that began rolling in. With the coming of "rock" which shall henceforth be used as shorthand to describe Adorno's fiendish satanic music, a tremendous increase in the use of social drugs, especially marijuana, was observed. The entire dope business was expanded under the control and direction of the Science Policy Research Unit (SPRU).

SPRU was run by Leland Bradford, Kenneth Damm and Ronald Lippert, under whose expert guidance a large number of new-science scientists were trained to promote "future shocks," one of the chief being the dramatic increase in the use of drugs by America's teenagers. SPRU's policy papers, planted in various government agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), dictated the course of the disastrous "drug war" allegedly waged by the Reagan and Bush Administrations.

This was the forerunner of how the United States is run today, by one committee and/or council after another, by an inner-government fed on Tavistock papers which they firmly believe are their own opinions. These virtual unknowns are making decisions that will forever change our form of government and the quality of life here in the United States. Through "crisis adaptation" we have already been changed so much as to barely compare with what we were in the 1950's. Also, our environment has been changed.

There is much talk about environment these days and, while it mostly refers to green surroundings, pure rivers and fresh air, there is another, equally important environment, namely, the drug environment. The environment of our life style has become polluted; our thinking has become polluted. Our ability to control our destiny has become polluted. We are confronted by changes that pollute our thinking to the extent that we do not know what to make of it all. The "Environment of Change" is crippling the nation; we appear to have so little control that it has produced anxiety and confusion.

We now look to group solutions instead of individual solutions to our problems. We do not make use of our own resources to solve problems. In this the prolific rise in drug usage is playing a leading role. The strategy is a deliberate one, devised by the new-science scientists, the social engineers and tinkerers, aimed at the most vulnerable of all areas, our self-image, or how we perceive ourselves, which leads us eventually to become like sheep being led to the slaughter. We have become confused by the many choices we have to make, and we have become apathetic.

We are manipulated by unscrupulous men without ever being aware of it. This is particularly true of the drug trade and we are now in the transition stage where we can be set up for a change from the present constitutional form of government, which has taken a giant step forward under the Bush administration. While there are those who still persist, in the face of all of the evidence to the contrary in saying, "It can't happen in America," the fact is: IT HAS ALREADY HAPPENED. Our will to resist events not to our liking has been steadily eroded and undermined. We will resist, some of us say, but not so many of us will do that, and we will be in the minority.

The drug trade has insidiously changed our environment. The alleged "war on drugs" is a farce; it does not exist in qualitative measure to make the slightest difference to the descendants of the British East India Company. Combined with computerization, we are almost fully brainwashed, robbed of our ability to resist forced changes. Which brings us to another environment, PEOPLE CONTROL, also known as personal information control, without which governments cannot play their numbers game.

As matters stand, we the people have absolutely no way of knowing just what government does or does not know about us. Government computer files are not subject to scrutiny by the public at large. Do we foolishly believe that personal information sacrosanct? Remember, in every society there are rich and powerful families who control law enforcement agencies. I have proved the existence of such families. Do not think that if these families wanted to find out about us, they could not do so. These are the families who often have a member in the Committee of 300.

Take Kissinger, for instance, who has his own private dossiers on hundreds of thousands of people, not only in the U.S. but all over the world. Are we on Kissinger's enemy list? Is this far fetched? Not at all. Take P2 Masonic and Committee Monte Carlo who have such lists which run into tens of thousands of names. Incidentally, Kissinger is one of them. There are other "private" intelligence agencies, such as INTEL, whom we shall meet later.

One of the ways heroin is moved into Europe is through the Principality of Monaco. The heroin comes from Corsica carried in ferries that ply a busy trade between Corsica and Monte Carlo during the summer. There is no check of what goes on or comes off these ferries. As there is no border between France and Monaco, drugs, and more especially heroin (partly processed opium), flows through the open border of Monaco into laboratories in France, or else if it has already been processed into heroin, it goes directly to the distributors.

The Grimaldi family has been in the drug smuggling business for centuries. Because Prince Ranier got greedy and began skimming heavily and would not desist after three warnings, his wife, Princess Grace, was murdered in a car "accident." Ranier underestimated the power of the Committee of which he is a member. The Rover car in which she was traveling had the brake fluid chambers tampered with in such a way that each time the brakes were depressed, fluid was released in measured amount, until by the time the car reached the most dangerous of several hairpin bends, there was no stopping power, and it sailed over a stone wall, hitting the ground fifty feet below in a sickening smash.

Everything possible was done by the Committee of 300 operatives to conceal the truth about the murder of Princess Grace. To this day the Rover car remains in the custody of French police, shrouded under a cover on a trailer which no one is allowed to approach, let alone examine. The signal for the execution of Princess Grace was picked up by the British Army listening post in Cyprus and it is believed by well placed source that the Committee Monte Carlo and P2 gave the order.

The drug trade, controlled by the Committee of 300, is a crime against humanity, but having been conditioned and softened up by years of incessant bombardment by Tavistock Institute, we have more or less accepted our changed environment, regarding the drug trade as a problem that is "too big" to handle. This is not the case. If we could marshal an entire nation, equip and send millions of American soldiers to fight in a war in Europe in which he had no business intervening, if we could defeat a major power, then we can smash the drug trade, using the same WW II tactics.

The logistical problems that had to be solved when we entered the Second World War are even today still mind-boggling. Yet we successfully overcame all problems. Why then is it impossible to defeat a well-defined enemy, far smaller and weaker than Germany, given the immensely improved weapons and surveillance equipment we have today? The real reason that the drug problem is not eradicated is because it is being run by the highest families in the entire world as part of a coordinated gigantic money-making machine.

In 1930, British capital invested in South America greatly exceeded capital investment in British "dominions." Graham, an authority on British investments abroad, stated that British investment in South America "exceeded one trillion pounds." Remember, this was 1930, and one trillion pounds was a staggering sum of money in those days. What was the reason for such heavy investment in South America? In a word it was drugs.

The plutocracy controlling British banks held the purse strings and then, as now, put up a most respectable facade to cover their true business. No one ever caught them with dirtied hands. They always had front men, even as they do today, willing to take the blame if things went awry. Then as now the connections with the drug trade were tenuous at best. No one was ever able to lay a finger on the respectable and "noble" banking families of Britain, whose members are on the Committee of 300.

There is great significance in that only 15 members of Parliament were the controllers of that vast empire, of which the most prominent were Sir Charles Barry and the Chamberlain family. These overlords of finance were busy in places like Argentina, Jamaica and Trinidad, which became big moneyspinners for them through the drug trade. In these countries, British plutocrats kept "the locals" as they were contemptuously called, at bare subsistence levels, hardly above slavery. The fortunes extracted from the drug trade in the Caribbean were vast.

The plutocrats hid behind faces like Trinidad Leaseholds Limited, but the REAL MEAT, then as now, was drugs. This is true of today where we find that Jamaica's Gross National Product (GNP) is made up almost entirely of sales of ganja, a very potent form of marijuana. The mechanism for handling the ganja trade was set up by David Rockefeller and Henry Kissinger under the title "Caribbean Basin Initiative."

Up until a relatively short time ago, the true history of the China opium trade was quite unknown, having been as well covered up as it is possible to do. Many of my former students in the days when I was lecturing, would come and ask me why the Chinese were so fond of smoking opium? They were puzzled as are many still today, over contradictory accounts of what had actually taken place in China. Most thought it was merely a case of the Chinese workers buying opium on an open market and smoking it, or going to some of the thousands of opium dens and forgetting their terrible existence for a while.

The truth is that the supply of opium to China was a British monopoly, an OFFICIAL monopoly of the British government and official British policy. The Indo-British opium trade in China was one of the best kept secrets, around which many misleading legends grew up, such as "Clive of India" and the tales of derring-do by the British Army in India for the glory of "the Empire," so well written by Rudyard Kipling, and tales of "Tea Clippers" racing across the oceans with their cargoes of China tea for the high society drawing rooms of Victorian England. In reality, the history of British occupation of India and Britain's Opium Wars are some of the most dastardly blots on Western civilization.

Almost 13% of the income of India under British rule was derived from the sale of good quality Bengal opium to the British-run opium distributors in China. "The Beatles" of the day, the China Inland Mission, had done a great job in proliferating the use of opium among the poor Chinese laborers (coolies, as they were called). These addicts did not suddenly materialize out of thin air, any more than did teenager addicts in the U.S. THE POINT TO REMEMBER IS THAT BOTH WERE CREATED. In China a market for opium was first created and then filled by opium for Bengal. In the same way, a market for marijuana and LSD was first created in the United States by methods already described, and then filled by British plutocrats and their American cousins with the help of the overlords of the British banking establishment.

The lucrative drug trade is one of the worst examples of making money out of human misery; the other being the legal drug trade run by the pharmaceutical drug houses under Rockefeller ownership, in the U.S. for the most part, but with substantial companies operating in Switzerland, France and Britain and fully backed by the American Medical Association (AMA). The dirty dope transactions and the money it generates flows through the City of London, together with Hong Kong, Dubai and latterly, Lebanon, thanks to the invasion of that country by Israel.

There will be those who doubt this statement. "Look at this business columns of the Financial Times," they will tell us. "Don't tell me that this is all related to drug money"? OF COURSE IT IS, but don't imagine for one minute that the noble lords and ladies of England are going to advertise the fact. Remember the British East India Company? Officially, its business was trading in tea!

The London "Times" never dared tell the British public the it was impossible to make VAST PROFITS from tea, nor did the illustrious paper even hint at a trade in opium being plied by those who spent their time in London's fashionable clubs or playing a chukka of polo at the Royal Windsor Club, or that the gentlemen officers who went out to India in the service of the Empire were financed SOLELY by the enormous income derived from the misery of the millions of Chinese coolies addicted to opium.

The trade was conducted by the illustrious British East India Company, whose meddling in political, religious and economic affairs of the United States has cost us very dearly for over 200 years. The 300 members of the British East India Company's board were a cut above the common herd. They were so mighty, as Lord Bertrand Russell once observed, "They could even give God advice when he had trouble in Heaven." Nor should we imagine that anything has changed in the intervening years. EXACTLY the same attitude prevails today among members of the Committee of 300, which is why they often refer to themselves as the "Olympians."

Later the British Crown, i.e., the Royal Family, joined the British East India Company's trade, and used it as a vehicle to produce opium in Bengal, and elsewhere in India, controlling exports through what was called "transit duties," that is, the Crown levied a tax on all producers of opium duly registered with the state authority, who were sending their opium to China.

Prior to 1896, when the trade was still "illegal"—a word used to extract greater tribute from the producers of opium-there never having been the slightest attempt to stop the trade, colossal amounts of opium were shipped out of India on board "China Tea Clippers," those sailing ships around which legend and lore were built, which supposedly carried chests of tea from India and China to the London exchanges.

So audacious did the British East India Company lords and ladies become that they tried to sell this lethal substance to the Union and Confederate Armies in pill form as a pain killer. Is it difficult to imagine just what would have happened had their plan succeeded? All those hundreds of thousands of soldiers would have left the battlefields totally hooked on opium. "The Beatles" were much more successful in turning out millions of teenage addicts in later years.

The Bengal merchants and their British controllers and bankers grew fat and intolerant on the enormous amounts of money that poured into the coffers of the British East India Company from the wretched Chinese coolies opium trade. BEIC profits, even in those years, far exceeded the combined profits made in a single year by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler in their heydays. The trend in making huge profits out of drugs was carried over into the 1960's by such "legal" drug death merchants as Sandoz, the makers of LSD and Hoffman la Roche, manufacturers of Valium. The cost of the raw material and manufacturing of Valium to Hoffman la Roche is $3 per kilo (2.2 pounds). It is sold to their distributors for $20,000 per kilo. By the time it reaches the consumer, the price of Valium has risen to $50,000 per kilo. Valium is used in huge quantities in Europe and the United States. It is possibly the most used drug of its kind in the world.

Hoffman la Roche does the same thing with Vitamin C, which costs them less than 1 cent a kilo to produce. It is sold for a profit of 10,000 percent. When a friend of mine blew the whistle on this criminal company, which had entered into a monopoly agreement with other producers, in contravention of European Economic Community laws, he was arrested on the Swiss-Italian border and hustled into prison; his wife was threatened by the Swiss police until she committed suicide. As a British national he was rescued by the British consul in Berne as soon as word of his plight was received, removed from prison and flown out of the country. He lost his wife, his job and his pension because he dared to disclose Hoffman La Roche secrets. The Swiss take their Industrial Espionage law very seriously.

Remember this the next time you see those lovely advertisements of Swiss ski slopes, beautiful watches, pristine mountains and cuckoo clocks. That is not what Switzerland is about. It is about dirty multi-billion dollar money laundering which is carried out by major Swiss banking houses. It is about the Committee of 300 "legal" drug manufacturers. Switzerland is the Committee's ultimate "safe haven" for money and protection of their bodies in time of global calamity.

Now mind you, one could get into serious trouble with the Swiss authorities for giving out any information on these nefarious activities. The Swiss regard it as "industrial espionage" which usually carries a 5-year term in prison. It is safer to pretend that Switzerland is a nice clean country rather than look under the covers or inside its garbage can banks.

In 1931 the managing directors of the so-called "big Five" British companies were rewarded by being made Peers of the Realm for their activities in drug money laundering. Who decided such matters and bestows such honors? It is the Queen of England who bestows honors upon the men in the top positions in the drug trade. British banks engaged in this terrible trade are too numerous to mention, but a few of the top ones are: The British Bank of the Middle East. Midland Bank. National and Westminster Bank. Barclays Bank. Royal Bank of Canada. Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. Baring Brothers Bank.

Many of the merchant banks are up to their hocks in pigswill drug trade profits, banks such as Hambros for example, run by Sir Jocelyn Hambro. For a really interesting major study of the Chinese opium trade, one would need access to India Office in London. I was able to get in there because of my intelligence service and received great assistance from the trustee of the papers of the late Professor Frederick Wells Williamson, which provided much information on the opium trade carried on by the British East India Company in India and China in the 18th and 19th centuries. If only those papers could be made public, what a storm would burst over the heads of the crowned vipers of Europe.

Today the trade has shifted somewhat in that less expensive cocaine has taken over a good part of the North American market. In the 1960's the flood of heroin coming from Hong Kong, Lebanon and Dubai threatened to engulf the United States and Western Europe. When demand outpaced supply there was a switch to cocaine. But now, at the end of 1991, that trend has been reversed; today it is heroin that is back in favor, although it is true that cocaine still enjoys great favor among the poorer classes.

Heroin, we are told, is more satisfying to addicts; the effects are far more intense and last longer than the effects of cocaine and there is less international attention on heroin producers than there is on Colombian cocaine shippers. Besides which, it is hardly likely that the U.S. would make any real effort to stop the production of opium in the Golden Triangle which is under the control of the Chinese military, a serious war would erupt if any country tried to interdict the trade. A serious attack on the opium trade would bring Chinese military intervention.

The British know this; they have no quarrel with China, except for an occasional squabble over who gets the larger share of the pie. Britain has been involved in the China opium trade for over two centuries. No one is going to be so foolish as to rock the boat when millions upon millions of dollars flow into the bank accounts of the British oligarchists and more gold is traded on the Hong Kong gold market than the combined total traded in London and New York.

Those individuals who fondly imagine they can do some kind of a deal with a minor Chinese or Burmese overlord in the hills of the Golden Triangle apparently have no idea of what is involved. If they had known, they would never have talked about stopping the opium trade. Such talk reveals little knowledge of the immensity and complexity of China's opium trade,

British plutocrats, the Russian KGB, the CIA, and U.S. bankers are all in league with China. Could one man stop or even make a small dent in the trade? It would be absurd to imagine it. What is heroin and why is it favored over cocaine these days? According to the noted authority on the subject Professor Galen, heroin is a derivative of opium, a drug that stupefies the senses and induces long periods of sleep. This is what most addicts like, it is called "being in the arms of Morpheus." Opium is the most habit-forming drug known to man. Many pharmaceutical drugs contain opium in various degrees, and it is believed that paper used in the manufacture of cigarettes is first impregnated with opium, which is why smokers become so addicted to their habit.

The poppy seed from which it is derived was long known to the Moguls of India, who used the seeds mixed in tea offered to a difficult opponent. It is also used as a pain-killing drug which largely replaced chloroform and other older anesthetics of a bygone era. Opium was popular in all of the fashionable clubs of Victorian London and it was no secret that men like the Huxley brothers used it extensively. Members of the Orphic-Dionysus cults of Hellenic Greece and the Osiris-Horus cults of Ptolemaic Egypt which Victorian society embraced, all smoked opium; it was the "in" thing to do.

So did some of those who met at St. Ermins Hotel in 1903 to decide what sort of a world we would have. The descendants of the St. Ermins crowd are found today in the Committee of 300. It is these so-called world leaders who brought about such a change in our environment that enabled drug usage to proliferate to the point where it can no longer be stopped by regular law enforcement tactics and policies. This is especially true in big cities where big populations can conceal a great deal of what transpires.

Many in the circles of royalty were regular opium users. One of their favorites was the writer Coudenhove-Kalergi who wrote a book in 1932 entitled "REVOLUTION THROUGH TECHNOLOGY which was a blueprint for the return of the world to a medieval society. The book, in fact, became a working paper for the Committee of 300's plan to deindustrialize the world, starting with the United States. Claiming that pressures of over-population are a serious problem, Kalergi advised a return to what he called "open spaces." Does this sound like the Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot? Here are some extracts from the book:

"In its facilities, the city of the future will resemble the city of the Middle Ages...and he who is not condemned to live in a city because of his occupation, will go to the countryside. Our civilization is a culture of the major cities; therefore it is a marsh plant, born by degenerated, sickly and decadent people, who have voluntarily, or involuntarily, ended up in this dead-end street of life." Isn't that very close to what "AnkarWat" gave as "his" reasons for depopulating Phnom Penh?

The first opium shipments reached England from Bengal in 1683, carried in British East India Company "Tea Clippers." Opium was brought to England as a test, an experiment, to see whether the common folk of England, the yeomen and the lower classes, could be induced into taking the drug. It was what we could call today "test marketing" of a new product. But the sturdy yeomen and the much derided "lower classes" were made of stern stuff, and the test marketing experiment was a total flop. The "lower classes" of British society firmly rejected opium smoking.

The plutocrats and oligarchists in high society in London began casting about for a market that would not be so resistant, so unbending. They found such a market in China. In the papers I studied at the India Office under the heading "Miscellaneous Old Records," I found all the confirmation I could have wished for in proving that the opium trade in China really took off following the founding of the British East India Companyfunded "China Inland Mission," ostensibly a Christian missionary society but in reality the "promotion" men and women for the new product being introduced into the market, that new product being OPIUM.

This was later confirmed when I was given access to the papers of Sir George Birdwood in India Office records. Soon after the China Inland Mission missionaries set out to give away their sample packages and show the coolies how to smoke opium, vast quantities of opium began to arrive in China. "The Beatles" could not have done a better job. (In both cases the trade was sanctioned by the British royal family, who openly supported the Beatles.) Where the British East India Company had failed in England, it now succeeded beyond its wildest expectations in China, whose teeming millions of poor looked upon smoking opium as an escape from their life of misery.

Opium dens began proliferating all across China, and in the big cities like Shanghai and Canton, hundreds of thousands of miserable Chinese found that a pipe of opium seemingly made life bearable. The British East India Company had a clear run for over a 100 years before the Chinese government woke up to what was happening. It was only in 1729 that the first laws against opium smoking were passed. The 300 board members of BEIC did not like it one bit and, never one to back down, the company was soon engaged in a running battle with the Chinese government.

The BEIC had developed poppy seeds that brought the finest quality opium from the poppy fields of Benares and Bihar in the Ganges Basin in India, a country they fully controlled this fetched top price, while the lower grades of opium from other areas of India were sold for less. Not about to lose their lucrative market, the British Crown engaged in running battles with Chinese forces, and defeated them. In the same manner, the U.S. government is supposedly fighting a running battle against today's drug barons and, like the Chinese, are losing heavily. There is however one big difference: The Chinese government fought to win whereas the United States government is under no compunction to win the battle which explains why staff turnover n the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) is so high.

Latterly, high grade quality opium has come out of Pakistan via Makra on the desolate coastline of the country from whence ships take the cargo to Dubai where it is exchanged for gold. This is said to account in part for heroin being favored over cocaine today. The heroin trade is more discreet, there is no murder of prominent officials such as became an almost daily occurrence in Colombia. Pakistani opium does not sell for as much as Golden Triangle or Golden Crescent (Iranian) opium. This has greatly spurred heroin production and sales which threaten to overtake cocaine as the number one seller.

The vile opium trade was talked about in the upper-crust circles of English society for many years as "the spoils of the Empire." The tall tales of valor in the Khyber Pass covered a vast trade in opium. The British Army was stationed in the Khyber Pass to protect caravans carrying raw opium from being pillaged by hill tribesmen. Did the British royal family know this? They must have, what else would induce the Crown to keep an army in this region where there was nothing of much worth other than the lucrative opium trade? It was very expensive to keep men under arms in a far away country. Her Majesty must have asked why these military units were there? Certainly not to play polo or billiards in the officers' mess.

The BEIC was jealous of its monopoly in opium. Would-be competitors received short shrift. In a noted trial in 1791, a certain Warren Hastings was put on charges that he helped a Friend to get into the opium trade at the expense of the BEIC. The actual wording which I found in the records of the case housed in India Office gives some insight into the vast opium trade: "The charge is that Hastings has granted a contract for the Provision of Opium for four years to Stephen Sullivan, without advertising for the same, on terms glaringly obvious and wantonly profuse, for the purpose of creating an INSTANT FORTUNE for the said William Sullivan Esq." (Emphasis added.)

As the BEIC-British government held the monopoly in opium trading, the only people allowed to make instant fortunes were the "nobility," the "aristocracy," the plutocrats and oligarchical families of England, many of whose descendants sit on the Committee of 300 just as their forbears sat on the Council of 300 who ran the BEIC. Outsiders like Mr. Sullivan soon found themselves in trouble with the Crown if they were so bold as to try and help themselves get into the multi-billion pound Sterling opium business.

The honorable men of the BEIC with its list of 300 counselors were members of all the famous gentlemen's clubs in London and they were for the most part members of parliament, while others, both in India and at home, were magistrates. Company passports were required to land in China. When a few busybodies arrived in China to investigate the British Crown's involvement in the lucrative trade, BEIC magistrates promptly revoked their passports, thus effectively denying them entry into China.

Friction with the Chinese government was common. The Chinese had passed a law, the Yung Cheny Edict of 1729, forbidding the importation of opium, yet the BEIC managed to keep opium as an entry in the Chinese Customs Tariff books until 1753, the duty being three taels per chest of opium. Even when British special secret service (the 007 of the day) saw to it that troublesome Chinese officials were bought off, and in cases where that was not possible, they were simply murdered.

Every British monarch since 1729 has benefited immensely from the drug trade and this holds good for the present occupant of the throne. Their ministers saw to it that wealth flowed into their family coffers. One such minister of Victoria's was Lord Palmerston. He clung obstinately to the belief that nothing should be allowed to stop Britain's opium trade with China. Palmerston's plan was to supply the Chinese government with enough opium to make individual members become greedy. Then the British would withhold supplies and when the Chinese government was on its knees, supplies would be resumed—but at a much higher price, thus retaining a monopoly through the Chinese government itself, but the plan failed.

The Chinese government responded by destroying large cargoes of opium stored in warehouses, and British merchants were required to sign INDIVIDUAL agreements not to import any more opium into Canton. BEIC responded by sending scores of fully-loaded opium carrying ships to lie in the roads of Macao. Companies beholden to BEIC, rather than individuals, then sold these cargoes. Chinese Commissioner Lin said, "There is so much opium on board English vessels now lying in the roads of this place (Macao) which will never be returned to the country from which it came, and I shall not be surprised to hear of its being smuggled in under American colors." Lin's prophecy proved to be remarkably accurate.

The Opium Wars against China were designed to "put the Chinese in their place" as Lord Palmerston once said, and the British Army did that. There was simply no stopping the vast, lucrative trade which provided the British oligarchical feudal lords with untold billions, while leaving China with millions of opium addicts. In later years the Chinese appealed to Britain for help with their immense problem and received it. Thereafter respective Chinese governments realized the value in cooperating instead of fighting with Britain—and this held good during the bloody rule of Mao Tse Tung—so that today, as I have already mentioned, any quarrels that come about are only over the share of the opium trade each is entitled to.

To advance to more modern history, the Chinese-British partnership was solidified by the Hong Kong agreement which established an equal partnership in the opium trade. This has proceeded smoothly, with an occasional ripple here and there, but while violence and death, robbery and murder marked the progression of the Colombian cocaine trade, no such baseness was allowed to disturb the heroin trade, which, as I said earlier, is once again coming into the ascendancy as we near the end of 1991.

The major problem that arose in Sino-British relations during the past 60 years concerned China's demand for a larger slice of the opium-heroin pie. This was settled when Britain agreed to hand Hong Kong over to full Chinese government control which will come into effect in 1997. Other than that, the partners retain their former equal shares of the lucrative opium trade based in Hong Kong.

The British oligarchical families of the Committee of 300 who were entrenched in Canton at the height of the opium trade left their descendants in position. Look at a list of prominent British residents in China and you will see the names of members of the Committee of 300 among them. The same holds good for Hong Kong. These plutocrats of a feudal era, that they seek to return to the world, control the gold and opium trade of which Hong Kong is THE center. Burmese and Chinese opium poppy growers get paid in gold; they do not trust the U.S. paper $100 bill. This explains the very large volume of gold trade in the Hong Kong exchange.

The Golden Triangle is no longer the largest producer of opium. That dubious title has since 1987 been shared by the Golden Crescent (Iran), Pakistan and Lebanon. These are the principle opium producers, although smaller quantities are once again coming out of Afghanistan and Turkey. The drug trade, and more: especially the opium trade, could not function without the help of banks as we shall demonstrate as we proceed.

How do banks with their great air of respectability fit into the drug trade with all of its attendant filth? It is a very long and complicated story, which could be the subject of a book on its own.

One way in which banks participate is by financing front companies importing the chemicals needed to process raw opium into heroin. The Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank with a branch office in London is right in the middle of such trade through a company called TEJAPAIBUL, which banks with Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. What does this company do? It imports into Hong Kong most of the chemicals needed in the heroin refining process.

It is also a major supplier of acetic anhydride For the Golden Crescent and the Golden Triangle, Pakistan, Turkey and Lebanon. The actual financing for this trading is hived off to the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank. Thus, the secondary activities connected with processing opium, while not in the same category us the opium trade, nevertheless generates substantial income for banks. But the real income of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank and indeed all banks in the region is financing the actual opium trade.

It took a lot of research on my part to link the price of gold to the price of opium. I used to tell anyone who would listen, "If you want to know the price of gold find out what the price of a pound or a kilo of opium is in Hong Kong." To my critics I answered, "Take a look at what happened in 1977, a critical year for gold." The Bank of China shocked the gold pundits, and those clever forecasters who are to be found in great numbers in America, by suddenly and without warning, dumping 80 tons of gold on the market.

That depressed the price of gold in a big hurry. All the experts could say was, "We never knew China had that much gold where could it have come from?" It came from the gold which is paid to China in the Hong Kong Gold Market for large purchases of opium. The current policy of the Chinese government toward England is the same as it was in the 18th and 19th centuries. The Chinese economy, tied to the economy of Hong Kong—and I don't mean television sets, textiles, radios, watches, pirated cassette and video tapes—I mean opium/heroin—would take a terrible beating if it were not for the opium trade it shares with Britain. The BEIC is gone but the descendants of the Council of 300 linger on in the membership of the Committee of 300.

The oldest of the oligarchical British families who were leaders in the opium trade for the past 200 years are still in it today. Take the Mathesons, for instance. This "noble" family is one of the pillars of the opium trade. When things looked a bit shaky a few years ago, the Mathesons stepped in and gave China a loan of $300 million for real estate investment. Actually it was billed as a "joint venture between the People's Republic of China and the Matheson Bank." When researching India Office papers of the 1700's I came across the name of Matheson, and it kept on cropping up everywhere—London, Peking, Dubai, Hong Kong, wherever heroin and opium are mentioned.

The problem with the drug trade is that it has become a threat to national sovereignty. Here is what the Venezuelan Ambassador to the United Nations said about this world-wide threat:

"The problem of drugs bas already ceased to be dealt with simply as one of public health or a social problem. It has turned into something far more serious and far-reaching which affects our national sovereignty; a problem of national security, because it strikes at the independence of a nation. Drugs in all their manifestations of production, commercialization and consumption, denaturalizes us by injuring our ethical, religious and political life, our historic, economic, and republican values."

This is precisely the way the Bank of International Settlements and the IMF are operating. Let me say without hesitation that both these banks are nothing more than bully-boy clearing houses for the drug trade. The BIS undermines any country that the IMF wants to sink by setting up ways and means for the easy outflow of flight capital. Nor does BIS recognize nor make any distinction when it comes down to what is flight capital and what is laundered drug money.

The BIS operates on gangster lines. If a country will not submit to asset-stripping by the IMF, then it says in effect, "Right, then we will break you by means of the huge cache of narco-dollars we are holding." It is easy to understand why gold was demonetized and substituted with the paper "dollar" as the world's reserve currency. It is not as easy to blackmail a country holding gold reserves as it is one having its reserves in paper dollars.

The IMF held a meeting in Hong Kong a few years ago which was attended by a colleague of mine and he told me the seminar dealt with this very question. He informed me that the IMF agents told the meeting that they could literally cause a run on any country's currency, using narco-dollars, which would precipitate a flight of capital. Rainer-Gut, a Credit Suisse delegate and member of the Committee of 300, said he foresaw a situation where national credit and national financing would be under one umbrella organization by the turn of the century. While Rainer-Gut did not spell it out, everybody at the seminar knew exactly what he was talking about.

From Colombia to Miami, from the Golden Triangle to the Golden Gate, from Hong Kong to New York, from Bogota to Frankfurt, the drug trade, and more especially the heroin trade, is BIG BUSINESS and it is run from the top down by some of the most "untouchable" families in the world, and each of those families have at least one member who is on the Committee of 300. It is not a street corner business, and it takes a great deal of money and expertise to keep it flowing smoothly. The machinery under control of the Committee of 300 ensures this.

Such talents are not found on the street corners and subways of New York. To be sure the pushers and peddlers are an integral part of the trade, but only as very small part-time salesmen. I say part-time because they are caught and rivalry gets some of them shot. But what does that matter? There are plenty of replacements available.

No, it is not anything the Small Business Administration would be interested in. IT IS BIG BUSINESS, a vast empire, this dirty drug business. Of necessity, it is operated from the top down in every single country in the world. It is, in fact, the largest single enterprise in the world today, transcending all others. That it is protected from the top down is borne out by the fact that, like international terrorism, it cannot be stamped out which should indicate to a reasonable person that some of this biggest names in royal circles, the oligarchy, the plutocracy are running it, even if it is done through intermediaries.

The main countries involved in growing poppies and the cocoa bush are Burma, Northern China, Afghanistan, Iran, PaKistan, Thailand, Lebanon, Turkey, Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia. Colombia does not grow the cocoa bush but, next to Bolivia, is the main refiner of cocaine and the chief financial center of the cocaine trade which, since General Noriega was kidnaped and imprisoned by President Bush, is being challenged by Panama for first place in money laundering and capital financing of the cocaine trade.

The heroin trade is financed by Hong Kong banks, London banks and some Middle East banks such as the British Bank of the Middle East. Lebanon is fast becoming the "Switzerland of the Middle East." Countries involved in the distribution and routing of heroin are Hong Kong, Turkey, Bulgaria, Italy, Monaco, France (Corsica and Marseilles) Lebanon and Pakistan. The United States is the largest consumer of narcotics, first place going to cocaine, which is being challenged by heroin. Western Europe and Southwest Asian countries are the biggest users of heroin. Iran has a huge heroin addict population—in excess of 2 million as of 1991.

There is not a single government that does not know precisely what is going on with regard to the drug trade, but individual members holding powerful positions are taken, but of by the Committee of 300 through its world-wide network of subsidiaries. If any government member is "difficult," he or she is removed, as in the case of Pakistan's Ali Bhutto and Italy's Aldo Moro. No one is beyond the reach of this all-powerful Committee, even though Malaysia has been successful in holding out up until now. Malaysia has the strictest anti-drug laws in the world. Possession of even small amounts is punishable by the death penalty.

Like the Kintex Company of Bulgaria, most smaller countries have a direct hand in these criminal enterprises. Kintex trucks regularly ferried heroin through Western Europe in its own fleet of trucks bearing the EEC marker Triangle Internationale Routier (TIR). Trucks bearing this marker and the EEC recognition number are not supposed to be stopped at customs boarder posts. TlR trucks are allowed to carry only perishable items. They are supposed to be inspected in the country from whence they originated and documentation to this effect is supposed to be carried by each truck driver.

Under international treaty obligations this is what happens, thus Kintex trucks were able load their cargoes of heroin and certify it as "fresh fruit and vegetables;" and then make their way through Western Europe, even entering high-security NATO bases in Northern Italy. In this manner, Bulgaria became one of the principal countries through which heroin was routed.

The only way to stop the huge amounts of heroin and cocaine presently finding their way to markets in Europe is to end the TIR system. That will never happen. The international treaty obligations I have just mentioned were set up by the Committee of 300, using its amazing networks and control mechanisms, to facilitate passage of all manner of drugs to Western Europe. Forget perishable goods! A former DEA agent stationed in Italy told me, "TIR=DOPE."

Remember this the next time you read in the newspapers that a big haul of heroin was found in a false-bottom suitcase at Kennedy Airport, and some unlucky "mule" pays the price for his criminal activity. This kind of action is only "small potatoes," sand in the eyes of the public, to make us think our government is really doing something about the drug menace. Take for example, "The French Connection," a Nixon program embarked upon without the knowledge and consent of the committee of 300.

The entire amount of opium/heroin seized in that massive effort is somewhat less than one quarter of what a single TIR truck carries. The Committee of 300 saw to it that Nixon paid a heavy price for a relatively small seizure of heroin. It was not the amount of heroin involved, but a matter of one whom they had helped up the ladder to the White House believing that he could now do without their help and backing, and even go against direct orders from above.

The mechanics of the heroin trade go like this: wild Thai and Burmese Hill tribesmen grow the opium poppy. At harvest time, the seed-bearing pod is cut with a razor or sharp knife. A resinous substance leaks through the cut and starts to congeal. This is raw opium. The crop of raw opium is made up into sticky roundish balls. The tribesman are paid in 1 kilo gold bars-known as 4/10ths—which are minted by Credit Suisse. These small bars are used ONLY to pay the tribesman—the normalweight gold bars are traded on the Hong Kong market by the big buyers of raw opium or partly processed heroin. The same methods are used to pay hill tribesman in India—the Baluchis-who have been in this business since the days of the Moguls. The "Dope Season," as it is called, sees a flood of gold traded on the Hong Kong market.

Mexico has started producing relatively small amounts of heroin called "Mexican Brown" which is much in demand by the Hollywood crowd. Here again the heroin trade is run by top government officials who have the military on their side. Some producers of "Mexican Brown" are making a million dollars a month by supplying their U.S. clients. On occasions when a few Mexican Federal police are prodded into taking action against the heroin producers, they are "taken out" by military units who seem to appear as if from nowhere.

Such an incident occurred in November 1991 at an isolated airstrip in Mexico's opium producing region. Federal narcotics agents surrounded the strip and were about to arrest people who were in the act of loading heroin when a squad of soldiers arrived. The soldiers rounded up the Federal narcotics police agents and systematically killed all of them. This action posed serious threat to Mexican President Goltarin, who is faced with loud demands for a full-scale investigation into the murders. Goltarin is over a barrel; he can't back off from calling for an inquiry, and neither can he afford to offend the military. It is the first such crack in the tight chain of command in Mexico that stretches all the way back to the Committee of 300.

Raw opium from the Golden Triangle is pipelined to the Sicilian Mafia and the French end of the business for refining in the laboratories that infest the French coastline from Marseilles to Monte-Carlo. Nowadays, Lebanon and Turkey are turning out increasing amounts of refined heroin and a large number of laboratories have sprung up in these two countries in the past four years. Pakistan also has a number of laboratories but it is not in the same league as France, for example.

The route taken by the raw opium carriers of the Golden Crescent goes through Iran, Turkey and Lebanon. When the Shah of Iran was in control of the country, he refused to allow the heroin trade to continue and it was forcibly discontinuedup until the time that he was "dealt with" by the Committee of 300. Raw opium from Turkey and Lebanon finds it way to Corsica, from where it is shipped to Monte Carlo with the connivance of the Grimaldi family. Pakistani laboratories, under the guise of "military defense laboratories" are doing a bigger share of refining than they were two years ago, but the best refining is still done along the French Mediterranean coastline and in Turkey. Here again, banks play a vital role in financing these operations.

Let us stop here for a moment. Are we to believe that with all the modern and vastly improved surveillance techniques, including satellite reconnaissance, available to law enforcement agencies in these countries, that this vile trade cannot be pinpointed and stopped? How is it that law enforcement agencies cannot go in and destroy these laboratories once they are discovered? If this IS the case, and we still cannot interdict the heroin trade, then our anti-narcotics services ought to be known as "The Geriatrics" and not drug enforcement agencies.

Even a child could tell our alleged "drug watchers" what to do. Simply keep a check on all factories making acetic anhydride, THE most essential chemical component needed by laboratories to refine heroin from raw opium. THEN FOLLOW THE TRAIL! It is as simple as that! I am reminded of Peter Sellers in the "Pink Panther" series when I think of law enforcement efforts to locate heroin-refining laboratories. Even someone as bumbling as the imaginary inspector would have had no trouble in following the route taken by acetic anhydride shipments to their final destination.

Governments could make laws that would oblige manufacturers of acetic anhydride to keep scrupulous records showing who buys the chemical and for what purposes it is to be used. But do not hold your breath on this one, remember Dope=Big Business and Big Business is done by the oligarchical families of Europe and the United States Eastern Liberal Establishment. The drug business is not a Mafia operation, nor one run by the Colombian cocaine cartels. The noble families of Britain and America's top people are not going to advertise their role in the shop windows; they always have a layer of front men to do the dirty work.

Remember British and AMERICAN "nobility" never dirtied their hands in the China opium trade. The lords and ladies were much too clever for that, as were the American elite: the Delanos, Forbes, Appletons, Bacons, Boylestons, Perkins, Russells, Cunninghams, Shaws, Coolidges, Parkmans, Runnewells, Cabots and Codmans, by no means a complete list of families in America who grew immensely wealthy from the China opium trade.

Since this is not a book about the drug trade, I cannot of necessity, cover the subject in an in-depth manner. But its importance to the Committee of 300 must be emphasized. America is run not by 60 families but by 300 families and England is run by 100 families and, as we shall see, these families are intertwined through marriage, companies, banks, not to mention ties to the Black Nobility, Freemasonry, the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and so on. These are the people who, through their surrogates, find ways to protect huge shipments of heroin from Hong Kong, Turkey, Iran and Pakistan and ensure they reach the market places in the U.S. and Western Europe with the minimum cost of doing business.

Shipments of cocaine are sometimes interdicted and seized That is mere window dressing. Often times the shipments seized belong to a new organization trying to break into the trade. Such competition is put out of business by informing the authorities exactly where it is going to enter the U.S. and who the owners are. The big stuff is never touched; heroin is too expensive. It is worthy of note that U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency operatives are not allowed into Hong Kong. They cannot examine any ship's manifest before it leaves the port. One wonders why, if there is so much "international cooperation" going on—what the media likes to characterize as "smashing the dope trade." Clearly the trade routes for heroin are protected by "a higher authority. "

In South America, apart from Mexico, cocaine is king. The production of cocaine is very simple, unlike heroin, and great fortunes are to be made by those willing to take risks for and on behalf of the "higher ups." As in the heroin trade, interlopers are not welcome and often finish up as casualties, or victims of family feuds. In Colombia the drug mafia is a closely knit family. But such has been the bad publicity generated by the M19 guerrilla attack on the Justice Building in Bogota (M19 is the private army of the cocaine barons) and the murder of Rodrigo Lara Bonilla, a prominent prosecutor and a judge, that the "higher authority" had to rearrange matters in Colombia.

Accordingly, the Ochoas of the Medellin Cartel turned themselves in after being assured that they would not suffer any loss of fortune, harm of any kind, nor would they be extradited to the United States. A deal was struck that, provided they repatriated the bulk of their huge narco-dollar fortunes to Colombian banks, no punitive action would be taken against them. The Ochoas—Jorge, Fabio, and their top man, Pablo Escobar, would be held in private jails that resemble a luxury-class motel room, and then be sentenced to a maximum term of two years-to be served in the same motel jail. This deal is ongoing. The Ochoas have also been guaranteed the right to continue to manage their "business" from their motel-prison.

But that does not mean that the cocaine trade has come to a screeching halt. On the contrary, it has simply been transferred to the second-string Cali cartel, and it is business as usual. For some strange reason the Cali cartel, which is equal in size to the Medellin cartel, has been—at least up until now—largely ignored by the DEA. Cali differs from the Medellin cartel in that it is run by BUSINESSMEN, who eschew all forms of violence and never break agreements.

Even more significant is that Cali does virtually no business in Florida. My source told me that the Cali cartel is run by shrewd businessmen unlike any seen in the cocaine business. He believes that they were "specially appointed," but does not know by whom.

"They never call attention to themselves," he said. "They do not go around importing red Ferraris like Jorge Ochoa did, attracting immediate attention, because it is forbidden to import such cars into Colombia."

Cali cartel markets are in Los Angeles, New York and Houston, which closely parallel the heroin markets. Cali has not shown any signs of moving into Florida. A former DEA operative who is a colleague of mine said recently, "These Cali people are sure smart. They are a different breed to the Ochoa brothers. They act like professional businessmen. They are now larger than the Medellin cartel and I think we are going to see a lot more cocaine get into the United States than ever before. The kidnaping of Manuel Noriega will facilitate an easier flow through Panama of cocaine and money, what with so many banks there. So much for President George Bush's Operation Just Cause. All it did was make life a great deal easier for Nicolas Ardito Barletta who used to be run by the Ochoa brothers and who is fixing to front for the Cali cartel."

Based on my experience with the heroin trade I believe that the Committee of 300 has stepped in and taken over full control of the South American cocaine trade. There is no other explanation For the rise of the Cali cartel which is coupled with the kidnaping of Noriega. Did Bush take his orders from London regarding Noriega? There is every indication that he was literally PUSHED into invading Panama and kidnaping Noriega, who had become a serious impediment to "trade" in Panama, especially in the banking business.

Several former intelligence agents have given me their opinions which coincide with my own. Like the Gulf War that followed in the wake of Panama, it was only after several calls from the British Ambassedor in Washington that Bush finally plucked up enough courage to make his totally illegal move on General Noriega. That he was supported by the British press and the New York Times, a British intelligence run newspaper, speaks volumes.

Noriega was formerly the darling of the Washington establishment. He frequently hob-knobbed with William Casey and Oliver North and even met with President George Bush on at least two occasions. Noriega was often seen at the Pentagon where he was treated like one of those Arab potentates, and the red carpet was always laid out for him at CIA headquarters in Langley Virginia. U.S. Army Intelligence and the CIA are on record as having paid him $320,000.

Then storm clouds began to appear on the horizon at about the same time the Cali cartel was taking over the cocaine trade from the Ochoa brothers and Pablo Escobar. Led by Senator Jesse Helms, who sold out to Ariel Sharon and the Israeli Histradut Party in 1985, there suddenly began an agitation for the removal of Noriega. Jesse Helms and those of a like mind were backed up by Simon Hersh, a British intelligence agent working for the New York Times, which has been a British intelligence mouthpiece in the U.S. since the time that M16 boss, Sir William Stephenson, occupied the RCA building in New York.

It is very significant that Helms should have chosen to lead the charge against Noriega. Helms is the darling of the Sharon faction in Washington and Sharon was the principal gun-runner in Central America and Colombia. Moreover, Helms has the respect of the Christian fundamentalists who believe in the maxim: "Israel, my country, right or wrong." Thus a powerful momentum was created to "get Noriega." It is evident that Noriega could well prove a serious impediment to the international drug merchants and their Committee of 300 bankers, so he had to be removed before he could do some significant damage.

Bush was pressured by his British masters to conduct an illegal search and seizure operation in Panama that resulted in the deaths of no less than 7,000 Panamanians and wanton destruction of property. Nothing to implicate Noriega as a "drug dealer" was ever found, so he was kidnaped and brought to the U.S. in one of the most blatant examples of international brigandry in history. This illegal action probably best meets the Bush philosophy: "The moral dimensions of American (read British royal family-Committee of 300) foreign policy require us to chart a moral course through a world of lesser evils. That's the real world, not black and while. Very few absolutes."

It was a "lesser evil" lo kidnap Noriega, rather than have him up-end the banks in Panama working for the Committee of 300. The Noriega case is a prototype of monstrous One World government actions waiting in the wings. An emboldened Bush came right out in the open, unafraid, because we, the people have put on a spiritual mantle that accommodates LIES and wants no part of TRUTH. This is the world we have decided to accept. If it were not so, a firestorm of anger would have swept the country over the invasion of Panama, which would not have stopped until Bush was hounded from office. Nixon's Watergate transgressions pale into insignificance next to the many impeachable offenses committed by President Bush when he ordered the invasion of Panama to kidnap General Noriega.

The government case against Noriega is based upon perjured testimony by a group of big men, for the most part, already convicted and lying through their individual and collective teeth to gel their own sentences lightened. Their performance would have pleased Gilbert and Sullivan immensely, were they alive today. "They made them the rulers of DEA," might be apropos instead of, "They made them the rulers of Queen's Navy," from "HMS Pinafore." It is an altogether grotesque scene to see how these con-artists are performing like not-so-well-trained seals for the U.S. Justice Department; that is if we care to insult such a nice clean animal by such an unworthy comparison.

Key dates conflict wildly, key details are altogether conspicuous by their absence, lapses of memory on crucial points all add up to the obvious fact that the government has no case against Noriega, but that does not matter; the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA) says "convict him anyway" and that is what poor Noriega can expect. One of the Justice Department's star witnesses is one Floyd Carlton Caceres, a former pilot for the Ochoa brothers. Following his arrest in 1986, Carlton tried to ease his position at the expense of Noriega.

He told his DEA interrogators that the Ochoa brothers had paid Noriega $600,000 to allow three planes loaded with cocaine to land and refuel in Panama. But once in court in Miami, it soon became apparent that what was billed as the "star witness" for the prosecution was at best damp squib. Under cross-examination the true story emerged: Far from being paid to allow the flights, Noriega wasn't even approached by the Ochoas. Worse yet, in December of 1983, Noriega had ordered that all flights to Panama from Medellin be refused permission to land in Panama. Carlton is not the only discredited witness.

One who is even a sorrier liar than Carlton is Carlos Lehder, who was a kingpin in the Medellin Cartel until he was arrested in Spain and sent to the U.S. Who gave the DEA the most vital information that Lehder was in Madrid? The DEA reluctantly concedes that they owe this important catch to Noriega. Now, however, the Justice Department is using Lehder as a witness against Noriega. If nothing else, this single witness demonstrates the wretchedness of the United States government's case against Manuel Noriega.

In return for services rendered, Lehder has been granted an easing of his sentence and far nicer quarters—a room with a view and television—and his family was given permanent residence in the U.S. Robert Merkel, a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted Lehder in 1988 told the Washington Pose "I don't think the government should be in the business of dealing with Carlos Lehder, period. This guy is a liar from beginning to end.

The Justice Department, purely a name which bears no resemblance to what it is supposed to stand for, has pulled out all its dirty tricks against Noriega: illegally wire-tapping his conversations with his lawyer; appointing a government lawyer to pretend he was serving Noriega but who quit in the middle of everything; freezing his bank accounts so that Noriega is unable to conduct a proper defense; kidnaping, illegal search and seizure. You name it, the government has broken more laws than Noriega has ever done—if indeed he has broken any laws at all.

It is the U.S. Justice Department that is on trial tenfold more than General Noriega. The Noriega case shows the glaringly evil system that passes for "justice" in this country. The U.S. "war on drugs" is on trial as is the Bush Administration's socalled drug policy. The Noriega trial, although it will end in a violent and flagrant rape of justice, will nevertheless offer some compensation to those who are not blind, deaf and dumb. It proves for once and for all that Britain is in charge of our government and it will reveal the utterly bankrupt ideology of the Bush Administration which ought to have as its motto, "No Matter What, The End Always Justifies The Means. There Are Very Few Moral Absolutes." Like the majority of politicians, for Bush to have a standard of ABSOLUTE MORALITY WOULD BE SUICIDAL. Only in this climate could we have allowed President Bush to violate at least six United States laws and DOZENS OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS in going to war against Iraq.

What we are witnessing in Colombia and Washington is a complete revision of how the cocaine trade is to be run; no more wild stuff, no more blazing guns. Let the gentlemen of the Cali cartel in pin-stripe suits conduct the business in a gentlemanly way In short, the Committee of 300 has taken a direct hand in the cocaine trade which henceforth will go as smoothly as the heroin trade. The new government of Colombia is geared to the change in tactics and direction. It is on notice to perform according to the Committee's game plan.

There is need to mention U.S. participation in the China opium trade which began in the southern United States prior to the War Between The States. How can we tie the opium trade in with the great cotton plantations of the South? To do that, we have to start in Bengal, India, producers of the finest (if one can call such a foul substance fine) opium which was much in demand. Cotton was THE biggest trade in England, after opium sales through the BEIC.

Most of the cotton from Southern plantations was worked in the slave mills of Northern England, where women and children earned a pittance for a 16-hour day's work. The cloth mills were owned by the wealthy socialites in London, the Barings, Palmerstons, Keswicks and most of all the Jardine Mathesons who owned the Blue Star Shipping Line, on which the finished cotton cloth goods were shipped to India. They could care less about the hapless conditions endured by Her Majesty's subject. After all, that is what they were for, and their husbands and sons were useful for fighting wars to preserve Her Majesty's farflung empire as they had done for centuries, and latterly, in the bloody Boer War. That was British tradition, wasn't it?

Cotton cloth finished goods exported to India undercut and destroyed the long-standing Indian producers of cotton finished goods trade. Terrible privation was endured by thousands of Indians thrown out of work as a result of cheaper British goods taking over their markets. India then became utterly dependent upon Britain to earn enough currency to pay for its railroads and finished cotton goods imports. There was only one solution to India's economic woes. Produce more opium and sell it for less to the British East India Company. This was the rock upon which British trade grew and flourished. Without its opium trade, Britain would have been as bankrupt.

Did the Southern plantation owners know about the ugly secret of opium-for-cotton goods? It is unlikely that some of them didn't know what was going on. Take, for instance, the Sutherland family, one of the largest cotton plantation owners in the South. The Sutherlands were closely related to the Matheson family—Jardine Matheson—who in turn had as their business partners the Baring Brothers, founders of the famous Peninsular and Orient Navigation Line (P&O), the largest of Britain's many merchant shipping lines.

The Barings were big investors in Southern plantations as they were in the U.S. Clipper ships which plowed through the seas between Chinese ports and all the important ports along the eastern seaboard of the United States. Today the Barings run a number of very substantial financial operations in the United States. All of those names mentioned were, and their descendants still are, members of the Committee of 300.

The majority of families who go to make up the Eastern Liberal Establishment, among whom are the wealthiest to be found in this country, derived their fortunes from either the cotton trade or the opium trade and in some instances from both. Of these the Lehmans are an outstanding example. When it comes to fortunes made solely from the China opium trade, the first names that come to mind are the Astors and the Delanos. President Franklin D. Roosevelt's wife was a Delano.

John Jacob Astor made a huge fortune out of the China opium trade and then he went respectable by buying up large tracts of Manhattan real estate with his dirty money. During his lifetime Astor played a big role in the Committee of 300s' deliberations. In fact, it was the Committee of 300 who chose who would be allowed to participate in the fabulously lucrative China opium trade, through its monopolist BEIC, and the beneficiaries of their largess remained forever wedded to the Committee of 300.

That is why, as we shall discover, most real estate in Manhattan belongs to various Committee members, even as it has since the days when Astor began buying it up. With the benefit of access to records that would be closed to others outside of British intelligence, I discovered that Astor had long been an asset of British intelligence in the United States. Astor's financing of Aaron Burr, the murderer of Alexander Hamilton, proves the point beyond any reasonable doubt.

John Jacob Astor's son, Waldorf Astor, had the additional honor bestowed upon him of being appointed to the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA), through which organization the Committee of 300 controls every facet of our lives in the United States. The Astor family is believed to have selected Owen Lattimore to carry on their association with the opium trade which he did through the Laura Spelman-funded Institute for Pacific Relations (IPR). It was the IPR that oversaw China's entry into the opium trade as an equal partner and not merely as a supplier. It was IPR that paved the way for the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. Attempts to turn the Japanese into opium addicts met with dismal failure.

By the turn of the century the oligarchical plutocrats of Britain were like overgorged vultures on the Serengeti Plain at the time of the annual Wildebeest march. Their income from the China opium trade exceeded David Rockefeller's income by SEVERAL BILLION DOLLARS PER ANNUM. Historic records made available to me in the British Museum in London and from India Office and other sources—former colleagues in well-placed positions, proves this completely.

By 1905, the Chinese government, deeply concerned about the rise in the number of opium addicts in China, tried to get help from the international community. Britain pretended to cooperate, but made no move whatsoever to abide by the 1905 protocols it had signed. Later Her Majesty's government did an about-face after showing China that it was better to join them in the opium business rather than to try and end it.

Even The Hague Convention was scoffed at by the British. Delegates to the convention had agreed that Britain must abide by the protocols it had signed, which was to drastically reduce the amount of opium sold in China and elsewhere. The British, while paying lip service, had no intention of giving up their trade in human misery, which included the so-called "pig trade."

Their servant, President George Bush, in prosecution of the cruel war of genocide waged against the Iraqi nation SOLELY for and on behalf of British interests, likewise showed his contempt by flouting the Hague Agreement on Aerial Bombardment, and a whole slew of international conventions to which the U.S. is a signatory, including ALL of the Geneva Conventions.

When evidence was produced two years later, notably by the Japanese, who were growing very concerned about British smuggling of opium into their country, that opium sales had increased instead of decreased, then Her Majesty's delegate to the Fifth Hague Convention produced a set of statistics which were at variance with those provided by Japan. The British delegate turned the tables by saying that it made a very strong case for legalizing the sale of opium which would have the effect of doing away with what he called "the black market."

He suggested on behalf of Her Majesty's government that the Japanese government would then have a monopoly and full control of the trade. THIS IS PRECISELY THE SAME ARGUMENT BEING ADVANCED BY THE FRONT MEN FOR THE BRONFMANS AND OTHER BIG-TIME DOPE DEALERS—LEGALIZE COCAINE, MARIJUANA AND HEROIN, LET THE U.S GOVERNMENT HAVE THE MONOPOLY AND THEREBY STOP WASTING BILLIONS ON THE PHONY WAR ON DRUGS AND SAVE THE TAXPAYERS BILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

In the period of 1791-1894, the number of licensed opium dens in the Shanghai International Settlement rose from 87 to 663. Opium flowing into the United States was also stepped up. Sensing that they might have some problems in China with the spotlight of world concern shining upon them, the plutocrats of the Knights of St. John and the Order of the Garter, transferred some of their attention to Persia (Iran).

Lord Inchcape, who founded the biggest steamship company in the world at the turn of the 19th century, the legendary Peninsula and Orient Steam Navigation Company, was the principal mover and shaker in establishing the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, which remains the largest and least controlled clearinghouse bank for the opium trade, which also financed the "pig trade" with the United States.

The British had set up a scam whereby Chinese "coolies" were sent to the U.S. as so-called indentured laborers. The rapacious Harriman family's railroad needed "coolies" to push the rail connection westward to the California coast, or so they said. Strangely enough, very few Negroes were given the manual labor jobs they were used to at that time and could have done a better job than the emaciated opium addicts who arrived from China.

The problem was that there was no market for opium among the Negroes and, moreover, Lord Inchcape, son of the founder of P and O needed the "coolies" to smuggle in thousands of pounds of raw opium into North America, something the Negroes could not do. It was the same Lord Inchcape who in 1923 warned that there must be no diminishing of opium poppy cultivation in Bengal. "This most important source of revenue must be safeguarded," he told the commission allegedly investigating the production of opium gum in India.

By 1846, some 120,000 "coolies" had already arrived in the U.S. to work on Harriman's railroad pushing westward. The "pig trade" was in full profitable swing because, of this number, it was estimated by the U.S. government 115,000 were opium addicts. Once the railroad was finished, the Chinese did not go back to where they came from, but settled in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Vancouver and Portland. They created a huge culture problem that has never ceased to exist.

It is interesting to note that Cecil John Rhodes, a Committee of 300 member who fronted for the Rothschilds in South Africa followed the Inchcape pattern, bringing hundreds of thousand of Indian "coolies" to work on the sugar cane plantations in Natal province. Among them was Mahatma Ghandi, a Communist agitator and troublemaker. Like the Chinese coolies, they were not returned to their country of origin once their contracts expired. They, too, went on to create a massive social program, and their descendants became lawyers who spearheaded the drive to infiltrate the government on behalf of the Africa National Congress.

By 1875 the Chinese "coolies" operating out of San Francisco had set up an opium supply ring that resulted in 129,000 American opium addicts. What with the known 115,000 Chinese addicts, Lord Inchcape and his family were raking in hundreds of thousands of dollars a year from this source alone which, in terms of today's dollar would represent at least a $100 million dollar income every year.

The very same British and American families who had combined to wreck the Indian textile industry in the promotion of the opium trade, and who brought African slaves to the U.S. combined to make the "pig trade" a valuable source of revenue. Later they were to combine to cause and promote the terrible War Between The States, also known as the American Civil War.

The decadent American families of the unholy partnership, thoroughly corrupted and wallowing in filthy lucre, went on to become what we know today as the Eastern Liberal Establishmemt whose members, under the careful guidance and direction of the Crown and subsequently its foreign policy executive arm, the Royal Institute of International Affairs (RIIA), ran this counry—and still does—from top to bottom through their secret upper-level, parallel government, which is tightly meshed with the Committee of 300, the ULTIMATE secret society.

By 1923, voices were being raised against this menace that had been allowed to be imported into the United States. Believing the United States to be a free and sovereign nation, Congressman Stephen Porter, Chairman of the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, introduced a bill which called for the British to account for their opium export-import business on a country-by-country basis. The resolution set up quotas for each country, which if observed, would have reduced the opium made by lO%. The resolution was passed into law and the bill accepted by the Congress of the United States.

But the Royal Institute of International Affairs had other ideas. Founded in 1919 in the wake of the Paris Peace Conference held at Versailles, this was one of the earliest "foreign policy" executors of the Committee of 300. Research I have done on the Congressional Records, House, show that Porter was totally unaware of the powerful forces he was up against. Porter was not even aware of the existence of the RIIA, much less that its specific purpose was to control every facet of the United States.

Apparently Congressman Porter received some kind of an intimation from the Morgan Bank on Wall Street that he should drop the whole affair. Instead, an enraged Porter took his case to the League of Nations Opium Committee. Porter's total unawareness of who he was up against is demonstrated in some of his correspondence to colleagues on the House Foreign Affairs Committee in response to open British opposition to his proposals.

Her Majesty's representative chided Porter and then, acting like a father toward an errant son, the British delegate—on instructions from the RIIA—presented Her Majesty's proposals to INCREASE opium quotas to account for an increase in the consumption of opium for medicinal purposes. According to documents that I was able to find in The Hague, Porter was at first confused, then amazed and then enraged. Joined by the Chinese delegate, Porter stormed out of the plenipotentiary session of the Committee session, leaving the field to the British.

In his absence, the British delegate got the League to rubber stamp Her Majesty's government proposals for a creation of a tame-tiger Central Narcotics Board, whose chief function was information gathering, the terms of which were purposely vague. What was to be done with the "information" was never made clear. Porter returned to the U.S. a shaken and much wiser man.

Another British intelligence asset was the fabulously rich William Bingham, into which family one of the Barings married. It was stated in papers and documents that I saw that the Baring Brothers ran the Philadelphia Quakers and owned half of the real estate of that city, all made possible because of the fortune the Baring Brothers had amassed from the China opium trade. Another beneficiary of the Committee of 300's largess was Stephen Girard, whose descendants inherited the Girard Bank and Trust.

The names of the families, whose history is intertwined with that of Boston and who would never give us ordinary folk the time of day, were wrapped in the arms of the Committee of 300 and its vastly lucrative BEIC China opium trade. Many of the famous families became associated with the notorious Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank which is still the clearing house for billions of dollars that flow from the opium trade in China.

Such famous names as Forbes, Perkins and Hathaway appear in the records of the British East India Company. These genuine American "bluebloods" created Russell and Company, whose main trade was in opium, but also ran other shipping enterprises from China to South America and all points in between. As a reward for their services to the British Crown and the BEIC, the Committee of 300 granted them a monopoly in the slave trade in 1833.

Boston owes its celebrated past to the cotton-opium-slave trade granted to it by the Committee of 300 and it is stated in the records I was privileged to see in London that Boston's merchant families were the chief supporters of the British Crown in the United States. John Murray Forbes is mentioned as the majordomo of the "Boston Blue Bloods" in India House records and in bank records in Hong Kong.

Forbe's son was the first American allowed by the Committee of 300 to sit on the board of the most prestigious drug bank in the world—even today—the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. When I was in Hong Kong in the early 1960's as "an historian interested in the British East India Company," I was shown some old records, including past board members of this notorious drug bank, and sure enough, Forbes' name was among them.

The Perkins family, so illustrious that their name is still mentioned in awed whispers, were deeply involved in the nefarious filthy China opium trade. In fact Perkins the elder was one of the first Americans to be elected to the Committee of 3OO. His son, Thomas Nelson, was Morgan's man in Boston, and as such also an agent for British intelligence. His unsavory-I would say disgusting—past was not in question when he richly endowed Harvard University. After all, Canton and Tientsin are a long way from Boston, and who would have cared anyway?

What helped The Perkinses a lot was that Morgan was a powerful member of the Committee of 300, which enabled Thomas N. Perkins to rapidly further his career in the China opium trade. All the Morgans and Perkinses were Freemasons, which was another tie that bound them together, for only Freemasons of highest rank have any hope of being selected by the Committee of 300. Sir Robert Hart, who for almost three decades was chief of the Imperial Chinese Customs Service (read the British Crown's number one agent in the opium trade in China was subsequently appointed to the board of Morgan Guarantee Bank's Far Eastern Division.

Through access to the historical records in London and Hong Kong, I was able to establish that Sir Robert developed an intimate relationship with Morgan operations in the United States. It is worthy of note that Morgan interests in the opium/ heroin trade have continued in an unbroken line; witness the fact that David Newbigging is on the advisory board of Morgan's Hong Kong operation run in conjunction with Jardine Matheson.

To those who know Hong Kong, the name of Newbigging will be familiar as the most powerful name in Hong Kong. In addition to his membership of Morgan's elite bank, Newbigging doubles as an advisor to the Chinese government. Opium for missile technology, opium for gold, opium for high-tech computers—it is all the same to Newbigging. The way these banks financial houses, trading companies and the families who run them are intertwined would perplex Sherlock Holmes, yet somehow they must be unraveled and followed if we are to understand their connections with the drug trade and their membership in the Committee of 300.

The two-track entry into the United States of alcohol and drugs were products of the same stable occupied by the same thoroughbreds. First, prohibition had to be introduced into the United States. This was done by the British East India Company heirs who, acting upon experience gained through the welldocumented China Inland Mission records found in India House, set up the Women's Christian Temperance Union, supposedly to oppose consumption of alcohol in America.

We say that history repeats itself, and in a sense, this is true. except that it repeats itself in an ever-upward spiral. Today we find that some of the largest companies, allegedly "polluting" the earth, are the largest contributors of funds to the environmentalist movement. The "big names" send forth their message. Prince Philip is one of their heroes, yet his son Prince Charles owns a million acres of forested land in Wales from which timber is regularly harvested and, in addition, Prince Charles is one of the largest owners of slum housing in London, where pollution thrives.

In the case of those who railed against the "evils of drink," we find they were financed by the Astors, the Rockefellers, the Spelmans, the Vanderbilts and the Warburgs who had a vested interest in the liquor trade. On the instructions of the Crown, Lord Beaverbrook came over from England to tell these wealthy American families that they were to invest in the WCTU. (It was the same Lord Beaverbrook who came to Washington in 1940 and ORDERED Roosevelt to get involved in Britain's war.)

Roosevelt complied by stationing a U.S. Navy flotilla in Greenland that spent the 9 months prior to Pearl Harbor hunting and attacking German U-Boats. Like his successor, George Bush, Roosevelt thought the Congress a confounded nuisance so, acting like a king-sense he felt strongly since he is related to the British royal family—FDR never sought the permission of Congress for his illegal action. This is what the British are most fond of referring to as their "special relationship with America."

The drug trade has a connection with the murder of President John F. Kennedy, which foul deed stains the national character and will continue to do so until the perpetrators are found and brought to justice. There is proof that the Mafia was involved in this through the CIA, which brings to mind that it all started with the old Meyer Lansky network which evolved into the Irgun terrorist organization, and Lansky proved to be one of the best vehicles for peddling cultural warfare against the West.

Lansky was, through more respectable fronts, associated with the British higher-ups in bringing gambling and dope distribution to Paradise Island in the Bahamas under the cover of The Mary Carter Paint Company—a joint Lansky-British M16 venture. Lord Sassoon was later murdered because he was skimming money and was threatening to blow the whistle if he was punished. Ray Wolfe was more presentable, representing the Bronfmans of Canada. While the Bronfmans were not privy to Churchill's massive Nova Scotia Project, they were and still are nevertheless an important asset of the British royal family in the business of dope peddling.

Sam Rothberg, close associate of Meyer Lansky, also worked with Tibor Rosenbaum and Pinchas Sapir, all king pins in the Lansky drug ring. Rosenbaum ran a drug money laundering operation out of Switzerland through a bank he established for this purpose; Banque du Credite International. The bank quickly expanded its activities and became the principal bank used by Lansky and his mobster associates for laundering money garnered from prostitution, drugs and other Mafia rackets.

It is worthy of note that Tibor Rosenbaum's bank was used by the shadowy chief of British Intelligence, Sir William Stephenson, whose right hand man, Major John Mortimer Bloomfield, a Canadian citizen, ran Division Five of the FBI throughout the Second World War. Stephenson was an early member of the 2Oth century Committee of 300, although Bloomfield never made it that far. As I revealed in my series of monographs on the Kennedy assassination, it was Stephenson who master-minded the operation which was run as a hands-on project by Bloomfield. Fronting for the Kennedy assassination was done through another drug-related front, Permanent Industrial Expositions (PERMINDEX), created in 1957 and centered in the World Trade Mart building in downtown New Orleans.

Bloomfield just happened to be the attorney for the Bronfman family. The World Trade Mart was created by Colonel Clay Shaw and FBI Division Five station chief in New Orleans, Guy Bannister. Shaw and Bannister were close associates of Lee Harvey Oswald, accused of shooting Kennedy, who was murdered by CIA contract agent Jack Ruby before he could prove that he was not the assassin who shot President Kennedy. In spite of the Warren Commission and numerous official reports, it has NEVER been established that Oswald owned the Mannlicher rifle said to be the murder weapon (it was not) nor that he had ever fired it. The connection between the drug trade, Shaw, Bannister and Bloomfield has been established several times, and need not concern us here.

In the immediate post-WW II period, one of the most common methods used by Resorts International and other drug related companies to clean money was by courier service to a money laundering bank. Now all that has changed. Only the small fry still use such a risky method. The "big fish" conduit their money via the CHIPS system, an acronym for Clearing House International Payments System, run by a Burroughs computer system centered at the New York Clearing House. Twelve of the largest banks use this system. One of them is the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. Another is Credite Suisse, that oh so respectable paragon of virtue in banking—until the lid is lifted. Combined with the SWIFT system based in Virginia, dirty drug money becomes invisible. Only wanton carelessness results in the FBI getting lucky now and then, if and when it is told not to look the other way.

Only low echelon drug dealers get caught with drug money in their hands. The elite, Drexel Burnham, Credite Suisse, Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, escape detection. But this, too, is changing with the collapse of Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) which is likely to expose a great deal about the drug trade if ever a proper investigation is carried out.

One of the largest assets in the portfolio of the Committee of 300 companies is American Express (AMEX). Its presidents regularly occupy positions on the Committee of 300. I first got interested in Amex when I was carrying out an on-the-spot investigation that led me to the Trade Development Bank in Geneva. Later, this got me into a lot of trouble. I discovered that Trade Development Bank, then run by Edmund Safra, key man in the gold for opium trade, was supplying tons of gold to the Hong Kong market via Trade Development Bank.

Before going to Switzerland, I went to Pretoria, South Africa, where I talked with Dr. Chris Stals, at that time the deputy governor of the South African Reserve Bank which controls all bulk dealings in South African-produced gold. After several discussions over a period of a week, I was told that the bank could not supply me with the ten tons of gold that I was authorized to buy on behalf of clients I was supposed to be representing. My friends in the right places knew how to produce the documentation which passed without question.

The Reserve Bank referred me to a Swiss company whom I cannot name, because it would blow cover. I was also given the address of Trade Development Bank in Geneva. The purpose of my exercise was to find out the mechanics of how gold is moved and traded, and secondly to test bogus documents which had been prepared for me by ex-intelligence friends of mine who specialized in this kind of thing. Remember "M" in the "James Bond" series? Let me assure you that "M" does exist, only his correct initial is "C." The documents I had consisted of "buying orders" from Liechtenstein companies with supporting papers to match.

On approaching Trade Development Bank I was at first greeted cordially but, as discussions progressed with more and more suspicion until, when I felt it was no longer safe for me to visit the bank, without telling anyone at the bank I left Geneva. Later the bank was sold to American Express. American Express was briefly investigated by former Attorney General Edwin Meese, after which he was quickly removed from office and labeled "corrupt." What I found was that American Express was and still is a conduit for laundering drug money and, thus far, no one has been able to explain to me why a private company has the right to print dollars—aren't American Express travelers checks dollars? I subsequently exposed the Safra-Amex drug connections which upset a lot of people, as can be imagined.

Committee of 300 member Japhet controls Charterhouse Japhet, which in turn controls Jardine Matheson as a direct link to the Hong Kong opium trade. The Japhets are reportedly English Quakers. The Matheson family, also members of the Committee of 300, were kingpins in the China opium trade, at least up until 1943. The Mathesons have appeared in the Queen of England Honors List since the early 19th century.

The top controllers of the drug trade in the Committee of 300 have no conscience about the millions of lives they ruin each year. They are Gnostics, Cathars, members of the cult of Dionysus, Osiris, or worse. To them, "ordinary" people are there to be used for their purposes. Their high-priests, Bulwer-Lytton and Aldous Huxley, preached the gospel of drugs as a beneficial substance. To quote Huxley:

"And for private everyday use, there have always been chemical intoxicants. All the vegetable sedatives and narcotics, all the euphorics that grow on trees, the hallucinogens that ripen in berries, have been used by humans since time immemorial. And to these modifiers of conscience, modern science has added its quota of synthetics. For unrestricted use the West has permitted only alcohol and tobacco. All other chemical Doors in the Wall are labeled DOPE."

To the oligarches and plutocrats of the Committee of 300, drugs have a two-fold purpose, firstly to bring in colossal sums of money and secondly, to eventually turn a major part of the population into mindless drug zombies who will be easier to control than people who don't need drugs, as punishment for rebellion will mean withholding of supplies of heroin, cocaine, marijuana, etc. For this it is necessary to legalize drugs so that a MONOPOLY SYSTEM, which has been readied for introduction once severe economic conditions, of which the 1991 depression is the forerunner, cause drug usage to proliferate as hundreds of thousands of permanently jobless workers turn to drugs for solace.

In one of the Royal Institute of International Affairs top secret papers, the scenario is laid out as follows (in part):

"...having been failed by Christianity, and with unemployment on every hand, those who have been without jobs for five years or more will turn away from the church and seek solace in drugs. That is when full control of the drug trade must be completed in order that the governments of all countries who are under our jurisdiction will have a MONOPOLY which we will control through supply.... Drug bars will take care of the unruly and the discontent, would be revolutionaries will be turned into harmless addicts with no will of their own...."

There is ample evidence that the CIA and British intelligence, specially M16, have already spent at least a decade working toward this goal.

The Royal Institute of International Affairs used the life-time work of Aldous Huxley and Bulwer-Lytton as its blueprint to bring about a state where mankind will no longer have wills of their own in the One World Government-New World Order of the fast-approaching New Dark Age. Again, let us see what high priest Aldous Huxley had to say about this:

"In many societies at many levels of civilization, attempts have been made to fuse drug intoxication with God intoxication. In ancient Greece, for example, ethyl alcohol had its place in the established religions. Dionysus, Bacchus, as he was often called, was a true divinity. Complete prohibition of chemical changes can be decreed but cannot be enforced. (THE LANGUAGE OF THE PRO-DRUG LOBBY ON CAPITOL HILL.)

"Now let us consider another type of drug—still undis covered, but probably just around the corner—a drug making people happy in situations where they would normally feel miserable. (Is there anyone more miserable than a person who has sought and been unable to find work?) Such a drug would be a blessing, but a blessing fraught with grave social and political dangers. By making a harmless chemical euphoria freely available, a dictator (read Committee of 300) could reconcile an entire population to a state of affairs to which self-respecting human beings ought not to be reconciled."

Quite a dialectical masterpiece. What Huxley was advocating and which is official policy of the Committee of 300 and its surrogate, RIIA, can be quite simply stated as mass mind control. As I have often said, all wars are wars for the souls of mankind. Thus far it has not dawned on us that the drug trade is irregular low-intensity warfare against the whole human race of free men. Irregular warfare is the most terrible form of warfare which, while it has a beginning, has no ending.

Some will question the involvement of the British royal families, past and present, in the drug trade. To see it in print appears on the surface to be preposterous, and it is being seen in print more often these days to make it appear exactly that, preposterous. The oldest maxim in the intelligence business is, "If you want to hide something, put it where everyone can see it.

F. S. Turner's book, "BRITISH OPIUM POLICY," published in 1876, shows how the British monarchy and its hangers-on family relatives were deeply involved in the opium trade. Turner was the secretary of the Anglo Oriental Society of the Suppression of the Opium Trade. He declined to be silenced by Crown spokesperson Sir R. Temple. Turner stated that the government, and therefore the Crown, had to withdraw from the opium monopoly, "and if it takes any revenues at all, take only that which accrues from taxation honestly meant to have a restrictive force. "

Turner was answered by a spokesman for the monarchy, Lord Lawrence, who fought against the BEIC losing its monopoly. "It would be desirable to get rid of the monopoly, but I myself am disinclined to be the agent of change. If it is question of moderate loss that we could afford, I would not hesitate to undertake it." (Taken from the Calcutta Papers 1870.)

By 1874 the war against the British monarchy and the aristocracy over its deep involvement in the China opium trade was getting heated. The Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade violently assailed the aristocracy of the day and pressed home its attacks in a fearless manner we would do well to emulate. The society said that the Treaty of Tientsin, which Forced China to accept the importation of enormous amounts of opium, was a dastardly crime against the Chinese people.

There arose a mighty warrior, Joseph Grundy Alexander, a barrister by profession who, in 1866, led a strong attack on British Crown opium policy in China in which he openly mentioned the involvement of the royal family and the aristocracy. For the first time Alexander brought India, "the Jewel in the Crown," into the picture. He laid the blame squarely where it belonged, on the monarchy, the so-called aristocracy and its servants in the British government.

Under the direction of Alexander, the society committed itself to the total destruction of the cultivation of opium poppies in Bengal, India. Alexander proved to be a doughty opponent. Through his leadership, the drug aristocracy began to falter and, in the face of his open denouncements of the royal family and its hangers-on, several Members of Parliament began siding with him Conservatives, Unionists, Labor. Alexander made it clear that the drug trade was not a party political issue; it was for all parties to join together in helping to eradicate the menace.

Lord Kimberly, spokesman for the royal family and the entrenched oligarchists, threatened that any attempts to interfere with what he called "the commerce of the nation will run into serious opposition from the cabinet." Alexander and his society pressed on in the face of innumerable threats and finally parliament agreed to appoint a Royal Commission to enquire into the opium trade, with Lord Kimberly, who was Secretary of India, as its chairman. A more inappropriate person to head the commission could not have been found. It was akin to Dulles being appointed to the Warren Commission.

In his first statement, Lord Kimberly made it clear that he would rather resign from his august position than consent to a resolution that would surrender Indian Opium Revenues. It is worthy of note that "Indian Opium Revenue" implied money shared by the nation. Like the idea that the people of South Africa share in the enormous profits from the sale of gold and diamonds, this was just not the case. Indian opium revenues went straight into the royal coffers and the pockets of the nobility and the oligarchists and plutocrats, and made them billionaires.

Rowntree's book, "THE IMPERIAL DRUG TRADE" gives a fascinating account of how Prime Minister Gladstone and his fellow plutocrats lied, cheated, twisted and turned to keep the astonishing truth of the involvement of the British monarchy in the opium trade from being exposed. Rowntree's book is a treasure house of information on the deep involvement of the British royal family and the lords and ladies of England and the huge fortunes they accumulated from the misery of the Chinese opium addicts.

Lord Kimberly, secretary of the commission of inquiry, was himself deeply involved in the opium trade so he did everything in his power to close the proceedings to all who sought the truth. Finally, under a great deal of pressure from the public, the Royal Commission was forced to open the door to this inquiry just a crack, so that it became apparent that the highest in the land were running the opium trade and receiving huge benefits from it. But the door was quickly slammed shut again, and the Royal Commission called no expert witnesses, thereafter sitting for an absurdly short period of time. The commission was nothing but a farce and a cover-up, such as we have become accustomed to in 20th century America.

The Eastern Liberal Establishment families of the United States were just as deeply involved in the China opium trade as were the British, indeed they still are. Witness recent history when James Earl Carter toppled the Shah of Iran. Why was the Shah deposed and then murdered by the United States government? fn a word, because of DRUGS. The Shah had clamped down and virtually put an end to the immensely lucrative opium trade being conducted out of Iran by the British. At the time that the Shah took over in Iran, there were already one million opium/heroin addicts.

This the British would not tolerate, so they sent the United States to do their dirty work for them in terms of the "special relationship" between the two countries. When Khomeini took over the U.S. Embassy in Teheran, arms sales by the United States, which had begun with the Shah, were not discontinued. Why not? Had the United States done so, Khomeini would have canceled the British monopoly of the opium trade in his country. To prove the point, after 1984, Khomeini's liberal attitude toward opium had increased the number of addicts to 2 million, according to United Nations and World Health Organization statistics.

Both President Carter and his successor, Ronald Reagan, willingly and with full knowledge of what was at stake, went on supplying arms to Iran even while American hostages languished in captivity. In 1980 I wrote a monograph under the title, "What Really Happened in Iran," which set out the facts. The arms trade with Iran was sealed at a meeting between Cyrus Vance, a servant of the Committee of 300, and Dr. Hashemi, which resulted in the U.S. Air Force beginning an immediate airlift of arms to Iran, carried on even at the height of the hostage crisis the arms came from U.S. Army stockpiles in Germany and some were even flown directly from the United States with refueling stops at the Azores.

With the advent of Khomeini, who was put in power in Iran by the Committee of 300, opium production skyrocketed. By 1984 Iran's opium production exceeded 650 metric tons of opium per annum. What Carter and Reagan did was ensure that there was no further interference in the opium trade and they carried out the mandate given to them by the oligarchical families in Britain in this connection. Iran presently rivals the Golden Triangle in the volume of opium produced.

The Shah was not the only victim of the Committee of 300 William Buckley, CIA station chief in Beirut, in all his lack of experience on who is behind the opium trade, began conducting investigations in Iran, Lebanon and even spent time in Pakistan. From Islamabad, Buckley began sending back damning reports to the CIA in Langley about the burgeoning opium trade in the Golden Crescent and Pakistan. The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad was firebombed, but Buckley escaped the mob attack and returned to Washington because his cover was blown by forces unknown.

Then a very strange thing happened. Contrary to all procedures laid down by the CIA when an agent's cover has been blown, Buckley was sent back to Beirut. Buckley was in effect sentenced to death by the CIA in order to silence him, and this time the sentence was carried out. William Buckley was kidnaped by agents of the Committee of 300. Under brutal interrogation by General Mohammed el Khouili of Syrian intelligence to force him to disclose the names of all field officers of the DEA in these countries, he was brutally murdered. His efforts to expose the huge opium trade developing out of Pakistan, Lebanon and Iran cost Buckley his life.

If the remaining free men in this world believe that singlehandedly or in small groups they can smash the drug trade, they are sorely mistaken. They could cut off the tentacles of the opium and cocaine trade here and there, but never the head. The crowned cobras of Europe and their Eastern Liberal Establishment family will not tolerate it. The war on drugs which the Bush administration is allegedly fighting, but which it is not, is for TOTAL legalization of ALL types and classes of drugs. Such drugs are not solely a social aberration, but a fullscale attempt to gain control of the minds of the people of this planet, or as the "Aquarian Conspiracy" authors put it, "to bring about radical changes in the United States." THIS IS THE PRINCIPAL TASK OF THE COMMITTEE OF 300, THE ULTIMATE SECRET SOCIETY.

Nothing has changed in the opium-heroin-cocaine trade. It is still run by the same "upper class" families in Britain and the United States. It is still a fabulously profitable trade where what seem to be big losses through seizures by the authorities are written off in paneled boardrooms in New York, Hong Kong and London over port and cigars as "merely the cost of doing business, old boy."

British colonial capitalism has always been the mainstay of the oligarchical feudal system of privilege in England and remains so to the present day. When the poor, untutored pastoral people in South Africa who became known as the Boers fell into the bloodstained hands of the British aristocracy in 1899, they had no idea that the revoltingly cruel war so relentlessly pursued by Queen Victoria, was financed by the incredible amounts of money which came from the "instant fortunes" of the BEIC opium trade in China into the pockets of the plutocrats.

Committee of 300 members Cecil John Rhodes, Barney Barnato and Alfred Beit instigated and engineered the war. Rhodes was the principle agent for the Rothschilds, whose banks were awash in cash flowing from the opium trade. These robbers, thieves and liars—Rhodes, Barnato, Oppenheimer, Joel and Beit—dispossessed the South African Boers of their birthright, the gold and diamonds that lay beneath their soil. The South African Boers received nothing out of the BILLIONS UPON BILLIONS of dollars derived from the sale of THEIR gold and diamonds.

The Committee of 300 quickly took full control of these vast treasures, control which it even now maintains through one of its members, Sir Harry Oppenheimer. The average South African receives $100 per annum per capita from the gold and diamond industry. The BILLIONS which flow out annually go to the bankers of the Committee of 300. It is one of the most foul and vile stories of greed, theft and the murder of a nation ever recorded in the annals of history.

How could the British Crown have succeeded in pulling off this stunning fraud of gigantic proportion? To accomplish such a Herculean task requires skilled organizing with devoted agentsin-place to carry out the daily instructions passed down from the conspirators' hierarchy. The first step was a press propaganda campaign portraying the Boers as uncivilized barbarians, only slightly human, who were denying British citizens the right to vote in the Boer Republic. Then, demands were made on Paul Kruger, leader of the Transvaal Republic, which of course could not be met. After that, a series of incidents were staged to provoke the Boers into retaliation, but that didn't work either. Then came the infamous Jameson Raid where a certain Jameson led a party of several hundred armed men in an attack on the transvaal. War followed immediately thereafter.

Queen Victoria mounted the largest and best equipped army that the world had ever seen at that time (1898). Victoria thought he war would be over in two weeks, since the Boers had no standing army and no trained militia and would be no match for her 400,000 soldiers drawn from the ranks of Britain's underclasses. The Boers never numbered more than 80,000 farmers and their sons—some were as young as fourteen-Rudyard Kipling also thought the war would be over in less than a week.

Instead, with rifle in one hand and the Bible in the other, the Boers held out for three years. "We went to South Africa thinking the war would be over in a week," said Kipling. "Instead, the Boers taught us no end of a lesson." That same "lesson" could be taught to the Committee of 300 today if we could but muster 10,000 leaders, good men and true to lead this nation in battle against the gargantuan monster threatening to devour everything our Constitution stands for.

After the war ended in 1902, the British Crown had to consolidate its grip on the unimaginable fortune of gold and diamonds that lay beneath the barren veldt of the Boer Republics of Transvaal and Orange Free State. This was done through the Round Table of the legend of King Arthur and his Knights. The Round Table is strictly a British M16 intelligence operation established by the Committee of 300 which, together with the Rhodes Scholarship program, is a dagger in the heartland of America.

The Round Table was established in South Africa by Cecil Rhodes and funded by the English Rothschild family. Its purpose was to train business leaders loyal to the British Crown who would secure the vast gold and diamond treasures for the British Crown. South Africans had their birthright stolen from them in a coup so massive and all pervading that it was apparent only a central unified command could have pulled it off. That unified command was the Committee of 300.

That this was accomplished is not in dispute. By the early 1930's, the British Crown had a stranglehold on the biggest supplies of gold and diamonds ever found in the world. NOW THE COMMITTEE OF 300 HAD AT ITS DISPOSAL BOTH THE VAST FORTUNE COMING FROM THE DRUG TRADE AND THE EQUALLY VAST FORTUNE OF THE MINERAL AND METAL WEALTH OF SOUTH AFRICA. Financial control of the world was complete.

The Round Table played a pivotal role in the coup. The express purpose of the Round Table, after swallowing up South Africa, was to blunt the benefits to the United States of the American War of Independence, and once more bring the United States under British control. Organizing ability was essential for such an enterprise and it was provided by Lord Alfred Milner, protege of the London Rothschild family. Using Scottish Rite Freemason principles in selecting members of Round Table, chose chosen underwent a period of intense training at Cambridge and Oxford Universities under the watchful eyes of John Ruskin, a self-confessed "old school communist," and T. H. Green, an operative of M16.

It was Green, the son of a Christian evangelical cleric, who spawned Rhodes, Milner, John Wheeler Bennet, A. D. Lindsay, George Bernard Shaw and Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's finance minister. I pause here to remind readers that the Round Table is only ONE SECTOR of this vast and all-encompassing Committee of 300. Yet the Round Table itself consists of a maze of companies, institutions, banks and educational establishments, which in itself would take qualified insurance actuaries a year to sort out.

Round Tablers fanned out throughout the world to take control of fiscal and monetary policies and political leadership in all countries where they operated. In South Africa, General Smuts, who had fought against the British in the Boer War, was "turned" and became a leading British intelligence, military and political agent who espoused the cause of the British Crown. In the United States, in later years, the task of boring away at the United States from the inside fell to William Yandell Elliot, the man who spawned Henry Kissinger and who was responsible for his meteoric rise to power as chief U.S. advisor to the Committee of 300.

William Yandell Elliot was "an American at Oxford," who had already served the Committee of 300 well, which is a prerequisite for higher office in the service of the committee. After graduating from Vanderbilt University in 1917, Elliot was drafted by the Rothschild-Warburg banking network. He worked at the Federal Reserve Bank in San Francisco and rose to be a director. From there he acted as a Warburg-Rothschild intelligence officer, reporting on the important areas of the United States he was overseeing. Elliot's "Freemason" talent spotters recommended him for a Rhodes Scholarship and, in 1923, he went to Balliol College at Oxford University whose "dreaming spires" hid a network of intrigue and future traitors to the West.

Balliol College was, and still is, the center of recruiting for the Round Table. After a thorough brainwashing conducted by the Tavistock Institute of Human Relations representative, A.D. Lindsay, who had succeeded Master of Balliol T. H. Green, Elliot was received into the Round Table and sent to The Royal Institute of International Affairs to be given his assignment, which was that he return to the United States to become a leader in the academic community.

The Round Table's driving philosophy was to have Round Tablers in positions to formulate and carry out social policies through social institutions whereby what Ruskin called "the masses" could be manipulated. Members infiltrated the highest levels of banking after under going a course at the Tavistock Institute. The course was drawn up by Lord Leconsfield, an intimate of the British royal family, and later run by Robert Brand who went on to manage Lazard Freres. The Royal Institute of International Affairs was and remains totally interfaced with the British monarchy.

Some of the spinoffs of the Round Table are the Bilderbergers, set up and run by Duncan Sandys, a prominent politician and son-in-law of the late Winston Churchill, the Ditchley Foundation, a secret banker's club which I exposed in my 1983 work, "International Banker's Conspiracy: The Ditchley Foundation," the Trilateral Commission, the Atlantic Council of the United States and the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, whose well-hidden, behind the scenes founder was Lord Bullock of the RIIA for whom Robert Anderson fronted.

The way in which Henry Kissinger, the RllA's chief asset in the United States, came to power is a story of the triumph of the institution of the British monarchy over the Republic of the United States of America. It is a tale of horror, too long to be included here. Nevertheless, it would be remiss of me if I did not mention just a few of the highlights of Kissinger's rise to fame, fortune and power.

After a stint in the United States Army, beginning with the job of driving General Fritz Kraemer around war-torn Germany, thanks to the Oppenheimer family Kissinger was picked to attend Wilton Park for further training. At the time he held the rank of private first class. In 1952 Kissinger was sent to the Tavistock Institute where R. V. Dicks took him in hand and turned him inside out. Thereafter there was no holding Kissinger back. He was later drafted to serve under George Franklin and Hamilton Fish of the Council on Foreign Relations' New York office.

It is believed that the official nuclear policy adopted by the United States was delivered to Kissinger during his stay at Tavistock and further shaped by his participation in "Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy," a Round Table seminar which brought forth the doctrine known as "flexible response," a total irrationality, which became known by the acronym MAD.

Thanks to William Yandell Elliot and under the tutelage of John Wheeler Bennett, top intelligence director of the Round Table and chief of MI6 field operations in the United States, Kissinger became Elliot's "favorite son" as he explained in his book, "The Pragmatic Revolt in Politics." Kissinger was coopted into the Round Table to push monetarist policies he studied at Harvard International Seminars.

Kissinger avidly absorbed Elliot's teachings and was no longer recognizable as the man General Kraemer once described as "my little Jew-boy driver." Kissinger was inculcated with the spirit of the Master of Balliol, becoming an ardent disciple of decadent British aristocracy. Adopting the philosophies of Toynbee, chief intelligence director for MI6 at the Royal Institute of International Affairs, Kissinger used its papers to write his undergraduate "dissertation."

By the mid 1960's Kissinger had proved his worth to the Round Table and the RIIA, and thus to the British monarchy. As a reward and a test of what he had learned, Kissinger was placed in charge of a small group consisting of James Schlessinger, Alexander Haig and Daniel Ellsberg. The Round Table was using to conduct a series of experiments. Cooperating with this group was the Institute of Policy Studies chief theoretician Noam Chomsky.

Haig, like Kissinger, worked for General Kraemer, albeit not as a driver, and the general found a number of varied openings in the Department of Defense for his protege. Once Kissinger was installed as National Security Advisor, Kraemer got Haig the job as his deputy. Ellsberg, Haig, and Kissinger then set in motion the RIIA's Watergate plan to oust President Nixon for disobeying direct instructions. Haig played the lead role in brainwashing and confusing President Nixon, and in effect it was Kissinger who ran the White House during this softening up of the President. As I mentioned in 1984, Haig was the White House go-between known as "Deep Throat," passing information to the Washington Post team of Woodward and Bernstein.

The Watergating of Nixon was the biggest coup yet pulled off by the Round Table as an agency and an arm of the RIIA. All the tangled threads led back to the Round Table; from there to the RIIA, and right back to the Queen of England. The humiliation of Nixon was an object lesson and a warning to future Presidents of the United States not to imagine they could go against the Committee of 300 and win. Kennedy was brutally murdered in full view of the American people for the same reason; Nixon was not considered worthy enough to suffer the same fate as John F. Kennedy.

But whatever the method used, the Committee of 300 made sure that all would-be aspirants for the White House got the message: "Nobody is beyond our reach." That this message remains just as forceful as it was when Kennedy was murdered and Nixon hounded out of office, is evidenced by the character of President George Bush, whose eagerness to please his masters should be cause for grave concern among those who worry about the future of the United States.

The purpose of the exercise was made clear in the Pentagon Papers episode and the drafting of Schlessinger into the Nixon Administration to act as a spoiler in the defense establishment and a counterforce to the development of atomic energy, which role Schlessinger carried out from the shelter of his position in the Atomic Energy Commission, one of the key factors in deindustrializing the United States in the planned Club of Rome Post Industrial-Zero-growth strategies. From this beginning we can trace the roots of the 1991 recession/depression which has thus far cost the jobs of 30 million Americans.

It is virtually impossible to penetrate the Committee of 300 and the oligarchical families that go to make it up. The camouflage they pull over themselves as protective covering is very hard to rip off. This fact should be noted by every freedom-loving American: The Committee of 300 dictates what passes for United States foreign and domestic policies and has done so for over 200 years. Nowhere was this more strikingly portrayed than when a cocky President Truman had the wind knocked out of him by Churchill ramrodding the so-called "Truman Doctrine" down the throat of the little man from Independence, Missouri.

Some of their former members, whose descendants filled vacancies caused by death, and present members include Sir Mark Turner, Gerald Villiers, Samuel Montague, the Inchcapes, Keswicks, Peases, Schroeders, Airlies, Churchills, Frasers, Lazars and Jardine Mathesons. The full list of members is presented elsewhere in this book; these people on the Committee ORDERED President Wilson to go to war against Germany in the First World War; this Committee ordered Roosevelt to engineer the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor with the object of getting the United States into the Second World War.

These people, this Committee, ordered this nation to war in Korea, Vietnam and the Persian Gulf. The plain truth is that the United States has fought in 5 wars this century for and on behalf of the infamous Committee of 300. It seems that, apart from just a few, no one has stopped to ask, "WHY ARE WE FIGHTING THESE WARS?" The big drum of "patriotism," martial music and waving flags and yellow ribbons, it seems, caused a great nation to become bereft of its senses.

On the 50th anniversary of Pearl Harbor, a new "hate Japan" campaign is being waged, not by the Institute of Pacific Relations (IPR), but in the most direct and brazen manner by the Bush Administration and the Congress. The object is the same as it was when Roosevelt inspired the attack on Pearl Harbor, paint the Japanese as aggressors and wage economic war, then ready our forces for the next phase—armed aggression against Japan.

This is already in the works; it is only a matter of time before more of our sons and daughters are sent off to be slaughtered in the service of the feudal lords of the Committee of 300. We ought to shout from the housetops, "It is not for freedom nor for love of country that we are going to die, but for a system of tyranny that will shortly envelope the entire world."

So tight is the grip of this organization on Britain that 95% of British citizens have, since the 1700's, been forced to accept as their share, less than 20% of the national wealth of the country. This is what the oligarchical feudal lords of England like to call "democracy." These nice, proper English gentlemen are, in reality, utterly ruthless—what they did in India, Sudan, Egypt, Iraq, Iran and Turkey will be repeated in every country under the New World Order-One World Government. They will use every nation and its wealth to protect their privileged way of life. It is this class of British aristocracy whose fortunes are inextricably woven and intertwined with the drug trade, the gold, diamond and arms trades, banking, commerce and industry, oil, the news media and entertainment industry.

Apart from the rank and file of the Labour Party (but not its leaders), the majority of British political leaders are descendants of titled families, the titles being hereditary and handed down from father to eldest son. This system ensures that no "outsideers" aspire to political power in England. Nevertheless, some aliens have been able to squeeze their way in.

Take the case of Lord Halifax, former British Ambassador to Washington and the man who delivered Committee of 300 orders to our government during the Second World War. Halifax's son, Charles Wood, married a Miss Primrose, a blood relative of Lord Rothschild. Behind such names as Lord Swaythling is hidden the name of Montague, director of the Bank of England and adviser and confidant of the majority stockholder of the Shell Oil Company, Queen Elizabeth II. All are members of the Committee of 300.

Some of the old barriers have been broken down. Title is today not the only criteria for admission to the Club of Rome.

It is appropriate to provide an overview of what the Committee of 300 hopes to achieve, what its aims and objectives are before we proceed to its vast, far flung interlocking interfacing of banks, insurance companies, corporations, etc. The following information has taken years of investigative research to put together from hundreds of documents and sources of mine who gave me access to some of the papers in which the details are hidden.

The Committee of 300 consists of certain individuals specialists in their own fields, including cultus diabolicus, mind altering drugs, and specialists in murder by poison, intelligence; banking, and every facet of commercial activity. It will be necessary to mention former members since deceased, because of their former roles and because their places were given to family members of new members considered worthy of the honor.

Included in the membership are the old families of the European Black Nobility, the American Eastern Liberal Establishment (in Freemason hierarchy and the Order of Skull and Bone), the Illuminati, or as it is known by the Committee "MORIAH CONQUERING WIND," the Mumma Group, The National and World Council of Churches, the Circle of Initiates, the Nine Unknown Men, Lucis Trust, Jesuit Liberation Theologists, The Order of the Elders of Zion, the Nasi Princes, International Monetary Fund (IMF), the Bank of International Settlements (BIS), the United Nations (U.N.), the Central, British Quator Coronati, Italian P2 Masonry—especially those in the Vatican hierarchy—the Central Intelligence Agency, Tavistock Institute selected personnel, various members of leading foundations and insurance companies named in the lists that follow, the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, the Milner Group-Round Table, Cini Foundation, German Marshall Fund, Ditchley Foundation, NATO, Club of Rome, Environmentalists, The Order of St. John of Jerusalem, One World Government Church, Socialist International, Black Order, Thule Society, Anenherbe-Rosicrucianists, The Great Superior Ones and literally HUNDREDS of other organizations.

What then are we looking at? A loosely-knit gathering of people with weird ideas? Certainly not. In the Committee of 300, which has a 150-year history, we have some of the most brilliant intellects assembled to form a completely totalitarian, absolutely controlled "new" society only it isn't new, having drawn most of its ideas from the Clubs of Cultus Diabolicus. It strives toward a One World Government rather well described by one of its late members, H. G. Wells, in his work commissioned by the Committee which Wells boldly called: "THE OPEN CONSPIRACY-PLANS FOR A WORLD REVOLUTION."

It was a bold statement of intent, but not really so bold since nobody believed Wells except the Great Superior Ones, the Anenherbes and those who were what we would call "insiders" today. Here is an extract of what Wells proposed:

"The Open Conspiracy will appear first, I believe as a conscious organization of intelligent, and in some cases wealthy men, as a movement having distinct social and political aims, confessedly ignoring most of the existing apparatus of political control, or using it only as an incidental implement in the stages, a mere movement of a number of people in a certain direction, who will presently discover, with a sort of a surprise, the common object toward which they are all moving. In all sorts of ways, they will be influencing and controlling the ostensible government."

Like George Orwell's 1984, Wells'account is a mass-appeal for a One World Government. Summarized, the intent and purpose of the Committee of 300 is to bring to pass the following conditions:

A One World Government and one-unit monetary system under permanent non-elected hereditary oligarchists who self select from among their numbers in the form of a feudal system as it was in the Middle Ages. In this One World entity, population will be limited by restrictions on the number of children per family, diseases, wars, famines, until 1 billion people who are useful to the ruling class, in areas which will be strictly and clearly defined, remain as the total world population.

There will be no middle class, only rulers and servants. All laws will be uniform under a legal system of world courts practicing the same unified code of laws, backed up by a One World Government police force and a One World unified military to enforce laws in all former countries where no national boundaries shall exist. The system will be on the basis of a welfare state; those who are obedient and subservient to the One World Government will be rewarded with the means to live; those who are rebellious will simply be starved to death or be declared outlaws, thus a target for anyone who wishes to kill them. Privately owned firearms or weapons of any kind will be prohibited.

Only one religion will be allowed and that will be in the form of a One World Government Church, which has been in existence since 1920 as we shall see. Satanism, Luciferianism and Witchcraft shall he recognized as legitimate One World Government curricula with no private or church schools. All Christian churches have already been subverted and Christianity will be a thing of the past in the One World Government.

To induce a state where there is no individual freedom or any concept of liberty surviving, there shall be no such thing as republicanism, sovereignty or rights residing with the people. National pride and racial identity shall be stamped out and in the transition phase it shall be subject to the severest penalties to even mention one's racial origin.

Each person shall be fully indoctrinated that he or she is a creature of the One World Government with an identification number clearly marked on their person so as to be readily accessible, which identifying number shall be in the master file of the NATO computer in Brussels, Belgium, subject to instant retrieval by any agency of the One World Government at any time. The master Files of the CIA, FBI, state and local police agencies, IRS, FEMA, Social Security shall be vastly expanded and form the basis of personal records of all individuals in the United States.

Marriage shall be outlawed and there shall be no family life as we know it. Children will be removed from their parents at an early-age and brought up by wards as state property. Such an experiment was carried out in East Germany under Erich Honnecker when children were take away from parents considered by the state to be disloyal citizens. Women will he degraded through the continued process of "women's liberation" movements. Free sex shall be mandatory.

Failure to comply at least once by the age of 20 shall be punishable by severe reprisals against her person. Self-abortion shall be taught and practiced after two children are born to a woman; such records shall be contained in the personal file of each woman in the One World Government's regional computers. If a woman falls pregnant after she has previously given birth to two children, she shall be forcibly removed to an abortion clinic for such an abortion and sterilization to be carried out Pornography shall be promoted and be compulsory showing in every theater of cinema, including homosexual and lesbian pornography. The use of "recreational" drugs shall be compulsory, with each person allotted drug quotas which can be purchased at One World Government stores throughout the world. Mind control drugs will be expanded and usage become compulsory. Such mind control drugs shall be given in food and/or water supplies without the knowledge and/or consent of the people. Drug bars shall be set up, run by One World Government employees, where the slave-class shall be able to spend their free time. In this manner the non-elite masses will be reduced to the level and behavior of controlled animals with no will of their own and easily regimented and controlled.

The economic system shall be based upon the ruling oligarethical class allowing just enough foods and services to be produced to keep the mass slave labor camps going. All wealth shall be aggregated in the hands of the elite members of the Committee of 300. Each individual shall be indoctrinated to understand that he or she is totally dependent upon the state for survival. The world shall be ruled by Committee of 300 Executive Decrees which become instant law. Boris Yeltsin is using Committee of 300 decrees to impose the Committee's will on Russia as a trial run. Courts of punishment and not courts of justice shall exist.

Industry is to be totally destroyed along with nuclear powered energy systems. Only the Committee of 300 members and their elitists shall have the right to any of the earth's resources. Agriculture shall be solely in the hands of the Committee of 300 with food production strictly controlled. As these measures begin to take effect, large populations in the cities shall be forcibly removed to remote areas and those who refuse to go shall be exterminated in the manner of the One World Government experiment carried out by Pol Pot in Cambodia.

Euthanasia for the terminally ill and the aged shall be compulsory. No cities shall be larger than a predetermined number as described in the work of Kalgeri. Essential workers will be moved to other cities if the one they are in becomes overpopulated. Other non-essential workers will be chosen at random and sent to underpopulated cities to fill "quotas."

At least 4 billion "useless eaters" shall be eliminated by the year 2050 by means of limited wars, organized epidemics of fatal rapid-acting diseases and starvation. Energy, food and water shall be kept at subsistence levels for the non-elite, starting with the White populations of Western Europe and North America and then spreading to other races. The population of Canada, Western Europe and the United States will be decimated more rapidly than on other continents, until the world's population reaches a manageable level of 1 billion, of which 500 million will consist of Chinese and Japanese races, selected because they are people who have been regimented for centuries and who are accustomed to obeying authority without question.

From time to time there shall be artificially contrived food and water shortages and medical care to remind the masses that their very existence depends on the goodwill of the Committee of 300.

After the destruction of housing, auto, steel and heavy goods industries, there shall he limited housing, and industries of any kind allowed to remain shall be under the direction of NATO's Club of Rome as shall all scientific and space exploration development, limited to the elite under the control of the Committee of 300. Space weapons of all former nations shall be destroyed along with nuclear weapons.

All essential and non-essential pharmaceutical products, doctors, dentists and health care workers will be registered in the central computer data bank and no medicine or medical care will he prescribed without express permission of regional controllers responsible for each city, town and village.

The United States will be flooded by peoples of alien cultures who will eventually overwhelm White America, people with no concept of what the United States Constitution stands for and who will, in consequence, do nothing to defend it, and in whose minds the concept of liberty and justice is so weak as to matter little. FOOD and shelter shall be the main concern.

No central bank save the Bank of International Settlement and the World Bank shall be allowed to operate. Private banks will be outlawed. Remuneration for work performed shall be under a uniform predetermined scale throughout the One World Government. There shall be no wage disputes allowed, nor any diversion from the standard uniform scales of pay laid down by the One World Government. Those who break the law will be instantly executed.

There shall be no cash or coinage in the hands of the non-elite. All transactions shall be carried out by means of a debit card which shall bear the identification number of the holder. Any person who in any way infringes the rules and regulations of the Committee of 300 shall have the use of his or her card suspended for varying times according to the nature and severity of the infringement.

Such persons will find, when they go to make purchases, that their card is blacklisted and they will not be able to obtain services of any kind. Attempts to trade "old" coins, that is to say silver coins of previous and now defunct nations, shall be treated as a capital crime subject to the death penalty. All such coinage shall be required to be surrendered within a given time along with guns, rifles, explosives and automobiles. Only the elite and One World Government high-ranking functionaries will be allowed private transport, weapons, coinage and automobiles.

If the offense is a serious one, the card will be seized at the checking point where it is presented. Thereafter that person shall not be able to obtain food, water, shelter and employment medical services, and shall be officially listed as an outlaw. Large bands of outlaws will thus be created and they will live in regions that best afford subsistence, subject to being hunted down and shot on sight. Persons assisting outlaws in any way whatsoever, shall likewise be shot. Outlaws who fail to surrender to the police or military after a declared period of time, shall have a former family member selected at random to serve prison terms in their stead.

Rival factions and groups such as Arabs and Jews and African tribes shall have differences magnified and allowed the wage wars of extermination against each other under the eyes of NATO and U.N. observers. The same tactics will be used in Central and South America. These wars of attrition shall take place BEFORE the take-over of the One World Government and shall be engineered on every continent where large groups of people with ethnic and religious differences live, such as the Sikhs, Moslem Pakistanis and the Hindu Indians. Ethnic and religious differences shall be magnified and exacerbated and violent conflict as a means of "settling" their differences shall be encouraged and fostered.

All information services and print media shall be under the control of the One World Government. Regular brainwashing control measures shall be passed off as "entertainment" in the manner in which it was practiced and became a fine art in the United States. Youths removed from "disloyal parents," shall receive special education designed to brutalize them. Youth of both sexes shall receive training to qualify as prison guards for the One World labor camp system.

It is obvious from the foregoing that much work remains to be done before the dawning of the New World Order can occur. The Committee of 300 has long ago perfected plans to destabilize civilization as we know it, some of which plans were made known by Zbignew Brzezinski in his classic work "THE TECHNOTRONIC ERA" and the works of Aurellio Peccei who founded the Club of Rome, especially in his book, "THE CHASM AHEAD."

In "THE CHASM AHEAD," Peccei spelled out Committee of 300 plans to tame man, whom he called "THE ENEMY." Peccei quoted what Felix Dzerzinski once said to Sydney Reilly at the height of the Red Terror when millions of Russians were being murdered: "Why should I concern myself with how many die? Even the Christian Bible says what is man that God should be mindful of him? For me men are nothing but a brain at one end and a shit factory at the other. "

It was from this brutish view of man that Emmanuel The Christ came to rescue the world. Sydney Reilly was the MI6 operative sent to watch over Dzerzinski's activities. Reilly was allegedly shot by his friend Felix while attempting to flee Russia. The elaborate plot was devised when certain members of the British Parliament raised a hue and cry and began to loudly demand an accounting of Reilly's activities in Russia, which threatened to expose the role of the Committee of 300 in gaining control of the Baku oilfields and its major role in assisting Lenin and Trotsky during the Bolshevik Revolution. Rather than have the truth dragged out of Reilly, MI6 thought it expedient to stage his death. Reilly lived out his days in utter luxury in a Russia villa usually reserved for the Bolshevik elite.

Arguing that chaos would ensue unless the "Atlantic Alliance," a euphemism for the Committee of 300 ruled post industrial America, Peccei proposed a Malthusian triaging on a global scale. He envisioned a collision between the scientifictechnological-military apparatus of the Soviet Union and the Western world. Thus the Warsaw Pact countries were to be offered a convergence with the West in a One World Government to run global affairs on the foundations of crisis management and global planning.

Events unfolding in what was formerly the USSR and the emergence of several independent states in a loose federation in Russia, is exactly what was envisaged by Peccei and the Club of Rome and this is clearly spelled out in both the books I have mentioned. A USSR thus divided will be easier to cope with than a strong, united Soviet nation. Plans that were laid down by the Committee of 300 for a One World Government, which included the prospect of a divided Russia, are now approaching a point of rapid escalation. Events in Russia at the close of 1991 are all the more dramatic when viewed against the 1960 longrange planning by the Committee of 300.

In Western Europe the people are working toward a federation of states within a one government framework with a single currency. From there the EEC system will be transferred bit by bit to the United States and Canada. The United Nations is benign slowly but surely transformed into a rubber stamp of One World Government, with policies dictated to it by the United States as we saw in the case of the Gulf War.

Precisely the same thing is happening with the British Parliament. Discussion on Britain's participation in the Gulf War was kept to a ridiculously minimal level and belatedly took place only during a motion to adjourn the House. This has never happened before in the ancient history of parliament, where so important a decision had to be made and so little time was allowed for discussion. One of the most noteworthy events in parliamentary history has gone virtually unnoticed.

We are close to the point where the United States will send its military Forces to settle any and all disputes brought before the United Nations. Departing Secretary General Perez de Cuellar, heavily laden with bribe money, was the most compliant U.N. leader in history in granting demands of the United States without discussion. His successor will be even more inclined to go along with whatever the U.S. government places before him. This is an important step along the road to a One World Government.

The International Court of Justice at The Hague will be used in increasing measure in the next two years to settle legal arguments of all types. It is of course the prototype for a One World Government legal system that will supplant all others. As for central banks, essential in the planning of the New World Order, this is already very much a fait-accompli with the Bank of International Settlements dominating the scene at the close of 1991. Private banks are fast disappearing in preparation for the Big Ten banks that will control banking the world over under the guidance of BIS and the IMF.

Welfare states abound in Europe, and the United States is fast becoming the largest welfare state in the world. Once people come to depend on government for their subsistence, it will be very hard to wean them away from it as we saw in the results of the last mid-term election held in the United States where 98% of incumbents were returned to Washington to enjoy the good life in spite of their utterly deplorable records.

The abolition of privately owned firearms is already in force in three quarters of the world. Only in the United States can the populace still own guns of all types, but that legal right is being chipped away at an alarming rate by local and state laws which violate the Constitutional right of all citizens to bear arms. Private gun ownership will have become a thing of the past in the United States by the year 2010.

SIMILARLY, EDUCATION IS BEING ERODED AT AN ALARMING RATE. PRIVATE SCHOOLS ARE BEING FORCED TO CLOSE BY A VARIETY OF LEGAL STRATAGEMS AND LACK OF FUNDING. The standard of education in the United States has already sunk to such a deplorable level that today it can barely be classified as education at all. This is according to plan; as I described earlier, the One World Government does not want our youth to be properly educated.

Destruction of national identity proceeds apace. It is no longer a good thing to be patriotic unless it is in the cause of some One World Government project such as the war of genocide being waged against the nation of Iraq, or the impending destruction of Libya. Racial pride is now frowned upon and deemed to be an illegal act in many parts of the world, INCLUDING THE UNITED STATES, BRITAIN, WESTERN EUROPE AND CANADA, ALL COUNTRIES HAVING THE LARGEST CONCENTRATIONS OF THE WHITE RACE.

Led by the secret societies in America, destruction of republican forms of government has proceeded apace since the close of WW II. A list of such governments destroyed by the U.S.

is long, and it is difficult for the non-informed to accept that government of a country allegedly wedded to republicanism under a unique constitution would engage in such conduct, but the facts speak for themselves.

This is a goal which was set over a century ago by the Committee of 300. The United States has led the attacks on such governments and continues to do so even as the United States republican base is being steadily undermined. Starting with James Earl Carter's legal counsel, Lloyd Cutler, a committee of constitutional lawyers has been working to change the U.S. Congress into a non-representative parliamentary system. Work has been in progress since 1979 on the blueprint for such a change, and because of his devotion to the cause, Cutler was made a member of the Committee of 300. The final draft for a parliamentary type of government is to be presented to the Committee of 300 at the end of 1993.

In the new parliamentary system, members will not be responsible to their constituents, but to parliamentary whips and will vote the way they are told to vote. Thus, by judicial and bureaucratic subversion will the Constitution vanish as will individual liberty. Preplanned degrading of man through licentious sexual practices will be stepped up. New sexually degenerate cults are even now being set up by the British Crown-working through the SIS and MI6 services. As we already know, all cults operating in the world today are the product of British intelligence acting for the oligarchical rulers.

We may think this phase of creating a whole new cult which specializes in sexual degenerate behavior is still far off, but my information is that it is due to be stepped up in 1992. By 1994 it will be quite commonplace to have "live shows" in the most prestigious clubs and places of entertainment. This type of "entertainment" is already in the process of having its image cleaned and brightened.

Soon the big names in Hollywood and the entertainment world will be recommending this or that club as a "must" for live sex shows. Lesbianism and homosexuality will not be featured. This new socially acceptable "entertainment" will consist of heterosexual displays and will be written up in reviews as one finds in today's newspapers about shows on Broadway, or the latest hit movie.

An unprecedented assault on moral values will go into high gear in 1992. Pornography will no longer be called "pornography," but adult sex entertainment. Sloganeering will take the form of "why hide it when everybody does it. Let's take away the image that public displays of sex are ugly and dirty." No more will those who care for this type of unbridled sexual lust have to go to seedy porno parlours. Instead, the upper-class supper clubs and places favored by the rich and famous will make public sexual displays a highly "artistic" form of entertainment. Worse yet, some church "leaders" will even recommend it.

The voluminous all-pervading and enormous social psychiatry apparatus put in place by the Tavistock Institute and its huge web of related capabilities has been under the control of one single entity, and that entity is still in control as we enter 1992. That single entity, the conspirators'hierarchy, is called THE COMMITTEE OF 300. It is a power structure and a power center that operates far beyond the reach of any single world leader or any government, including the United States government and its Presidents—as the late John F. Kennedy found out. The Kennedy murder was an operation of the Committee of 300 and we shall return to that.

The Committee of 300 is the ultimate secret society made up of an untouchable ruling class, which includes the Queen of England, the Queen of the Netherlands, the Queen of Denmark and the royal families of Europe. These aristocrats decided at the death of Queen Victoria, the matriarch of the Venetian Black Guelphs that, in order to gain world-wide control, it would be necessary for its aristocratic members to "go into business" with the non-aristocratic but extremely powerful leaders of corporate business on a global scale, and so the doors to ultimate power were opened to what the Queen of England likes to refer to as "the commoners."

From my days in the intelligence business I know that heads of foreign governments refer to this all-powerful body as

"The Magicians." Stalin coined his own phrase to describe them: "The Dark Forces," and President Eisenhower, who was never able to get beyond the "hofjuden" (court Jew) grade, referred to it in a colossal understatement as "the military-industrial complex." Stalin kept the USSR heavily armed with conventional and nuclear forces because he did not trust what he called "the family." His ingrained mistrust and fear of the Committee of 300 proved to be well-founded.

Popular entertainment, especially the medium of movie making, was used to bring discredit upon those who tried to warn of this most dangerous threat to individual liberty and freedom of mankind. Freedom is a God-given law which man has constantly sought to subvert and undermine; yet the yearning for freedom by each individual is so great that up to now, no system has been able to tear that feeling from the heart of mad. The experiments that have gone on in the USSR, Britain and the USA, to blunt and dull mans yearnings for freedom, have thus far proved to be unsuccessful.

But with the coming of the New World Order-One World Government, far-reaching experiments will be stepped up to drive mans God-given yearning for freedom out of his mind, body and soul. What we are already experiencing is but nothing, a mere bagatelle, when compared with what is to come. Attacking the soul is the thrust of a host of experiments being readied, and I regret to say that institutions in the United States will play a leading role in the terrible experiments which have already been carried out on local small-scale levels at such places as Bethesda Naval Hospital and Vacaville prison in California.

The movies we have seen thus far include the James Bond series, the "Assassination Bureau," the "Matarese Circle" and so on. They were make-believe movies, designed to hide the truth that such organizations do exist and on a far greater scale than even Hollywood's fertile idea-men could dream up.

Yet the Assassination Bureau is absolutely real. It exists in Europe and the United States solely to do the bidding of the Committee of 300 to carry out high-level assassinations where all other remedies have failed. It was PERMINDEX which ran the Kennedy assassination under the direction of Sir William Stephenson, for years the Queen of England's number one "pest control" operative.

Clay Shaw, a contract agent of the CIA, ran PERMINDEX out of the Trade Mart Center in New Orleans. Former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison came very close to cracking the Kennedy assassination plot up to the level of Clay Shaw until Garrison was "dealt with" and Shaw was found not quilty of involvement in the Kennedy assassination plot. The fact that Shaw was eliminated in the manner of Jack Ruby, another CIA contract agent—both died of induced quick-acting cancer—speaks volumes that Garrison was on the right track.

A second assassination bureau is located in Switzerland and was until recently run by a shadowy figure of whom no photographs existed after 1941. The operations were and probably still are financed by the Oltramaire family—Swiss Black Nobility, owners of the Lombard Odier Bank of Geneva, a Committee of 300 operation. The primary contact man was Jacques Soustelle—this according to U.S. Army-G2 intelligence files.

This group was also closely allied with Allen Dulles and Jean de Menil, an important member of the Committee of 300 and a very prominent name in the oil industry in Texas. ArmyG2 records show that the group was heavily involved in the arms trade in the Middle East, but more than that, the assassination bureau made no less than 30 attempts to assassinate General de Gaulle, in which Jacques Soustelle was directly involved. The same Soustelle was the contact man for the Sendero Luminosa-Shining Pathway guerilla group protecting the Committee's Peruvian cocaine producers.

When all of the best that the assassination bureau could do had failed, thanks to the excellent work done by DGSE (French intelligence-formerly SDECE) the job was assigned to MI6-Military Intelligence Department Six, and also known as Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), under the code name "Jackal." SDECE employed clever young graduates and was not infiltrated by MI6 or the KGB to any measurable extent. Its record in tracking down foreign agents made it the envy of the secret services of every nation, and it was this group that followed "Jackal" to his final destination and then killed him before he could fire on General de Gaulle's motorcade.

It was the SDECE who uncovered a Soviet mole in the cabinet of De Gaulle, who also happened to be a liaison man with the CIA in Langley. In order to discredit the SDECE, Allen Dulles, who hated De Gaulle, (the feeling was mutual) had one of its agents, Roger De Louette, caught with $12 million worth of heroin in his possession. After a great deal of expert "interrogation," De Louette "confessed" but was unable to say why he was smuggling drugs into the United States. The whole thing stank to high heaven of a set-up.

Based upon an examination of SDECE methods in protecting De Gaulle, especially in motorcades, the FBI, Secret Service and the CIA knew exactly how to strip President Kennedy of his security and make it easy for the three PERMINDEX shooters to murder him in Dealey Plaza in November 1963.

Another example of FACT disguised as fiction is the Leon Uris novel, "TOPAZ." In "TOPAZ" we find a factual account of the activities of Thyraud de Vosjoli, the very KGB agent uncovered by SDECE and denounced as the KGB's liaison man with the CIA. There are many fictionalized accounts of the MOSSAD's activities, nearly all of which are based on fact.

The MOSSAD is also known as "The Institute." Many would-be writers make nonsensical statements about it, especially one writer who is much in favor with the Christian right wing, which is accepted as truth. One can pardon the offender because he has no intelligence training, but that does not stop him from dropping "Mossad names" all over the place.

Such disinformation exercises are routinely run against American right wing patriotic groups. Originally the MOSSAD consisted of 3 groups, the Bureau of Military Intelligence, the Political Department of the Foreign Office and the Department of Security (Sherut Habitachon). David Ben Gurion, a member of the Committee of 300, received some considerable help from MI6 in putting it together.

But it was not a success, and in 1951 Sir William Stephenson of MI6 restructured it into a single unit as arm of the Political Department of the Israeli Foreign Office, with a special operations group for espionage and "black job" operations. British intelligence gave further assistance in training and equipping for servicing the Sarayet Maktal, also known as the General Staff Reconnaissance unit, in the format of Britain's Special Air Service (SAS). This service unit of the MOSSAD is never mentioned by name and is known simply as "The Guys."

"The Guys" are merely an extension of British intelligence's SAS unit who continually train and update them in new methods. It was "The Guys" who killed the leaders of the P.L.0. and kidnaped Adolph Eichmann. "The Guys" and indeed ALL MOSSAD agents, operate on a war-time footing. The MOSSAD has a tremendous advantage over other intelligence services in that every country in the world has a large Jewish community.

By studying social and criminal records, the MOSSAD is able to pick agents among local Jews it can have a hold over AND MAKE THEM WORK FOR IT WITHOUT PAY. The MOSSAD also has the advantage of having access to the records of all U.S. law enforcement agencies and U.S. intelligence services The Office of Naval Intelligence (OM) ELINT services the Mossad at no cost to Israel. Citizens of the United States would be shocked, angered and dismayed if ever it was discovered just how much the MOSSAD knows about the lives of millions of Americans in every walk of life, even those who are not political in any way.

The first head of the MOSSAD, Reuben Shiloach, was made a member of the Committee of 300, but it is not known whether his successor enjoyed the same privilege. Chances are that he does. The MOSSAD has a skillful disinformation service. The amount of disinformation it feeds to the American "market" is embarrassing, but even more embarrassing is how it is swallowed hook, line and sinker and all.

What we are actually witnessing in the microcosm of the MOSSAD is the extent of control exercised by the "Olympians" over the intelligence services, entertainment, publishing, opinion-making (polls) and the television "news" media on a global scale. Ted Turner was recently given a seat on the Committee of 300 in recognition for his "news" (making) CNN broadcasts. The Committee has the power and the means to tell the people of this world ANYTHING, and it will be believed by the vast majority,

On every occasion that a researcher happens upon this astounding central control group, he is either successfully bought off, or else he undergoes some "speciality training" at the Tavistock Institute after which he becomes a contributor to more fiction, of the James Bond type, i.e., he is derailed and well rewarded. If such a person as John F. Kennedy should stumble onto the truth about who directs world events, and cannot be bought, he is assassinated.

In the case of John F. Kennedy, the assassination was carried out with great attendant publicity and with the utmost brutality to serve as a warning to world leaders not to get out of line. Pope John Paul I was quietly murdered because he was getting close to the Committee of 300 through Freemasons in the Vatican hierarchy. His successor, Pope John Paul 11, was publicly humiliated as a warning to cease and desist—which he has done. As we shall see, certain Vatican leaders are today seated on the Committee of 300.

It is easy to put serious researcher off track of the Committee of 300 because Britain's MI6 (SAS) promotes a wide variety of kookery such as the New Age, Yogaism, Zen Buddhism, Witchcraft, Delphic Priesthood of Apollo (Aristotle was a member) and hundreds of small "cults" of all kinds. A group of "retired" British intelligence agents who stayed on the track labeled the conspirators'hierarchy "Force X," and declared that it possesses a super-intelligence service that has corrupted the KGB, the Vatican Intelligence, the CIA, the ONI, DGSE, U.S. military intelligence, the State Department intelligence service and even the most secret of all U.S. intelligence agencies, the Office of National Reconnaissance.

The existence of the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) was known to only a handful of people outside of the Committee of 300, until Truman stumbled upon it quite by accident. Churchill had a hand in setting up the NRO and he was reportedly livid when Truman discovered its existence. Churchill more than any other servant of the Committee of 300, considered Truman His-Little-Man from independence "without an independence at all." This referred to Truman's every move being controlled by Freemasonry. Even today, NRO's annual budget is not known to the Congress of the United States, and it is responsible to only a selected few in Congress. But it is a creature of the Committee of 300 to whom its reports are routinely sent every few hours.

Thus the fictionalized spoofs one sees about the various branches and arms of control of the Committee were designed to take suspicion away from the real thing, but we should never doubt that the real thing does indeed exist. Take another example of what I mean, the book "THE DAY OF THE JACKAL," from which a highly successful movie was created.

The events related in the book are factual. Although for obvious reasons the names of some of the players and the locales were changed, but the thrust of the story, that a single MI6 operative was assigned to get rid of General Charles De Gaulle, is absolutely correct. General De Gaulle had become unmanageable, refusing to cooperate with the Committee-whose existence he knew very well since he had been invited to join it—came to a climax when De Gaulle withdrew France from NATO and immediately began building his own nuclear force—the so-called "force de frappe."

This so angered the Committee that De Gaulle's assassination was ordered. But the French secret intelligence service was able to intercept "Jackal's" plans and keep De Gaulle safe. In the light of the record of MI6, which I might add is the Committee of 300's main resource when it comes to intelligence, the work done by French intelligence borders on the miraculous.

Military Intelligence Department Six dates back to Sir Francis Walsingham, paymaster of Queen Elizabeth I for dirty tricks operations. Over hundreds of years, MI6 has established a record which no other intelligence agency can come near to duplicating. MI6 agents have gathered information from the four corners of the earth and have carried out secret operations that would astound even the most knowledgeable if ever they were to be made public, which is why it rates as the Master service of the Committee of 300.

Officially, MI6 does not exist, its budget comes out of the Queen's purse and "private funds," and is reported to be in a range of $350-$500 million per annum, but no one knows for sure what the exact amount is. In its present form MI6 dates back to 1911, when it was under the leadership of Sir Mansfield Cumming, a captain in the Royal Navy, who was always identified by the letter "C," from which "M" of James Bond fame is taken.

No official record of MI6's failures and successes exist—it is that secret, although the Burgess-Maclean-Blake-Blunt disasters did great damage to the morale of MI6 officers. Unlike other services, future members are recruited from universities and other areas of learning by highly skilled "talent scouts" as we saw in the case of Rhodes Scholars inducted into the Round Table. One of the requirements is an ability to speak foreign languages. Candidates undergo a rigorous "blooding."

With the backing of such a formidable force, the Committee of 300 had little fear from ever being exposed, and this will go on for decades. What makes the Committee incredible is the incredible secrecy that prevails. None of the news media has ever made mention of this conspiratorial hierarchy; therefore, as is to be expected, people doubt its existence.

The Committee of 300 is for the most part under the control of the British monarch, in this case, Elizabeth II. Queen Victoria is believed to have been quite paranoid about keeping it secret and went to great lengths to cover up MASONIC writings left at the scene of "Jack the Ripper" murders which alluded to the Committee of 300's connections with "experiments" carried out by a family member who was also a highly-placed member of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. The Committee of 300 is filled with members of British aristocracy which has corporate interests and associates in every country of the world, including the USSR.

The Committee's structure is as follows:

The Tavistock Institute at Sussex University and London sites is owned and controlled by the Royal Institute for International Affairs whose "hofjuden" in America is Henry Kissinger. The EAGLE STAR GROUP, which changed its name to the STAR GROUP after the close of the Second World War, is composed of a group of major international companies involved in overlapping and interfaced areas (1) Insurance, (2) Banking, (3) Real Estate, (4) Entertainment, (5) High technology, including cybernetics, electronic communications, etc.

Banking, while not the mainstay, is vitally important, especially in the areas where banks act as clearing houses and money launderers of drug money. The main "big name banks" are The Bank of England, the Federal Reserve Banks, Bank of International Settlements, the World Bank and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. American Express Bank is a means of recycling drug dollars. Each of these banks is affiliated with and/or controls hundreds of thousands of large and small banks throughout the world.

Banks large and small in the thousands are in the Committee of 300 network, including Banca Commerciale d'Italia, Banca Privata, Banco Ambrosiano, the Netherlands Bank, Barclays Bank, Banco del Colombia, Banco de Ibero-America. Of special interest is Banca del la Svizzeria Italiana (BSI)—since it handles flight capital investments to and from the United States-primarily in dollars and U.S. bonds—located and isolated in "neutral" Lugano, the flight capital center for the Venetian Black Nobility. Lugano is not in Italy or in Switzerland, and is a kind of a twilight zone for shady flight capital operations. George Ball, who owns a large block of stock in BSI, is a prominent "insider" and the hank's U.S. representative.

BCCI, BNL, Banco Mercantil de Mexico, Banco Nacional de Panama, Bangkok Metropolitan Bank, Bank Leumi, Bank Hapoalim, Standard Bank, Bank of Geneva, Bank of Ireland, Bank of Scotland, Bank of Montreal, Bank of Nova Scotia, Banque Paris et Pays Bas, British Bank of the Middle East and the Royal Bank of Canada to name but a very small number in a huge list of "speciality" banks.

The Oppenheimers of South Africa are much bigger "heavyweights" than the Rockefellers. For instance, in 1981 Harry Oppenheimer, chairman of the giant Anglo American Corporation that controls gold and diamond mining, sales and distribution in the world, stated that he was about to launch into the North American banking market. Oppenheimer promptly invested $10 billion in a specially created vehicle for the purpose of buying into big banks in the U.S., among which was Citicorp. Oppenheimer's investment vehicle was called Minorco, which set up shop in Bermuda, a British royal family preserve. On the board of Minorco was to be found Walter Wriston of Citicorp and Robert Clare, its chief counsel.

The only other company to rival Oppenheimer in the field of precious metals and minerals was Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa, but Oppenheimer took control of it with a 28% stake the largest single stockholder. Thus gold, diamonds, platinum, titanium, tantalite, copper, iron ore, uranium and 52 other metals and minerals, many of them of absolutely vital strategic value to United States, passed into the hands of the Committee of 300.

Thus was the vision of one of the earlier South African members of the Committee of 300, Cecil John Rhodes, fully realized, a vision which started with the spilling of the blood of thousands upon thousands of White farmers and their families in South Africa, whom history records as the "Boers." While the United States stood by with folded hands as did the rest of the world, this small nation was subjected to the most vicious war of genocide in history. The United States will be subjected to the same treatment by the Committee of 300 when our turn comes and it will not be long in coming.

Insurance companies play a key role in the business of the Committee of 300. Among these are found such top insurance companies as Assicurazioni Generali of Venice and Riunione Adriatica di Sicurta, the largest and second largest insurance companies in the world, who keep their bank accounts at Bank of International Settlements in Swiss gold francs. Both control a multiplicity of investment banks whose turnover in stocks on Wall Street double that of U.S. investors.

Prominent on the board of these two insurance giants are Committee of 300 members: the Giustiniani family, Black Nobility of Rome and Venice who trace their lineage to the Emperor Justianian; Sir Jocelyn Hambro of Hambros (Merchant) Bank; Pierpaolo Luzzatti Fequiz, whose lineage dates back six centuries to the most ancient Luzzatos, the Black Nobility of Venice, and Umberto Ortolani of the ancient Black Nobility family of the same name.

Other old Venetian Black Nobility Committee of 300 members and board members of ASG and RAS are the Doria family, the financiers of the Spanish Hapsburgs, Elie de Rothschild of the French Rothschild family, Baron August von Finck (Finck, the second richest man in Germany is now deceased), Franco Orsini Bonacassi of the ancient Orsini Black Nobility that traces its lineage to an ancient Roman senator of the same name, the Alba family whose lineage dates back to the great Duke of Alba, and Baron Pierre Lambert, a cousin of the Belgian Rothschild family.

The English companies controlled by the British royal family are Eagle Star, Prudential Assurance Company, the Prudential Insurance Company, which own and control most American insurers, including Allstate Insurance. At the head of the list is Eagle Star, probably the most powerful "front" for Military Intelligence Department Six (MI6). Eagle Star, although nowhere near as large as Assicurazioni Generale, is perhaps equally important simply because it is owned by members of the Queen of England's family and, as titular head of the Committee of 300, Eagle Star makes a tremendous impact.

Eagle Star is more than a major "front" for MI6, it is also a Front for major British banks, including Hill-Samuels, N. M. Rothschild and Sons (one of the gold price "fixers" who meet daily in London), and Barclays Bank (one of the funders of the African National Congress-ANC). It can be said with a great degree of accuracy that the most powerful British oligarchical families created Eagle Star as a vehicle for "black operations" against those who oppose Committee of 300 policies.

Unlike the CIA, British law makes it a serious crime to name MI6 officials, so the following is but a partial list of "top brass" of MI6, who are (or were) also members of the Committee of 300:

Lord Hartley Shawcross.
Sir Brian Edward Mountain.
Sir Kenneth Keith.
Sir Kenneth Strong.
Sir William Stephenson.
Sir William Wiseman.

All of the fore going are (or were) heavily involved in key Committee of 300 companies which interface with literally thousands of companies engaged in every branch of commercial activity as we shall see.

Some of these companies include Rank Organization, Xerox Corporation, ITT, IBM, RCA, CBS, NBC, BBC and CBC in communications, Raytheon, Textron, Bendix, Atlantic Richfield, British Petroleum, Royal Dutch Shell, Marine Midland Bank, Lehman Brothers, Kuhn Loeb, General Electric, Westinghouse Corporation, United Fruit Company and a great many more. MI6 ran a large number of these companies through British intelligence stationed in the RCA building in New York, which was the headquarters of its chief officer, Sir William Stephenson. Radio Corporation of America (RCA) was formed by G.E., Westinghouse, Morgan Guarantee and Trust (acting for the British crown), and United Fruit, back in 1919 as a British intelligence center. RCA's first president was J.P. Morgan's Owen Young, after whom the Young Plan was named. In 1929 David Sarnoff was appointed to run RCA. Sarnoff had acted as an assistant to Young at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference where a fallen Germany was stabbed in the back by the victorious "allies." A network of Wall Street banks and brokerage houses takes care of the stock market for the Committee, and prominent among these are Blyth, Eastman Dillon, the Morgan groups, Lazard Freres and Kuhn Loeb Rhodes. Nothing happens on Wall Street that is not controlled by the Bank of England, whose instructions are relayed through the Morgan groups and then put into action through key brokerage houses whose top executives are ultimately responsible for carrying out Committee directives. Before it overstepped the limits laid down by Morgan Guarantee, Drexel Burnham Lambert was a favorite of the Committee of 300. In 1981 almost every major brokerage house on Wall Street had sold out to the Committee, Phibro merging with Salomon Brothers. Phibro is the business arm of the Oppenheimers of Anglo American Corporation. By this control mechanism, the Committee of 300 ensures that its members and their far-flung business corporations turned their investments on Wall Street over at a rate of double that of the "non-insider" foreign investors.

Remember, some of the richest families in the world live in Europe, so it is natural that they should have a preponderance of members on the Committee. The Von Thurn und Taxis family who once owned the German postal franchise, make David Rockefeller look like a very poor relation. The Von Thurn und Taxis dynasty dates back 300 years and generation after generation of family members have had seats on the Committee which they occupy to this day. We have already mentioned by name many of the most wealthy Venetian Black Nobility members of the Committee of 300 and other names will be added as we come across them in their various fields of endeavor. Now we shall include some American members of the Committee of 300 and try to trace their affiliations and connections to the British Crown.

How can these facts be verified? Actually, some of them cannot be verified because the information comes straight out of intelligence files, but with a lot of legwork, there are many sources which can verify at least part of the facts. The work would involve a diligent search of Dun and Bradstreet Reference Book of Corporations, Standard and Poors, British and American "Who's Who" with long hours of hard work in crossreferencing names with their corporate affiliations.

Committee of 300 corporations, banks, and insurance companies operate under the unified command covering every conceivable matter of strategy and cohesive action. The Committee is the ONLY organized power hierarchy in the world transcending all governments and individuals, however powerful and secure they may feel themselves to be. This covers finance, defense matters and political parties of all colors and types.

There is no entity the Committee cannot reach and control, and that includes organized religions of the world. This then, is the all powerful OLYMPIAN GROUP whose power base is in London and the City of London's financial centers with its grip on minerals, metals and precious gems, cocaine, opium and pharmaceutical drugs, rentier-financier bankers, cult promoters and founders of rock music. The British Crown is the control point from which all things radiate. As the saying goes, "They have a finger in every pie."

It is obvious that the communications field is tightly controlled. Going back to RCA, we find that its directorate is composed of British-American establishment figures who feature prominently in other organizations such as the CFR, NATO, the Club of Rome, the Trilateral Commission, Freemasonry, Skull and Bones, Bilderbergers, Round Table, Milner Society and the Jesuits-Aristotle Society. Among them was David Sarnoff who moved to London at the same time Sir William Stephenson moved into the RCA building in New York.

All three major television networks came as spinoffs from RCA, especially the National Broadcasting Company (NBC) which was first, closely followed by the American Broadcasting Company (ABC) in 1951. The third big television network was Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) which, like its sister companies was, and still is, dominated by British intelligence. William Paley was trained in mass brainwashing techniques at the Tavistock Institute prior to being passed as qualified to head CBS.

Thus, if we the people of the United States but knew it, all our major television networks are subject to British oversight, and information they provide first goes to London for clearance. It is interesting to note that the Tavistock intelligence paper written by Stanford Research Institute, commonly named "The Aquarian Conspiracy" was funded by donations from all three major television networks.

All three major networks are represented on the Committee of 300 and are affiliated with the giant of the mass communication business, the Xerox Corporation of Rochester, New York, whose Robert M. Beck holds a seat on the Committee. Beck is also a director of the Prudential Life Insurance Company, which is a subsidiary of the London Prudential Assurance Company Limited.

Others on the board of Xerox are Howard Clark of the American Express Company, one of the main conduits for moving drug money through "travelers checks," former Secretary of the Treasury, William Simon, and Sol Linowitz, who negotiated the Panama Canal Treaties for the Committee. Linowitz is important to the Committee by virtue of his long standing expertise in laundering drug money through Marine Midland and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank.

Another Xerox board member is Robert Sproull, who is of real interest because, as president of the University of Rochester, he allowed the Tavistock Institute, working through the CIA, to use the university's facilities for the 20-year MK-Ultra LSD experiments. Some 85 other universities in the U.S. also allowed their facilities to be misused in this manner. As giant-sized as Xerox is, it is dwarfed by the Rank Organization, a Londonbased conglomerate fully controlled by members of Queen Elizabeth's immediate family.

Notable members of the board of Rank Organization who are also members of the Committee of 300 are the following:

Lord Helsby, chairman of the drug money clearing house, Midland Bank. Helsby's other positions include a directorship in the giant Imperial Group and the Industrial and Commercial Finance Corporation.

Sir Arnold France, a director of Tube Investments who runs the London underground train service. France is also a director of the BANK OF ENGLAND which has so much control over the Federal Reserve Banks.

Sir Dennis Mountain, chairman of the mighty Eagle Star group and a director of English Property Corp, one of the rentier-financier companies of the British royal family. One such member is the Honorable Angus Ogilvie, "Prince of Companies," who is married to Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandria, sister of the Duke of Kent, leader of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry and who takes the place of the Queen when she is outside of Britain. Ogilvie is a director of the Bank of England and chairman of the giant LONRHO conglomerate. It was LONRHO that ended the rule of Ian Smith in Rhodesia so that he could be replaced by Robert Mugabe. At stake was Rhodesia's chrome mines which produce the finest high-grade chrome ore in the world.

Cyril Hamilton, chairman of the Standard and Chartered Bank (the old Lord Milner-Cecil Rhodes bank) and a board member of the Bank of England. Hamilton is also on the board of the Xerox Corporation, the Malta International Banking Corporation (A Knights of Malta bank), a director of the Standard Bank of South Africa—the largest bank in that country, and a director of the Banque Belge d'Afrique.

Lord O'Brien of Lotherby, past president of the British Bankers Association, director of Morgan Grenfell—a powerful bank, director of Prudential Assurance, director of J. P.Morgan, director of the Bank of England, a board member of the Bank of International Settlements, a director of the giant Unilever conglomerate.

Sir Reay Geddes, chairman of the giant Dunlop and Pirelli tyre companies, director of the Midland and International Banks, director of the Bank of England. Note how many of these powerful men are directors of the Bank of England which makes control of American fiscal policies simple.

Many of these organizations and institutions, companies and banks are so interfaced and interlocked as to make it an almost impossible task to sort them out. On RCA's board sits Thornton Bradshaw, president of Atlantic Richfield and a member of NATO, World Wildlife Fund, the Club of Rome, The Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, the Council on Foreign Relations. Bradshaw is also chairman of NBC. The most important function of RCA remains its service to British intelligence.

It is not generally known how powerful was the role played by the Committee of 300 in stopping the investigation into the CIA which Senator McCarthy almost succeeded in pulling off. Had McCarthy been successful, it is very likely that President John F. Kennedy would be alive today.

When McCarthy said he was going to summon William Bundy to appear before his commission of enquiry, panic swept Washington and London. Bundy, had he been called to testify, would most probably have cracked and opened the door to the "special relations" that existed between British oligarchical circles and their cousins in the United States Government.

Such a possibility could not be entertained. The Royal Insititute of International Affairs was called in to put an end to McCarthy. The RIIA chose Allen Dulles, a man who was totally enamored of decadent British society, to attack McCarthy head on. Dulles put Patrick Lyman and Richard Helms in charge of the McCarthy case. Helms was later rewarded for his service against McCarthy by being made head of the CIA.

General Mark Clark, a member of the CFR and a well-liked military man in London circles, was appointed by General Eisenhower to turn back McCarthy's full-fledged attack on the CIA. McCarthy was preempted when Clark announced that a special committee was to be appointed to examine the agency. Clark, on instructions from the RIIA, recommended a Congressional watchdog committee to "periodically examine the work of government intelligence agencies." The whole thing was a super tragedy for America and a victory for the British, who feared that McCarthy would accidentally stumble onto the Committee of 300 and its control over every aspect of United States affairs.

Lehman Brothers-Kuhn Loeb's former chairman, Peter G.Peterson, served under former MI6 chief Sir William Wiseman and as such was no stranger to British royalty. Peterson is tied in with Aspen Institute, yet another arm of British intelligence.

John R. Petty is president and chairman of the Marine Midland Bank—a bank whose drug trade connections have been well established long before it was taken over by the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, probably the number one bank in the opium trade, a position it has held since 1814.

But the best proof I can offer of the existence of the Committee of 300 is the Rank Organization which, in conjunction with Eagle Star, IS THE BRITISH CROWN. It is also the black operations center of MI6 (SIS). Between them, these two Committee of 300 companies control Her Majesty's Dominion of Canada, using the "hofjuden" Bronfman family to carry out their orders.

Trizec Holdings, ostensibly owned by the Bronfman family, is in reality the main asset of the Queen of England's in Canada. The entire Southeast Asian opium trade interfaces with the Bronfman empire and is one of the means whereby heroin is brought to America. In a sense, Canada is like Switzerland pristine snow-covered landscapes, big cities, a place of great beauty, but underneath lies a deep layer of filth and dirt arising from its massive heroin trade.

The Bronfman family are "cut-outs"'what is known in MI6 as "front men" controlled from London by MI6 "deskmen," intelligence jargon for controllers at headquarters. Edgar Bronfman, the family leader, was sent to "Moscow Center"-cover name for the KGB headquarters at 2 Dzerzhinsky Square, Moscow, on a large number of occasions.

At a low level, Bronfman was probably very useful as a contact man with Moscow. Bronfman was never at any stage a contract agent for MI6 and so never carried the title "Paroles," a key intelligence word for mutual identification between agents, which greatly disappointed the eager Bronfman family head. At one stage when it was thought that some of the family were acting suspiciously, "watchers"—intelligence jargon for intelligence officers keeping persons under surveillance, were put on the Bronfman family, but found only that one of the Bronfmans had been bragging to a United States "cousin" (the word MI6 uses for the C.I.A.) who was unaware of the role of Edgar Bronfman. This was quickly corrected.

Two Eagle Star directors, who were also the two top MI6 operatives, took control of the Bronfman family about six months after the war ended. Sir Kenneth Keith and Sir Kenneth Strong, whom we have already met, legitimated the Bronfman family by setting up Trizec Holdings. There is no one in the world who can do a better job of "fronting," through companies, than MI6

Yet, like Switzerland, there is a dirty side to Canada that has been well-hidden from view by the Committee of 300 under cover of the Official Secrets Act, a carbon-copy of the British law passed in 1913. Drugs, dirty money laundering, crime and racketeering are all covered by their infamous Act.

Not known to many is that, if charged under the Official Secrets Act, which can be interpreted any way the Crown agents choose, persons could face the death penalty. As I have said so many times since 1980, Canada is not a nation like South Africa, or Holland or Belgium; it always was, and remains tied to the Queen of England's apron strings. Canada, we find, is always first in carrying out Queen Elizabeth's wishes. Canadian troops have fought in every one of Her Majesty's wars, including the Boer War (18991903).

Like its American counterpart, the Canadian Institute of International Affairs is a child of the Royal Institute for International Affairs (RIIA) and runs Canadian politics. Its members have filled the position of Secretary of State ever since it was founded in 1925. The Institute for Pacific Relations, the body that fostered the attack on Pearl Harbor, was welcomed in Canada after Owen Lattimore and his fellow members had their treasonous activities exposed in 1947 and left the United States before they could be charged.

The Canadian Institute for International Affairs is connected with the Rank Organization through Sir Kenneth Strong, who was second in charge of MI6 at the end of the Second World War. As a member of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, Strong is the number two man in Canada for Rank and the British Crown's commercial interests. He is on the board of one of the most prolific drug banks in the world after the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, through which proceeds of the Canadian heroin trade are handled.

First in line is Sir Brian Edward Mountain, the ranking member of the Knights of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. It is well to remember that, when the British Crown wanted the United States to enter the Second World War, it sent Lord Beaverbrook and Sir Brian Mountain to meet with President Roosevelt to deliver the Crown's orders in this regard. Roosevelt complied by ordering the United States Navy to operate out of a base in Greenland, from where attacks on German submarines were carried out nine months before Pearl Harbor. This was done without the knowledge and consent of the Congress.

Another big name in the Rank-Canadian interfacing was Sir Kenneth Keith, a director of Canada's equivalent of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, dripping in drug money laundering. He was also on the board of Britain's oldest and most venerable newspaper institution, the London Times and the Sunday Times. For over 100 years the "Times" has been the Crown's voice on foreign affairs, finance matters and political life in England.

Like so many Committee of 300 members, Sir Kenneth circulated between MI6 and the opium supply chain of command in Hong Kong and China, ostensibly on business for the Canadian Institute for International Affairs, of which he was a member Furthermore, as a director of the Hill Samuel banking house, his presence in China and Hong Kong could be explained without any problem. One of his closest associates outside of MI6 circles was Sir Philip de Zuleta, the Committee of 300's direct controller of all British prime ministers, both Conservative and Labor. Sir Kenneth Strong tied in all the spokes of the drug wheel, including terrorism, production of opium, the gold markets, dirty money laundering and banking to its central core, the British Crown.

At the top of British Crown control of Canada was Walter Gordon. A former member of the Queen's hands-on oversight committee, also known as the Privy Council, Gordon sponsored the Institute for Pacific Relations via the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. As a former minister of finance, Gordon was able to place Committee of 300 selected accountants and lawyers inside the three main chartered banks: the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Canadian Imperial Bank and the Toronto Dominion Bank.

Through these three "Crown banks" a network of Committee of 300 agents responsible to Gordon oversaw the world's second largest dirty drug money laundering operation, with a direct open door to China. Before his death, Gordon controlled James Endicott, Chester Ronning and Paul Linn, identified by MI6 as Canada's top "China specialists." All three men worked closely with Chou-En-lai, who once told Gamal Abdul Nasser that he would do to Britain and the USA what they had done to China, i.e., turn them into nations of heroin addicts. Chou-En-lai made good on his promise, starting with American GI's in Vietnam. Other close collaborators in the Canadian heroin drug ring were John D. Gilmer and John Robert Nicholson, both members of the Order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem.

Lord Hartley Shawcross, who is believed to report directly to Queen Elizabeth II, was on the board of the Royal Institute for International Affairs and chancellor of Sussex University where the notorious Tavistock Institute for Human Relations is located, with extensive connections in Canada.

As part of Rank's United States operation, no other single company has been more successful for Rank than the Corning Group, owners of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and the New York Life Insurance Company. Committee of 300 members, Amory Houghton and his brother James Houghton, have long served the British Crown through the above named insurance companies, and Corning Glass, Dow Corning and Corning International. Both sit on the board of IBM and Citicorp. James Houghton is a director of the Princeton Institute for Advanced Studies, a director of the J. Pierpont Morgan Library, a stronghold of the RIIA and the CFR, and he is also a director of CBS.

It was the Houghton brother who donated hundreds of acres known as Wye Plantation in Maryland to the British Crown's Aspen Institute. Also on the Corning Glass board sits the Bishop of the Archdiocese of the Anglican (Episcopalian) Church of Boston. All this gives the group its much-vaunted air of respectability, which insurance company executive s must carry, and as we shall see, in addition to James Houghton, Keith Funston and John Harper, both on Corning's board, run the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

The MASSIVE gridding and interfacing of just this one single unit of the Committee of 300 will give us a good indication of the vast power at the disposal of the conspirators' hierarchy, before which all knees are bowed, including the knee of the President of the United States, whomever that happens to be.

What is important to note is how this American company, one of HUNDREDS, is interfaced with British intelligence, with Canada, the Far East and South Africa, not to mention its gridding of corporate officials and directors reaching into every aspect of business and politics in the United States.

While Metropolitan Life Insurance Company does not begin to compare with the Committee of 300's giant Assicurazioni Generale, it is nevertheless a good indicator of how the Houghtons'power extends right across the business spectrum of the U.S. and Canada. Starting with R. H. Macy, (whose floor walkers no longer wear red carnations to honor the company's affiliation with Communism), the Royal Bank of Canada, National and Westminster Bank, Intertel (a virulent and vile private intelligence agency), Canadian Pacific, The Reader's Digest, RCA, AT&T, the Harvard Business School, W. R. Grace Shipping Company, Ralston Purina Company, U.S. Steel, Irving Trust, Consolidated Edison of New York and ABC, the Houghtons' power grid extends as far as the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank.

Another successful Rank company in the United States is the Reliance Insurance Group. As an integral part of the Strategic Bombing Survey, Reliance established the initial structural base for brainwashing, opinion-making, polling, survey and the systems analysis used by the Tavistock Institute in the United States. The Reliance Insurance Company, based in Philadelphia, set up the corporate structure which enabled the Strategic Bombing Survey to be turned against the people of the United States who, although unaware of it, have been subjected to savage psychological warfare for the past 45 years.

A key operative in this assault on the United States was David Bialkin of the Committee of 300 law firm, Wilkie, Farr and Gallagher. Bialkin ran the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) for many years. The ADL is a British intelligence operation founded in the U.S. by MI6 and run by Saul Steinberg and Eric Trist of Tavistock. Saul Steinberg is the U.S. representative and business partner of the Jacob de Rothschild family of London.

Reliance Corporation is home for Carl Lindner who succeeded Eli Black when he "fell" from a 44th floor window of a New York skyscraper. Reliance Company interfaces with the powerful United Fruit Company of Boston and New Orleans run by Max Fisber who, before be was sheepdipped, was a wellknown Detroit underworld figure. United Fruit Company has long been a conveyer of heroin and cocaine into the U.S. under the expertise of Misbulam Riklis of Rapid American Corporation who masterminds shipments from Canada to the U.S. Remember, all this is under the aegis of a single company, gridding and interfacing with a myriad of smaller companies and operations to give the Committee of 300 full control of a multiplicity of operations, each one carefully interlocked in the grid.

Reliance Group is a spinoff of the parent company whose function it is to brainwash the American people through a network of pollsters and opinion makers and relies on Operations Research for direct links with the Tavistock Institute. Another associate company is Leasco, which is closely interfaced with AT&T, Disclosure Incorporated, Western Union International, Imbucon Ltd and Yankelovich, Skelly and White.

Daniel Yankelovich is the emperor of the polling-opinion making corporate structure in the United States, a vast apparatus which provides "public opinions on social, economic and political matters of substance," to quote Edward Bernays. It was this vast apparatus that turned the majority of Americans, who had never even heard of Saddam Hussein and vaguely knew that Iraq was a country somewhere in the Middle East, into a people howling for his blood and the extermination of Iraq as a nation.

Yankelovich utilized to the full all knowledge gained during the Second World War. As a second-generation warrior, Yankelovich has no equal, which is why ABC polls conducted by his company are always in the forefront of "public opinion." The population of the United States was targeted in the same manner of German worker housing by attacking the sense of reality. This technique is, of course, standard training for certain intelligence groups, which includes the CIA.

Yankelovich's task was to destroy traditional American values and replace them with New Age-Age of Aquarius values. As the Committee of 300's most senior public opinion maker, no one can doubt that Yankelovich has done a superb job.

Probably the best way to explain what methods are used and what results are expected to be achieved is to quote John Naisbitt's work as explained in his "Trend Report." Naisbitt has acted as advisor to Lyndon Johnson, Eastman Kodak, IBM, America Express, the Center for Policy Study, Chase Manhattan, General Motors, Louis Harris Polls, the White House, Institute of Life Insurance, the American Red Cross, Mobil Oil, B.P. and a host of Committee of 300 companies and institutions. His methodology, derived from MI6 Tavistock procedures, is of course not unique:

"I will briefly outline our methodology. In developing Trend Report for our clients we rely mostly on a system of monitoring local events and behavior. We are overwhelmingly impressed with the extent to which this is a bottom-up society, so we monitor what is going on locally, rather than what is going on in Washington or New York. Things start in Los Angeles, in Tampa, in Hartford, in Wichita, Portland, San Diego and Denver. It is a very much 'from the bottom-up' society.

"The tracking concept employed in determining these trends has its roots in WW II. During the war, intelligence experts sought to find a method for obtaining information on enemy nations that public opinion polls would normally have provided. Under the leadership of Paul Lazarsfeld and Harold Laswell, a method was developed for monitoring what was going on in these societies that involved doing a content analysis of the daily press.

"Although this method of monitoring public thinking continues to be the choice of the intelligence community the nation annually spends millions of dollars doing newspaper content analyses in all parts of the world.... The reason this system of monitoring changes in society works so well is that 'news holes' in newspapers is a closed system. For economic reasons the amount of space devoted to news in a newspaper doesn't change over time.

"So when something new is introduced into that news hole, something or a combination of things has to go out or be omitted. The principle involved here is classified as a forced choice within a closed system. In this forced situation societies add new preoccupations and forget old ones. We keep track of the ones that are added and the ones that are given up.

"Evidently, societies are like human beings. I do not know what the number is, but a person can only keep so many problems and concerns in his head at any one time. If new problems or concerns are added, some existing ones must be given up. We keep track of what Americans have given up and have taken up.

"The United States is rapidly shifting from a mass industrial society to an information society and the final impact will be more profound than the 19th century shift from an agricultural to an industrial society. Starting in 1979, the number one occupation in the U.S. became clerking, replacing laborer and farmer. In this latter statement is a brief history of the United States."

It is not by chance that Naisbitt is a member of the Club of Rome and, as such, a "senior staffer" of the Committee of 300. He is also one of the senior vice presidents of Yankelovich, Skelly and White. What Naisbitt is doing is not forecasting trends but MAKING them. We have seen how the industrial base of the United States has been destroyed, starting with the steel industry. In 1982 I wrote a work I called "Death of the Steel Industry," in which I stated that by the mid-1990's, steel production in the U.S. will have declined to a point of no return, and that the auto and housing industries would go the same way.

All this has come to pass, and what we are witnessing today is not an economic recession due not only to unsound economic policies, but the deliberately planned destruction of our industrial base—and along with it the destruction of America's unique middle class—the backbone of the country—which depends on a progressive industrial expansion for growth and for steady employment.

This is one of the reasons why the recession, which started in earnest in January of 1991, has turned into a depression from which the United States as we knew it in the 1960's-1970's will most probably never reappear. The economy will not come out of the depression of 1991 until at least 19951996, at which time the United States will have become an entirely different society from the one it when the recession began.

Opinion makers have played no small part in this war on the United States; we need to examine the role of the Committee of 300 in bringing about these far-reaching changes and how the social engineers have used central systems analyses to keep public opinion from expressing anything other than the policies of the invisible government. How and where did it all begin?

From documents covering the First World War that I was able to gather and examine in the War Office in Whitehall, London, it appears that the Royal Institute for International Affairs was commissioned by the Committee of 300 to do a study of manipulating war information. This task was given to Lord Northcliffe and Lord Rothmere and Arnold Toynbee, who was MI6's agent at the RIIA. Lord Rothmere's family owned a newspaper which was used to support various government positions, so it was thought that the paper could change public perceptions, especially among the ranks of growing opposition to the war.

The project was housed in Wellington House, named after the Duke of Wellesly. American specialists drafted to help Lords Rothmere and Northcliffe included Edward Bernays and Walter Lippman. The group held "brain storming" sessions to work out techniques for mobilizing mass support for the war, especially among the working class people whose sons were expected to go to the slaughter fields of Flanders in record numbers.

Using Lord Rothmere's newspaper, new manipulative techniques were tried out and, after a period of about 6 months, it was apparent that they were a success. What the researchers discovered was that only a very small group of people understood the process of reasoning and the ability to observe the problem as opposed to passing an opinion on it. This, said Lord Rothmere, was the way in which 87% of the British public approached the war, and that the same principle applied not only to the war, but to every conceivable problem in society in general.

In this manner, irrationality was elevated to a high level of public consciousness. The manipulators then played upon this to undermine and distract the grasp of reality governing any given situation and, the more complex the problems of a modern industrial society became, the easier it became to bring greater and greater distractions to bear so that what we ended up with was that the absolutely inconsequential opinions of masses of people, created by skilled manipulators, assumed the position of scientific fact.

Having literally stumbled upon so profound a conclusion, the manipulators put it to one test after another during the war, so that in spite of hundreds of thousands of the youth of Britain being slaughtered on the battlefields of France, there was virtually no opposition to the bloody war. Records of the time show that by 1917, just before the United States entered the war, 94% of the British working class bearing the brunt of the war did not have the faintest idea what they were fighting for, other than the image created by the media manipulators that the Germans were a horrible race, bent upon destroying their monarch and their country, and who had to be wiped off the face of the earth.

Certainly nothing has changed because, in 1991, we had the exact same situation created by the news media which allowed President Bush to flagrantly violate the Constitution in waging a war of genocide against the nation of Iraq with the full consent of 87% of the American people. Woodrow Wilson can be credited—if that is the proper expression to use—of jumping on the public opinion manipulators' band wagon and using it to further the causes whispered in his ear by his controller, Colonel House.

On instructions from President Wilson, or rather Colonel House, the Creel Commission was created and, as far as can bb ascertained, the Creel Commission was the first organization in the United States to use the RIIA techniques and methodology for polling and mass propaganda. The psychological warfare experiments perfected at Wellington House were used in the Second World War with equal success, and have been in continuous use in the massive psychological war against the United States which began in 1946. The methods did not change, only the target. Now it was not German worker housing but the middle class of the United States that became the focus of the attack.

As so often happens, the conspirators could not contain their glee. After WW II, in 1922 to be precise, Lippmann detailed the work done by the RIIA in a book he called "PUBLIC OPINION":

"Public opinion deals with indirect, unseen and puzzling facts, and there is nothing obvious about them. The situations to which public opinion refers are known only as opinions, pictures inside heads of human beings, pictures of themselves, of others, of their needs, purposes and relationships, are their public opinions. These pictures which are acted upon by groups of people, or by individuals acting in the name of groups are PUBLIC OPINION with capital letters. The picture inside the head often misleads men in their dealings with the world outside of their heads."

No wonder Lippmann was chosen to make the people of the United States "like" the Beatles when they arrived on our shores and were thrust upon an unsuspecting country. Combined with the propaganda sent forth night and day from radio and television it was only a comparatively short time before The Beatles became "popular." The technique of radio stations allegedly receiving hundreds of requests from imaging listeners for Beatlemusic, led to charts and ratings for first, the "top ten" and gradually escalated until, by 1992, it has expanded to "the top 40 on the charts."

In 1928, Lippmann's compatriot Edward Bernays wrote a book called "CRYSTALLIZING PUBLIC OPINION" and in 1928 a second book of his was published entitled simply "PROPAGANDA." In it Bernays described his experiences at Wellington House. Bernays was a close friend of Master Manipulator H.G. Wells, whose many quasi-novels were used by Bernays to help formulate mass mind control techniques.

Wells was not shy about his role as a leader in changing lower class society, mainly because he was a close friend of members of the British royal family, and spent a great deal of time with some of the most highly placed politicians of the day, men like Sir Edward Grey, Lord Haldane, Robert Cecil of the Jewish Cecil family that had controlled the British monarchy since a Cecil became the private secretary and lover of Queen Elizabeth I, Leo Amery, Halford Mackinder of MI6 and later head of the London School of Economics, whose pupil Bruce Lockhart would become MI6 controller of Lenin and Trotsky during the Bolshevik Revolution, and even the great man himself, Lord Alfred Milner.

One of Well's favorite watering holes was the prestigious St. Ermins Hotel, meeting place of the Coefficient Club, a club to which certified gentlemen only were admitted and where they met once a month. All of the men mentioned above were members and also members of the Souls Club. Wells claimed that any nation could be defeated, not by direct confrontation but by understanding the human mind—what he called, "the mental hinterlands hidden behind the persona."

With such a powerful backer, Bernays felt confident enough to launch his "PROPAGANDA":

"As civilization becomes more complex, AND AS THE NEED FOR INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT HAS BEEN INCREASINGLY DEMONSTRATED (emphasis added-JC), the technical means have been invented and developed BY WHICH PUBLIC OPINION MAY BE REGIMENTED (emphasis added-JC). With printing press and newspaper, the telephone, telegraph, radio and airplanes, ideas can be spread rapidly, and even instantaneously, across the whole of America." Bernays had not yet seen how much better television, which was to follow, would do the job.

"The conscious and intelligent manipulation of organized habits and opinions of the masses is an important element in a democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT WHICH IS THE TRUE RULING POWER IN OUR COUNTRY." To back up his position, Bernays quoted H. G. Wells' article published in the New York Times in which Wells enthusiastically backed the idea of modern means of communication "opening up a new world of political processes which will allow the common design to be documented and sustained against perversion and betrayal" (of the invisible government).

To continue with the revelations contained in "PROPAGANDA":

"We are governed, our minds are moulded, our tastes formed, our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of. What ever attitude one chooses to take toward this condition, it remains a fact that in almost every act of our daily lives, whether in the sphere of politics or business, our social conduct or our ethical thinking, we are dominated by a relatively small number of persons, a trifling fraction of our hundred and twenty million, who understand the mental processes and social patterns of the masses. It is they who pull the wires which control the public mind, and who harness old social forces and contrive new ways TO BIND AND GUIDE THE WORLD" (emphasis added-JC).

Bernays was not bold enough to tell the world who the "THEY" are who "pull the wires which control the public mind...," but in this book we shall make up for his intentional oversight by disclosing the existence of that "relatively small number of persons," the Committee of 300. Bernays was roundly applauded for his work by the CFR whose members voted to place him in charge of CBS. William Paley became his "undergraduate" and eventually replaced Bernays, having acquired thorough knowledge of the new-science science of public opinion making, which made CBS the leader of the field, a role which CBS television and radio has never relinquished. Political and financial control by the "relatively small number," as Bernays called them, is exercised through a number of secret societies, most notably the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, and perhaps even more importantly, through the Venerable Order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, an ancient order consisting of the British monarch's hand-picked executives chosen for their expertise in areas vital to the continued control of the Committee.

In my work "The Order of St. John of Jerusalem" published in 1986, I described The Order in the following manner:

"...It is therefore not a secret society, except where its purposes have been perverted in the inner councils like the Order of the Garter, which is a prostituted oligarchical creation of the British royal family, which makes a mockery of what the Sovereign Order of St. John of Jerusalem stands for.

"As an example, we find the atheist Lord Peter Carrington, who pretends to be an Anglican Christian but who is a member of the Order of Osiris and other demonic sects, including Freemasonry, installed as a Knight of the Garter at St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, by Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II of England, of the Black Nobility Guelphs, also head of the Anglican Church, which she thoroughly despises."

Carrington was selected by the Committee of 300 to bring down the government of Rhodesia, sign over the mineral wealth of Angola and South West Africa to City of London control, wreck the Argentine and turn NATO into a leftwing political organization beholden to the Committee of 300.

Another strange face we see attaching itself to the Holy Christian Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and I use the word stranger as it is used in the original Hebrew of the Old Testament to denote the lineage of an individual, is that of Major Louis Mortimer Bloomfield, the man who helped plan the murder of John F. Kennedy. We see photos of this "strange" man wearing with pride the Cross of Malta, the same cross worn on the sleeve of the Knights of the Order of the Garter.

We have been so brainwashed that we believe the British royal family is just a nice, harmless and colorful institution, and fail to realize just how corrupt and therefore highly dangerous is this institution called the British Monarchy. The Knights of the Order of the Garter are the INNERMOST circle of the most corrupt public servants who have utterly betrayed the trust placed in them by their nation, their people.

The Knights of the Order of the Garter are the leaders of the Committee of 300, Queen Elizabeth II's most trusted "privy council." When I did my research on the Order of St. John of Jerusalem some years ago, I went to Oxford to talk with one of the Masters who is a specialist on ancient and modern British traditions. He told me that the Knights of the Garter are the inner sanctum, the elite of the elite of Her Majesty's Most Venerable Order of St. John of Jerusalem. Let me say this is not the original order founded by the true Christian warrior, Peter Gerard, but is typical of many fine institutions that are taken over and destroyed from the inside, while yet appearing to the uninitiated to be the original.

From Oxford I went to the Victoria and Albert Museum and gained access to the papers of Lord Palmerston, one of the founders of the Opium Dynasty in China. Palmerston, like so many of his kind, was not only a Freemason, but a dedicated servant of Gnosticism.... Like the present 'royal family,' Palmerston made a pretense of being a Christian but was in fact a servant of Satan. Many satanists became leaders of British aristocracy and made immense fortunes out of the China opium trade.

I learned from the papers in the museum named after Victoria that she changed the name of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem in 1885 in order to break away from the Catholic connection of the Order's founder, Peter Gerard, and renamed it the "Protestant Most Venerable Order of Jerusalem." Membership was open to every oligarchical family that had made its fortune in the China opium trade and every thoroughly decadent family received place in the 'new order.'

Many of these venerable gentlemen were responsible for overseeing the prohibition era in the United States from Canada, where several of its members supplied the whisky ferried to the United States. Notable among this group was Committee of 300 member Earl Haig, who gave his whisky franchise to old Joe Kennedy. Both prohibition and the distilleries who met the demand for alcohol were creations of the British Crown acting through the Committeemen of 300. It was an experiment which became the forerunner of today's drug trade, and the lessons learned from the prohibition era are being applied to the soon to be legalized drug trade.

Canada is the route most used by Far East heroin suppliers. The British Monarchy sees to it that this information never becomes public. Using her powers, Queen Elizabeth rules over Canada through the Governor-General (one wonders how modern Canadians can accept such an archaic arrangement?), who is the Queen's PERSONAL representative, and on down the line to the Privy Council (yet another archaic hang-over from colonialist days) and the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who control Canadian commerce in all of its facets.

Opposition to British rule is suppressed. Canada has some of the most restrictive laws in the world, including so-called "hate crime" laws imposed upon the country by Jewish menbers of the House of Lords in England. At present there are four major trials in various stages in Canada involving persons charged with "hate crimes." These are the Finta, Keegstra, Zundel and Ross cases. Anyone who dares to try and show proof of Jewish control of Canada (which the Bronfmans exercise), is immediately arrested and charged with so-called "hate crimes." This will give us some idea of the vastness of the reach of the Committee of 300 which quite literally sits on top of everything n this world.

Testifying to the truth of this statement is the fact that the Committee of 300 set up the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) under the auspices of the Round Table. This institute is the vehicle for M16-Tavistock black propaganda and wet jobs (an intelligence cover name denoting an operation where bloodshed is required), nuclear and terrorist, which goes to the world's press for dissemination, as well as to government and military establishments.

Membership of IISS includes representatives of 87 major wire services and press associations as well as 138 senior editors and columnists drawn from international newspapers and magazines. Now you know where your favorite columnist gets all of his information and opinions from. Remember Jack Anderson, Tom Wicker, Sam Donaldson, John Chancellor, Mary McGrory, Seymour Hersh, Flora Lewis and Anthony Lewis, et al? The information provided by IISS, especially scenarios like those prepared to blacken President Hussein and to justify the coming attack on Libya and condemn the PLO are all specially tailormade for the occasion. The Mai Lai massacre story published by Seymour Hersh came straight out of IISS, just in case we wrongly suppose that men like Hersh do their own research work.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies is nothing more than a higher echelon opinion-maker as defined by Lippmann and Bernays. Instead of writing books, newspapers report opinions presented by chosen columnists, and IISS was formed to be a coordinating center for not only creating opinions, but to get those opinions and scenarios out much faster and to a greater audience than could be reached by a book, for example. IISS is a good example of the gridding and interfacing of Committee of 300 institutions.

The idea of bringing IISS into being arose at the 1957 Bilderberger meeting. It will be recalled that the Bilderberger Conference is a creation of M16 under the direction of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. The idea came from Alastair Buchan, son of Lord Tweedsmuir. Buchan was chairman at the time, and a board member of the RIIA and a member of the Round Table reportedly very close to the British royal family This was the same conference that welcomed Labour Party leader Dennis Healey to its ranks. Others in attendance were Francois Duchene, whose mentor, Jean Monet Duchenes, ran the Trilateral Commission under the tutelage of H. V. Dicks from Tavistock's Columbus Center.

Among the governing council of this gigantic propaganda opinion-making apparat is included the following:

Frank Kitson, a one time controller of The IRA PROVISIONALS, the man who started the Mau-Mau insurgency in Kenya.

Lazard Freres, represented by Robert Ellsworth.

N. M. Rothschild, represented by John Loudon.

Paul Nitze, representative of Schroeder Bank. Nitze has played a very prominent and substantial role in matters of Arms Control agreements, which have ALWAYS been under the direction of the RIIA.

C. L. Sulzberger of the New York Times.

Stansfield Turner, a former director of the CIA.

Peter Calvocoressi, representing Penguin Books.

Royal Institute for International Affairs, represented by Andrew Schoenberg.

Columnists and Reporters, represented by Flora Lewis, Drew Middleton, Anthony Lewis, Max Frankel.

Daniel Ellsberg.

Henry Kissinger.

Robert Bowie, a former director of the ClA's National Intelligence Estimates.

Flowing from the 1957 Bilderberger meeting, Kissinger was instructed to open a Round Table office in Manhattan, the nucleus of which consisted of Haig, Ellsberg, Halperin, Schlessinger, McNamara and the McBundy brothers. Kissinger was directed to fill all executive positions in the Nixon administration with Round Tablers, loyal to the RIIA and therefore to the Queen of England. It was no accident that Kissinger chose President Nixon's old hangout, the Hotel Pierre, as his center of operations.

The significance of the Round Table-Kissinger operation was thus: On orders of the RIIA chairman Andrew Schoeberg, a block was placed on all agencies involved in intelligence, preventing them from giving information to President Nixon. This meant Kissinger and his staff were getting ALL INTELLIGENCE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC, LAW ENFORCEMENT INFORMATION, INCLUDING FBI DIVISION 5, before any of it was released to the President. This made certain that all M16-controlled terrorist operations in the U.S. would have no chance of being leaked. This was Halperin's bailiwick.

By working this methodology, Kissinger at once established hegemony over the Nixon presidency, and after Nixon was disgraced by the Kissinger group and hounded from office, Kissinger emerged with unprecedented powers such as have not been equaled before or since Watergate. Some of these seldom enumerated powers included the following:

Kissinger ordered National Security Decision Memorandum No. I to be drafted by Halperin, who got the actual wording directly from the RIIA through Round Table circles. The memorandum appointed Kissinger as the supreme U.S. authority, chairman of the Verification Panel. All SALT negotiations were directed from here, using Paul Nitze, Paul Warnke and a nest of traitors inside the Arms Control mission at Geneva.

In addition, Kissinger was appointed to The Vietnam Special Studies Group, which oversaw and made evaluations of all reports, civilian and military, including intelligence reports coming out of Vietnam. Kissinger also demanded and got oversight of the "40 Committee," a super-secret agency that has the task of deciding when and where to initiate covert activities and then monitors the progress of operations it sets in motion.

Meantime Kissinger ordered a blizzard of wire-taps by the FBI, even on his closest assistants, so as to give the impression that he was on top of everything. Most of his circle were told that wiretaps on them were in force. This nearly backfired was an M16 operative by the name of Henry Brandon was ordered wiretapped, but was not informed by Kissinger. Brandon was doubling as a reporter for the London Times and Kissinger very nearly got thrown out because nobody does this to the London Times.

The full story of the Ellsberg break-in and the subsequent Watergating of Nixon is too long to be included here. Suffice to say, Kissinger had control of Ellsberg from the day that Ellsberg was recruited while at Cambridge. Ellsberg had always been a hardliner in favor of the Vietnam War, but was gradually "converted" to a radical leftist activist. His "conversion" was only a shade less miraculous than St. Paul's Damascus Road experience.

The entire spectrum of the new left in the United States was the work of British intelligence M16 acting through Round Table assets and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS). Just as it did with all countries with a republican base, whose policies had to be changed, LPS played a leading role, even as it does today in South Africa and South Korea. Much of IPS's activities are explained in my work "IPS Revisited" published in 1990.

IPS had one main function, that being to sow discord and spread disinformation resulting in chaos. One such program, aimed at America's youth, centered on drugs. Through a series of IPS fronts, acts like the stoning of Nixon's motorcade and a large number of bombings, a climate of deception was effectively created which led a majority of Americans to believe that the United States was under threat from the KGB, the GRU and Cuban DGI. The word went out that a lot of these imaginary agents had close ties to the Democrats through George McGovern. It was in fact, a model disinformation campaign for which M16 is justly famous.

Haldeman, Ehrlichman and Nixon's closest aides had no clue as to what was happening, hence a flurry of statements emanating from the White House that East Germany, The Soviet Union, North Korea and Cuba were training terrorists and funding their operations in the United States. I doubt whether Nixon knew very much about IPS, let alone suspected what it was doing to his presidency. We suffered the same kind of disinformation during the Gulf War when the word went out that terrorists of all stripes were about to invade the United States and blow up everything in sight.

President Nixon was literally left in the dark. He didn't even know that David Young, a Kissinger pupil, was working in the basement of the White House, supervising "leaks." Young was a graduate of Oxford and a long-time Kissinger associate through Round Table assets such as the law firm of Milbank Tweed. President Nixon was no match for the forces arrayed against him under the direction of M16 on behalf of the Royal Institute for International Affairs and hence the British royal family.

About the only thing that Nixon was guilty of, in so far as Watergate is concerned, was his ignorance of what was going on all around him. When James McCord "confessed" to Judge John Sirica, Nixon should have been on to it like a flash that McCord was playing a double game. He ought to have challenged Kissinger about his relationship with McCord there and then. That would have thrown a spanner in the works and derailed the whole M16-Watergate operation.

Nixon did not abuse his presidential powers. His crime was not defending the Constitution of the United States of America and not charging Mrs. Katherine Meyer Graham and Ben Bradley with conspiracy to commit insurrection. Mrs. Katherine Meyer Graham's pedigree is of the most doubtful kind, as "Jessica Fletcher" of "Murder She Wrote" would soon have discovered. But even knowing that, Mrs. Graham's controllers in the Round Table would have fought hard to keep the lid on things. The role of the Washington Post was to keep the pot boiling by one "revelation" after another, thereby engendering a climate of public distrust of President Nixon, even when there was not one shred of evidence to support wrong doing by him.

Yet it shows the immense power of the press, as Lippman and Bernays had quite properly anticipated, in that Mrs. Graham, long suspected of the murder of her husband, Philip L. Graham—officially classed as "suicide"—should have retained any credibility at all. Other traitors who should have been indicted for insurrection and treason were Kissinger, Haig, Halperin, Ellsberg, Young, McCord, Joseph Califano and Chomsky of IPS and those CIA operatives who went to McCord's house and burned all of his papers. Again, it is worth repeating that Watergate, like many other operations we do not have the space to include here, demonstrated the COMPLETE CONTROL exercised over the United States by the Committee of 300.

While Nixon kept company with people like Earl Warren and some Mafia dons who had built Warren's house, that does not mean that he should have been disgraced over the Watergate Affair. My dislike of Nixon stems from his willingness to sign the infamous ABM Treaty in 1972 and his all-too-cozy relationship with Leonid Brezhnev. One of the sorriest slip-ups of the Minority Council was its abject failure to expose the dirty role played by INTERTEL, the Corning Group's ugly private intelligence agency whom we have already met, who "leaked" a lot of Watergate material to Edward Kennedy. Private intelligence agencies like INTERTEL have no right to exist in the United States. They are a MENACE to our right to privacy and an insult to all free men everywhere.

Blame must also fall on those who were supposed to protect President Nixon from the kind of steelmesh net that was thrown around him to isolate him. The intelligence personnel around Nixon were a poor lot who had no knowledge of just how thorough British intelligence operations are; indeed, they had no inkling that Watergate was a British intelligence operation in its entirety. The Watergate plot was a coup-d'etat against the United States of America, as was the murder of John F. Kennedy. Although this fact is not recognized as such today, I am confident that when all the secret papers are finally opened, history will record that two coup-d'etats, one against Kennedy and one against Nixon, did indeed take place, and which in their wake brought the most violent rape and assault on the institutions upon which the Republic of the United States stands.

The individual who most deserves the title of traitor and who is most guilty of sedition is General Alexander Haig. This desk-man office-colonel whose paper-shuffling career did not include commanding any troops in battle, was suddenly thrust upon the scene by the invisible upper-level parallel government President Nixon once described him as a man who had to ask Kissinger's permission to go to the bathroom.

Haig was a product of the Round Table. He was noticed by Round Tabler Joseph Califano, one of Her Majesty's most trusted Round Tablers in the United States. Joseph Califano, legal council of the Democratic National Convention, had actually interviewed Alfred Baldwin, one of the plumbers A MONTH BEFORE THE BURGLARY TOOK PLACE. Califano was stupid enough to write a memorandum on his interview with Baldwin, in which he gave details of information on McCord's background and why McCord had selected Baldwin to be on the "team."

Even more damaging, Califano's memorandum contained full details of transcripts of wiretaps of conversations between Nixon and the reelection committee, all this BEFORE the break-in occurred. Califano should have been indicted on a score of federal offenses; instead he got away cleanly with his criminal activity. Sanctimonious Sam Ervin refused to allow Fred Thompson, Minority Council, to introduce this highly damaging evidence at the Watergate hearings—on the spurious grounds that it was "too speculative."

On Round Table orders, Kissinger had Haig promoted from colonel to four-star general in the most meteoric rise ever recorded in the annals of United States military history, in the course of which Haig was leap-frogged over 280 senior U.S. Army generals and high-ranking officers.

During Haig's "promotion," and as a result of it, 25 senior generals were forced to resign. As a reward for his treachery toward President Nixon, AND THE UNITED STATES, Haig was subsequently given the plum job of Commanding General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces (NATO), although he was THE LEAST QUALIFIED COMMANDER EVER TO HOLD THAT POSITION. Here again he was leap-frogged over 400 senior generals from NATO countries and the United States.

When the news of his appointment reached the Soviet Armed Forces High Command, Marshall Orgakov recalled his three top Warsaw Pact generals from Poland and East Germany, and there was much merrymaking, clinking of glasses and quaffing of champagne until well into the night. All through Haig's tenure as commander of NATO forces the professional elite cadre of the Soviet Armed Forces, men who have never been anything else but professional soldiers, held Haig in the utmost contempt and openly referred to him as the "office manager of NATO." They knew that Haig owed his appointment to the RIIA and not to the United States military.

But before his military promotion took him out of Washington, let it be known that Alexander Haig, in conjunction with Kissinger, all but destroyed the office of the President of the United States and its government. The chaos left by Kissinger and Haig in the wake of Watergate has never been chronicled to the best of my knowledge. On the insistence of the RIIA, Haig virtually took over the management of the Government of the United States after the April 1973 coup d'etat. Bringing 100 Round Table agents chosen from the Brookings Institution, Institute Policy Studies and the Council on Foreign Relations, Haig filled the top one hundred posts in Washington with men who, like himself, were beholden to a foreign power. In the ensuing debacle, the Nixon Administration was torn asunder and the United States along with it.

Thrusting aside the pious platitudes and posturings of defending the Constitution, Senator Sam Ervin did more to change the United States than anything President Nixon was alleged to have done, and the United States has not yet recovered from the near-mortal wound of Watergate, a Committee of 300 sponsored operation conducted by the Royal Institute for International Affairs, the Round Table and "hands on" M16 officers based in the United States.

The way President Nixon was first isolated, surrounded by traitors and then confused, followed to the letter the Tavistock method of gaining full control of a person according to the methodology laid down by Tavistock's chief theoretician, Dr. Kurt Lewin. I have already given details of Lewin's methodology elsewhere in this book, but in view of the text-book case of President Richard M.Nixon, I think it is worth repeating:

"One of the main techniques for breaking morale through a strategy of terror consists in exactly this tactic—keep the person hazy as to where he stands and just what he may expect. In addition, if frequent vacillations between severe disciplinary measures and promises of good treatment together with the spreading of contradictory news, make the cognitive structure of this situation utterly unclear, then the individual may cease even to know a particular plan would lead toward or away from his goal. Under these conditions even those individuals who have definite goals and are ready to take risks are paralyzed by severe inner conflict in regard to what to do."

Kissinger and Haig followed Tavistock training manuals to the letter. The result was a distraught, confused, frightened and demoralized President Nixon, whose only course of action—he was told by Haig—was to resign. In 1983 I wrote two works, "The Tavistock Institute: Sinister and Deadly" and "The Tavistock Institute: Britain's Control of U.S. Policy," based upon Tavistock secret manuals which had fallen into my hands. Tavistock Institute's methods and actions are spelled out in these two works.

So successfully were Tavistock methods applied to unseat President Nixon that the people of this nation fully believed the calumny of lies, distortions and set-piece contrived situations mounted by the conspirator as truth, when in fact Watergate was a diabolical lie from end to end. It is important to stress this because we have certainly not seen the last of Watergate-type operations.

What were the alleged impeachable offenses committed by President Nixon, and the so-called "smoking gun" evidence which was supposed to back up the charges? First, the "smoking gun." This piece of FICTION was created by Kissinger and Haig around the June 23rd tape, which Haig coerced Nixon into surrendering to Leon Jaworski.

Haig spent hours convincing President Nixon that this tape would sink him, because it proved "beyond any doubt" that Nixon was guilty of serious wrong doing and a co-conspirator in the Watergate break-in. President Nixon's first response was to tell Haig, "It's utter nonsense to make such a big deal of this," but Haig chipped away until Nixon became convinced that he could not make a successful defense before the Senate, based solely on this particular June 23rd tape!

How had Haig accomplished his mission? Acting out a scenario prepared for him by his Round Table controllers, Haig had an unedited transcript of the "smoking gun" tape typed by his staff. In reality there was nothing in the tape that President Nixon could not have explained. Sensing this, Haig then circulated his unauthorized unedited transcript of the tape among Nixon's staunchest supporters in the House and Senate and the Republican Party high command. Peppered with "smoking gun" and "devastating," and coming from Nixon's trusted aide, the transcript had the effect of a falcon hitting a flock of pigeons; Nixon's supporters panicked and ran for cover.

Following up his sedition and insurrection, Haig summoned to his office Congressman Charles Wiggins, a staunch Nixon supporter who had agreed to lead the fight in the House to head off impeachment proceedings. In a bare-faced blatant lie, Wiggins was informed by Haig, "The fight is lost." After that Wiggins lost all interest in defending Nixon, believing that Nixon himself had agreed to give up. Haig then dealt with Senator Griffin, a leading supporter of the president in the Senate in the same way. AS A RESULT OF HAIG'S SEDITIOUS, TREASONOUS ACTIVITIES, SENATOR GRIFFIN IMMEDIATELY WROTE A LETTER TO PRESIDENT NIXON CALLING UPON HIM TO RESIGN.

THREE MONTHS EARLIER, Round Table controlled Institute for Policy Studies, child of James Warburg, founder and a fellow, Marcus Raskin, delivered EXACTLY the same ultimatum that President Nixon resign, using the British intelligence propaganda journal, The New York Times of May 25th to deliver the ultimatum. The Watergate tragedy was a step in the irreversible transition to barbarism which is enveloping the United States, and which is leading us into the One World Government New World Order. The United States is now at the same place that Italy found itself when Aldo Moro tried to rescue it from created instability.

With what wrongdoing was Nixon charged? John Doar, whose brutish character was well-suited to his task of bringing so-called articles of impeachment against the president, was the author and finisher of one of the most far-reaching ILLEGAL domestic surveillance counterintelligence operations ever run in the United States.

Heading the Interdepartmental Intelligence Unit (IDIU), Doar garnered information from every conceivable agency of the federal government, including the Internal Revenue Service. The program was linked to the Institute for Policy Studies. One of the highlights of John Doar's career was to provide the CIA—which is forbidden by law to engage in domestic surveillance, with 10,000-12,000 names of citizens he suspected as political dissidents, for further investigation.

On July 18th, 1974, this great upholder of the law, with measured pomposity, delivered the "charges" against President Nixon, which episode was nationally televised. THERE WAS NOT A SINGLE PIECE OF EVIDENCE THAT NIXON HAD DONE ANYTHING IMPEACHABLE; indeed, Doar's pathetic litany of Nixon's alleged "crimes" were so trivial that it is a wonder the proceedings went beyond this point. Income tax fiddling, unauthorized bombing of Cambodia and a vague "abuse of power" charge that would never have stuck in a court of law was the best that Doar could do. The United States was as unstable as it would ever be when President Nixon resigned on August 8th, 1974.

Nowhere more so than in our economic and fiscal policies. In 1983 the international bankers met in Williamsburg, Virginia to work out a strategy to prepare the United States for a total disintegration of its banking system. This planned event was to stampede the U.S. Senate into accepting control of our monetary and fiscal policies by the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Dennis Weatherstone of Morgan Guarantee on Wall Street stated that he was convinced this was the only way for the United States to save itself.

The proposal was endorsed by the Ditchley Group which had its beginning in May of 1982 at Ditchley Park in London. On January lOth-11th, l983, this alien group met in Washington D.C., in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Clayton Act, and conspired to overthrow the sovereignty of the United States of America in its monetary and financial freedom. The United States Attorney General knew of the meeting and its purpose. Instead of charging members of the group with conspiracy to commit a federal crime, he simply looked the other way.

Under the abovementioned acts, proof of a conspiracy is all that is needed for a felony conviction, and there was ample evidence that a conspiracy did indeed take place. But as the Ditchley Foundation had met at the request of the Royal Institute for International Affairs and was hosted by the Round Table, no one in the Justice Department had the courage to take action as required by those who had sworn to uphold the laws of the United States.

The Ditchley Plan to usurp control of the fiscal and monetary policies of the United States was the brainchild of Sir Harold Lever, a strong backer of Zionism and a close confidant of members of the British royal family and a member of the Committee of 300. Sir Harold Lever was a director of the giant UMILEVER conglomerate, an important Committee of 300 company. Lever's plan called for the IMF's influence to be broadened so that it could influence central banks of all nations, including the U.S. and guide them into the hands of a One World Government bank.

This was considered a vital step in bringing about a situation where the IMF would become the supreme arbiter of world banking. The ultra-secret January meeting was preceded by an earlier meeting in October 1982, and was attended by representatives of 36 of the world's top banks who met at the New York Vista Hotel. Security for the October 26th-27th seminar was as tight as anything ever seen in the Big Apple. This earlier Ditchley Group meeting also violated United States law.

Addressing the meeting, Sir Harold Lever said it was essential that national sovereignty as an archaic hang-over must be ended before the year 2000. "The United States will soon have to realize that it will be no better than any Third World country when the IMF takes control," said Sir Harold. It was later reported to the delegates that plans to appoint the IMF as the controller of United States fiscal policies were being readied to bring before the United States Senate by the year 2000.

Rimmer de Vries, speaking for Morgan Guarantee, said it was high time that the United States became a member of the Bank of International Settlements. "There must be a reconsideration of U.S. hesitancy over the past 50 years," De Vries declared. Some British and German bankers, fearing possible violations of U.S. law, said that the Ditchley Group is nothing but a committee to iron out exchange rate problems. Felix Rohatyn also spoke of the great need to change U.S. banking laws so that the IMF could play a greater role in this country. Rohatyn headed Lazard Freres, a Club of Rome bank and part of the Eagle Star Group which we have already met.

Round Tablers William Ogden and Werner Stang spoke enthusiastically in support of surrendering U.S. fiscal sovereignty to the International Monetary Fund and the Bank of International Settlements. Delegates representing the Alpha ranking Group, a P2 Freemasonry bank, said the United States must be forced to surrender to "the higher authority of a world bank," before any progress toward the New World Order could be made.

On January 8th, 1983, before their big meeting on January lOth-11th, Hans Vogel, a leading Club of Rome member, was received at the White House. President Ronald Reagan had invited George Schultz, Caspar Weinberger, George Kennan and Lane Kirkland to be present at his meeting with Vogel, who explained to President Reagan what the aims and objectives of the Ditchley Group were. From that day, President Reagan did an about face and worked with the Committee of 300's various agencies to advance the International Monetary Fund and the Bank of International Settlements as the authority on U.S domestic and foreign monetary policies.

The invisible government of the Committee of 300 has put tremendous pressure on America to change its ways—for the worse. America is the last bastion of freedom and unless our freedoms are taken away from us, progress toward a One World Government will be considerably slowed. Such an undertaking as a One World Government is a massive one, requiring a great deal of skill, organizing abilities, control of governments and their policies. The only organization that could possibly have undertaken this mammoth task with any hope of success is the Committee of 300, and we have seen just how far it has come toward total success.

Above all, the battle is a spiritual one. Unfortunately, the Christian churches have become little more than social clubs run by the infinitely evil World Council of Churches (WCC), whose beginnings lie not in Moscow but in the City of London, as we see from the chart at the end of the book which gives the structure of the One World Government Church. This body was set up in the 1920's to serve as a vehicle for One World Government policies, and stands as a monument to the long-range planning capabilities of the Committee of 300.

Another corrupt body similar in structure and design to the WCC is the Union of Concerned Scientists, set up by the Trilateral Commission, and funded by the Carnegie Endowment Fund, the Ford Foundation and Aspen Institute. This is the group that has led the fight to prevent the United States from mounting an effective deterrent against Soviet Cosmospheres, space-based laser beam weapons which can destroy selected targets in the United States or elsewhere from outer space.

The United States SDI program was designed to counter the threat posed by Soviet Cosmospheres, a threat which still exists in spite of the assurances that "communism is dead." Soviet spokesman Georgi Arbatov told a meeting of the Union of Concerned Scientists that it is important for them to oppose the SDI program, because if the SDI program became operational, "it will be a military catastrophe." Year after year the Union of Concerned Scientists has opposed every budget which included funding for the vital SDI program, until by the end of 1991, there is not even enough money to fund further research still required let alone place the system in orbit. The Union of Concerned Scientists is run by the Royal Institute for International Affairs and is heavily infiltrated with M16 British intelligence agents.

There is not one single aspect of life in America that is not watched over, steered in the "right" direction, manipulated, and controlled by the invisible government of the Committee of 300. There is not one elected official or political leader that is not subject to its rule. No one thus far has got away with defying our secret rulers, who do not hesitate to make "a horrible example" of anyone, including the President of the United States of America.

From 1776 when Jeremy Bentham and William Petty, the Earl of Shelburne, fresh from the triumph of the French Revolution which they planned and ran, were drafted by the British Crown to bring their combined experience to bear against the colonists, to 1812 when the British sacked and burned Washington, destroying secret documents that would have exposed the treason being worked against the young United States of America to the Watergating of President Nixon and assassination of President Kennedy, the hand of the Committee of 300 is clearly visible. This book is an attempt to open the eyes of the American people to this terrible truth: We are not an independent nation, nor can we ever be, as long as we are ruled by an invisible government, the Committee of 300.

TAVISTOCK INSTITUTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

FLOW LABORATORIES

Gets contracts from the National Institute of Health.

MERLE THOMAS CORPORATION

Gets contracts from the U.S. Navy, analyzes data from satellites.

WALDEN RESEARCH

Does work in the field of pollution control.

PLANNING RESEARCH CORPORATION, ARTHUR D. LITTLE, G.E. "TEMPO," OPERATIONS RESEARCH INC.

Part of approximately 350 firms who conduct research and conduct surveys, make recommendations to government.

They are part of what President Eisenhower called "a possible danger to public policy that could itself become captive of a scientific-technological elite."

BROOKINGS INSTITUTION

Dedicates its work to what it calls a "national agenda." Wrote President Hoover's program, President Roosevelt's "New Deal," the Kennedy Administration's "New Frontiers" program (deviation from it cost John F. Kennedy his life), and President Johnson's "Great Society." Brookings has been telling the United States Government how to conduct its affairs for the past 70 years and is still doing so on behalf of the Committee of 300.

HUDSON INSTITUTE

Under the direction of Herman Khan, this institution has done more to shape the way Americans react to political and social events, think, vote and generally conduct themselves than perhaps any except the BIG FIVE. Hudson specializes in defense policy research and relations with the USSR. Most of its military work is classified as SECRET. (One idea during the Vietnam War was to build a moat around Saigon.) Some of its earlier papers were entitled "Stability and Tranquility Among Older Nations," and "Analytical Summary of U.S. National Security Policy Issues."

Hudson prides itself on its diversity; it helped NASA with its space programs and helped to promote new youth fashions and ideas, youth rebellion and alienation for the Committee of 300, ostensibly funded by Coca Cola. Hudson may be quite properly classified as one of the Committee of 300's BRAIN-WASHING establishments. Some of its nuclear war scenarios make for very interesting reading and, if they can be obtained, I would recommend "The 6 Basic Thermonuclear Threats" and "Possible Outcomes of Thermonuclear War" and one of its more frightening papers entitled "Israeli-Arab Nuclear War."

Hudson also does corporate advising for Committee of 300 companies, Rank, Xerox, General Electric, IBM and General Motors, to name but a few of them, but its really big client remains the U. S. Department of Defense which includes matters of civil defense, national security, military policy and arms control. To date it has not got into "wet NASA," that is to say, the National Oceanographic Agency.

NATIONAL TRAINING LABORATORIES

NTL is also known as the International Institute for Applied Behavioral Sciences. This institute is definitely a brainwashing center based on Kurt Lewin principles which include so-called T-Groups (training groups), artificial stress training whereby participants suddenly find themselves immersed in defending themselves against vicious accusations. NTL takes in the National Education Association, the largest teacher-group in the United States.

While officially decrying "racism," it is interesting to note that NTL, working with NEA, produced a paper proposing education vouchers which would separate the hard-to-teach children from the brighter ones, and funding would be allocated according to the number of difficult children who would be separated from those who progressed at a normal rate. The proposal was not taken up.

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA, WHARTON SCHOOL OF FINANCE & COMMERCE

Founded by Eric Trist, one of the "brain trusts" of Tavistock, Wharton has become one of the more important Tavistock institutions in the U.S. in so far as "Behavioral Research" is concerned. Wharton attracts clients such as the U.S. Department of Labor—which it teaches how to produce "cooked" statistics at the Wharton Econometric Forecasting Associates Incorporated. This method is very much in demand as we come to the close of 1991 with millions more out of work than is reflected in USDL statistics.

Wharton's ECONOMETRIC MODELING is used by every major Committee of 300 company in the United States, Western Europe and by the International Monetary Fund, the United Nations and the World Bank. Wharton has produced such noteworthy persons as George Schultz and Alan Greenspan.

INSTITUTE FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

This is the institute set up by "brain trusters" from Tavistock Rensis Likert, Dorwin Cartwright and Ronald Lippert. Among its studies are "The Human Meaning of Social Change," "Youth in Transition" and "How Americans View Their Mental Health." Among the institute's clients are The Ford Foundation, U.S. Department of Defense, U.S. Postal Service and the U.S. Department of Justice.

INSTITUTE FOR THE FUTURE

This is not a typical Tavistock institution in that it is funded by the Ford Foundation, yet it draws its long-range forecasting methodology from the mother of all think tanks. Institute for the Future projects what it believes to be changes that will be taking place in time frames of fifty years. The institute is supposed to be able to forecast socioeconomic trends and to blow the whistle on any departures from what it has laid down as normal.

Institute for the Future believes it is possible and normal to intervene now and give decisions for the future. So-called "Delphi Panels" decide what is normal and what is not, and prepare position papers to "steer" government in the right direction to head off such groups as "people creating civil disorder." (This could be patriotic groups demanding abolition of graduated taxes, or demanding that their right to bear arms is not infringed.)

The institute recommends actions such as liberalizing abortion laws, drug usage and that cars entering an urban area pay tolls, teaching birth control in public schools, requiring registration of firearms, making the use of drugs a non-criminal offense, legalizing homosexuality, paying students for scholastic achievements, making zoning controls a preserve of the state, offering bonuses for family planning and last, but by no means least, a Pol Pot Cambodia-style proposal that new communities be established in rural areas. As will be observed, many of the Institute for the Future's goals have already been more than fully realized.

INSTITUTE FOR POLICY STUDIES (IPS)

One of the "Big Three," IPS has shaped and reshaped United States policies, foreign and domestic, since it was founded by James P. Warburg and the Rothschild entities in the United States, bolstered by Bertrand Russell and the British Socialists through its networks in America which include the League for Industrial democracy in which Leonard Woodcock played a leading, if behind-the-scenes role. Local lead players in the League for Industrial Democracy included "conservative" Jeane Kirkpatrick, Irwin Suall (of the ADL), Eugene Rostow (Arms Control negotiator), Lane Kirkland (Labor leader), and Albert Shanker.

For record purposes only, IPS was incorporated in 1963 by Marcus Raskin and Richard Barnett, both highly-trained Tavistock Institute graduates. Most of the funding came from Rothschild associates in America like the James Warburg Family, the Stern Family Foundation and the Samuel Rubin Foundation. Samuel Rubin was a registered member of the Communist Party who stole the Faberge name (Faberge was "Jeweler of the Imperial Russian Court") and made a fortune out of the Faberge name.

The objectives of IPS came from an agenda laid down for it by the British Round Table, which agenda in turn came from Travistock Institute, one of the most notable being to create the "New Left" as a grass roots movement in the U.S. IPS was to engender strife and unrest and spread chaos like a wildfire out of control, proliferate the "ideals" of left wing nihilistic socialism, support unrestricted use of drugs of all types, and be the "big stick" with which to beat the United States political establishment.

Barnett and Raskin controlled such diverse elements as the Black Panthers, Daniel Ellsberg, National Security Council staff member Halperin, The Weathermen Underground, the Venceramos and the campaign staff of candidate George McGovern. No scheme was too big for IPS and its controllers to take on and manage.

Take the plot to "kidnap" Kissinger, which was in the hands of Eqbal Ahmed, a British M16 intelligence agent of Pakistani origin, laundered through "TROTS" (Trotskyite terrorists based in London). The "plot" was "discovered" by the FBI so that it could not go too far. Ahmed went on to become the director of one of IPS's most influential agencies, The Transnational Institute which, chameleon-like, changed from its former name, Institute of Race Relations, when intelligence agents of BOSS (Bureau of State Security) in South Africa unmasked the fact that it was tied directly to Rhodes Scholarship-Harry Oppenheimer and Anglo-American-British mining interests in South Africa. BOSS also discredited the South Africa Foundation at the same time.

Through its many powerful lobbying groups on Capitol Hill, IPS relentlessly used its "big stick" to beat Congress. IPS has a network of lobbyists, all supposedly operating independently but in actual fact acting cohesively, so that Congressmen are pummeled from all sides by seemingly different and varied lobbyists. In this way, IPS was, and is still, able to successfully sway individual Representatives and Senators to vote for "the trend, the way things are going." By using key point men on Capitol Hill, IPS was able to break into the very infrastructure of our legislative system and the way it works.

To give only a single concrete example of what I am talking about: in 1975, an IPS point man persuaded representative John Conyers (D-Michigan) and forty-seven members of the House to request IPS to prepare a budget study that would oppose the budget being prepared by President Gerald Ford. Although not adopted, the request was reinstated in 1976, 1977, and 1978 gathering sponsors as it went.

Then in 1978, fifty-six Congressmen signed their names to sponsor an IPS budget study. This was prepared by Marcus Raskin. Raskin's budget called for a fifty percent cut in the Defense Budget, a socialist housing program "that would compete with and steadily replace private housing and mortgage markets," a national health service, "radical changes in the educational system that would disrupt capitalist control over the distribution of knowledge," and several other radical ideas.

The influence of IPS on Arms Control negotiations was a major factor in getting Nixon to sign the treasonous ABM Treaty in 1972, which left the United States virtually defenseless against ICBM attack for almost 10 years. IPS became, and remains to this day one of the most prestigious "think tanks" controlling foreign policy decisions, which we, the people, foolishly believe are those of our law makers.

By sponsoring militant activism at home and with links to revolutionaries abroad, by engineering such victories as "The Pentagon Papers," besieging the corporate structure, bridging the credibility gap between underground movements and acceptable political activism, by penetrating religious organizations and using them to sow discord in America, such as radical racial politics under the guise of religion, using the establishment media to spread IPS ideas, and then supporting them, IPS has lived up to the role which it was founded to play.

STANFORD RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Jesse Hobson, the first president of Stanford Research Institute, in a 1952 speech made it clear what lines the institute was to follow. Stanford can be described as one of the "jewels" in Tavistock's Crown in its rule over the United States. Founded in 1946 immediately after the close of WW II, it was presided over by Charles A. Anderson, with emphasis on mind control research and "future sciences." Included under the Stanford umbrella was Charles F. Kettering Foundation which developed the "Changing Images of Man" upon which the Aquarian Conspiracy rests.

Some of Stanford's major clients and contracts were at first centered around the defense establishment but, as Stanford grew, so did the diversity of its services:

Applications of Behavioral Sciences to Research Management.
Office of Science and Technology.
SRI Business Intelligence Program.
U.S. Department of Defense Directorate of Defense Research and Engineering.
U.S. Department of Defense Office of Aerospace Research.
Among corporations seeking Stanford's services were Wells Fargo Bank, Bechtel Corporation, Hewlett Packard, Bank of America, McDonnell-Douglas Corporation, Blyth, Eastman Dillon and TRW Company. One of Stanford's more secret projects was extensive work on chemical and bacteriological warfare (CAB) weapons.

Stanford Research is plugged into at least 200 smaller "think tanks" doing research into every facet of life in America. This is known as ARPA networking and represents the emergence of probably the most far-reaching effort to control the environment of every individual in the country. At present Stanford's computers are linked with 2500 "sister" research consoles which include the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), Bell Telephone Laboratories, U.S. Army Intelligence, the Office of Naval Intelligence (ONI), RANI), MIT, Harvard and UCLA. Stanford plays a key role in that it is the "library," cataloging all ARPA documentation.

"Other agencies"—and one can use one's imagination here, are allowed to search through SRI's "library" for key words, phrases, look through sources and update their own master files with those of Stanford Research Center. The Pentagon, for instance, uses SRI's "master files" extensively, and there is little doubt that other U.S. Government agencies do the same. Pentagon "command and control" problems are worked out by Stanford.

While ostensibly these apply only to weapons and soldiers, there is absolutely no guarantee that the same research could not, and will not, be turned to civilian applications. Stanford is known to be willing to do anything for anyone, and it is my belief that if ever SRI were to be fully exposed, the hostility which would arise from revelations as to what it actually does would most probably force SRI to close.

MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY, ALFRED P. SLOAN SCHOOL OF MANAGEMENT

This major institute is not generally recognized as being a part of Tavistock U.S.A. Most people look upon it as a purely American institution, but that is far from being the case. MIT-Alfred Sloan can be roughly divided into the following groups:

Contemporary Technology.
Industrial Relations.
Lewin Group Psychology.
NASA-ERC Computer Research Laboratories.
Office of Naval Research Group, Psychology.
Systems Dynamics. Forrestor and Meadows wrote The Club of Rome's "Limits of Growth" zero growth study.

Some of MIT's clients include the following:
American Management Association.
American Red Cross.
Committee for Economic Development.
GTE.
Institute for Defense Analysis (IDA).
NASA.
National Academy of Sciences.
National Council of Churches.
Sylvania.

TRW.
U.S. Army.
U.S. Department of State.
U.S. Navy.
U.S. Treasury.
Volkswagen Company.

So vast is the reach of IDA that it would take hundreds of pages to describe the activities in which it is engaged, and IDA is fully described in my book on the role played by Institutions and Foundations in committing treason against the United States of America, which will be published early in 1992.

RAND RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Without a doubt, RAND is THE think tank most beholden to Tavistock Institute and certainly the RIIA's most prestigious vehicle for control of United States policies at every level. Specific RAND policies that became operative include our ICBM program, prime analyses for U.S. foreign policy making, instigator of space programs, U.S. nuclear policies, corporate analyses, hundreds of projects for the military, the Central lntelligence Agency (CIA) in relation to the use of mind altering drugs like peyote, LSD (the covert MK-Ultra operation which lasted for 20 years).

Some of RAND's clients include the following:
American Telephone and Telegraph Company (AT&T).
Chase Manhattan Bank.
International Business Machines (IBM).
National Science Foundation.
Republican Party.
TRW.
U.S. Air Force.
U.S. Department of Energy.
U.S. Department of Health.

There are literally THOUSANDS of highly important companies, government institutions and organizations that make use of RAND's services, and to list them all would be an impossible task. Among RAND's "specialities" is a study group that predicts the timing and the direction of a thermonuclear war, plus working out the many scenarios based upon its findings. RAND was once accused of being commissioned by the USSR to work out terms of surrender of the United States Government, an accusation that went all the way to the United States Senate, where it was taken up by Senator Symington and subsequently fell victim to articles of scorn poured out by the establishment press. BRAIN WASHING remains the primary function of RAND.

To summarize, the major Tavistock institutions in the United States engaged in brainwashing at all levels, including government, the military, business, religious organizations and education are the following:

Brookings Institution.
Hudson Institute.
Institute for Policy Studies.
Massachusetts Institute of Technology.
National Training Laboratories.
Rand Research and Development Corporation.
Stanford Research Institute.
Wharton School at University of Pennsylvania.

It is estimated by sources of mine that the total number of people employed by these institutions is in the region of 50,000 with funding close to $lO billion dollars.

Some major world-wide Committee of 300 institutions and organizations are as follows:

Americans for a Safe Israel.
Biblical Archaeology Review.
Bilderbergers.
British Petroleum.
Canadian Institute of Foreign Relations.
Christian Fundamentalism.
Council on Foreign Relations, New York.
Egyptian Exploration Society.
Imperial Chemical Industries.
International Institute for Strategic Studies.
Order of Skull and Bones.
Palestine Exploration Fund.

Poor Knights of the Templars
Royal Dutch Shell Company.
Socialist International.
South Africa Foundation.
Tavistock Institute of Human Relations.
Temple Mount Foundation.
The Atheist Club.
The Fourth State of Consciousness Club.
The Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.
The Milner Group.
The Nasi Princes.
The Order of Magna Mater.
The Order of the Divine Disorder.
The RIIA.
The Round Table.
Trilateral Commission.
Universal Freemasonry.
Universal Zionism.
Vickers Armament Company.
Warren Commission.
Watergate Committee.
Wilton Park.
World Council of Churches.

CONSPIRATORS' HIERARCHY: THE COMMITTEE OF 300
BIBLIOGRAPHY, SUMMARIES AND NOTES

1980'S PROJECT, Vance, Cyrus and Yankelovich, Daniel.

1984, Orwell, George.

AFTER TWENTY YEARS: THE DECLINE OF NATO AND THE SEARCH FOR A NEW POLICY IN EUROPE, Raskin, Marcus and Barnett, Richard.

AIR WAR AND STRESS, Janus, Irving.

AN AMERICAN COMPANY; THE TRAGEDY OF UNITED FRUIT, Scammel, Henry and McCann, Thomas.

AN INTRODUCTlON TO THE PRINCIPLES AND MORALS OF LEGISLATION, Bentham, Jeremy. In this 1780 work Bentham claimed that "nature has placed mankind under the governance of two sovereign masters, pain and pleasure... They govern us in all we do." Bentham went on to justify the horrors of the Jacobin terrorists in the French Revolution.

ANNUAL REPORT OF BANK LEUMI, 1977.

AT THAT POINT IN TIME: THE INSIDE STORY OF THE SENATE WATERGATE COMMITTEE, Thompson, Fred. I was told where to find Thompson, who was the Minority Counsel on the Ervin Committee, by Bernard Barker, one of the Watergate Burglars. My meeting with Barker took place outside an A&P supermarket quite close to the Coral Gables Country Club in Coral Gables, Florida. Barker said Thompson was with his law partner who was on a short visit to his mother in Coral Gables, which was only about five minutes away from the A&P Supermarket. I went there and met Thompson who expressed his disappointment over the way Ervin had imposed such severe restrictions on evidence he, Thompson, could admit.

BAKU AN EVENTFUL HISTORY, Henry, J. D.

BEASTS OF THE APOCALYPSE, O'Grady, Olivia Maria. This remarkable book gives details about a large number of historical figures, including William C. Bullitt, who conspired with Lloyd George to pull the rug out from under White Russian Generals Denekin and Rangle at a time when they had the Bolshevik Red Army on the very brink of defeat. It also gives a great deal of information about the utterly corrupt Petroleum Industry. Of particular interest is the information it provides on Sir Moses Montefiore, of the ancient Venetian Black Nobility Montefiores.

BRAVE NEW WORLD, Aldous Huxley.

BRITISH OPIUM POLICY IN CHINA, Owen, David Edward.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SOCIOLOGY OF MUSIC, Adorno, Theo. Adorno was kicked out of Germany by Hitler because of his Cult of Dionysus music experiments. He was moved to England by the Oppenheimers where the British royal family gave him facilities at Gordonstoun School and their support. It was here that Adorno perfected "Beatlemusic Rock," "Punk Rock" "Heavy Metal Rock" and all of the decadent clamor that passes for music today. It is worthy of note that the name "The Beatles" was chosen to show a connection between modern rock, the Isis cult and the Scarab Beatle, a religious symbol of ancient Egypt.

THE OPEN CONSPIRACY, Wells, H. G. In this work, Wells describes how in the New World Order (which he calls the New Republic) "useless eaters," excess population, will be gotten rid of:

"The men of the New Republic will not be squeamish either in facing or inflicting death.... They will have an ideal that will make killing worthwhile; like Abraham, they will have the faith to kill, and they will have no superstitions about death.... They will hold, I anticipate, that a certain portion of the population exists only on sufferance out of pity and patience, and, on the understanding that they do not propagate, and I do not foresee any reason to oppose that they will not hesitate to kill when that sufferance is abused.... All such killings will be done with an opiate.... If deterrent punishments are used at all in the code of the future, the deterrent shall be neither death, nor mutilation of the body...but good scientifically caused pain." The United States has a very large contingent of Wells converts who would not hesitate to follow the dictates of Wells, once the New World Order becomes a reality. Walter Lippmann was one of Wells' most ardent disciples.

When it was discovered, Stalin warned that he would not hesitate to retaliate in kind. This led to a quick "rethink" on he part of Russell, who almost overnight became a pacifist thus was born the "Ban the Bomb" Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND) out of which arose the Pugwash antinuclear scientists. In 1957 the first group met at the home of Cyrus Eaton in Nova Scotia, a long-time American Communist. The Pugwash Conferees dedicated themselves to anti-nuclear and environmental issues and were a thorn in the side of U.S. efforts to develop nuclear weapons.

THE WORKS OF JEREMY BENTHAM, Bowering, John. Bentham was the liberal of his day and the agent for Lord Shelburne, British Prime Minister at the end of the American War of Independence. Bentham believed that man was no more than a common animal, and Bentham's theories were later written up by his protege, David Hume. Writing about instinct in animals Hume said, "...which we are so apt to admire as extraordinary and inexplicable. But our wonder will perhaps cease or diminish when we consider that the experimental reasoning itself which we possess in common with beasts, and upon which the whole conduct of life depends, is nothing but a species of instinct, or mechanical power that acts in us unknown to ourselves.... Though the instincts be different, yet still it is an instinct."

TIME PERSPECTIVE AND MORALE, Levin B.

TOWARD A HUMANISTIC PSYCHOLOGY, Cantril.

TREND REPORT, Naisbitt, John.

U.S. CONGRESS, HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL SECURITY, REPORTING ON THE INSTITUTE FOR POLICY STUDIES (IPS) AND THE PENTAGON PAPERS. In the spring of 1970, FBI operative William McDermott went to see Richard Best, who at that time was Rand's top security officer, to warn him of the possibility that Ellsberg had removed Vietnam study papers done by Rand and had copied them outside of Rand premises. Best took McDermott to see Dr. Harry Rowan who headed Rand and who was also one of Ellsberg's closest friends. Rowan told the FBI that a Defense Department inquiry was going on and on his assurance, the FBI apparently dropped its investigation of Ellsberg. In fact, no inquiry was in progress, nor did the DoD ever conduct one. Ellsberg retained his security clearance at Rand and blatantly went on removing and copying Vietnam War documents right up to the time of his exposure during the Pentagon Papers affair which rocked the Nixon Administration to its foundations.

UNDERSTANDING MAN'S SOCIAL BEHAVIOR, Cantril. Cantril was primarily responsible for establishing the Association for Humanistic Psychology based in San Francisco that taught Tavistock methods. It is in institutions of this type that we find the lines between pure science and social engineering become totally obliterated. The term "social engineering" covers every aspect of methods used by Tavistock to bring about massive charges in group orientation toward social, economic, religious and political events and brainwashing of target groups who then believe that opinions expressed and viewpoints taken are their own. Selected individuals underwent the same Tavistockian treatment, resulting in major shifts in personality and behavior. The effect of this on the national scene was, and still is, devastating and is one of the principal factors in bringing the United States into the twilight, decline and fall state-of-being in which the country finds itself at the close of 1991. I did a report on this national condition under the title: "Twilight, Decline and Fall of the United States of America" which was published in l987. The Association for Human Psychology was founded by Abraham Maselov in l957 as a Club of Rome project. Another Tavistock-Club of Rome Commissioned opinion-making research center was established by Risis Likhert and Ronald Lippert who called it The Center for Research in the Utilization of Scientific Knowledge. The facility was under the directorship of Club of Rome's Donald Michael. The center drew heavily on the Office of Public Opinion Research established at Princeton University in l940. It was from here that Cantril taught many of the techniques used by today's pollsters-opinion makers.

THE CASE FOR THE

U F O

Unidentified Flying Objects

By M.K. Jessup

PREFACE

On the evening of April 20, 1959, an astronomer committed suicide in Dade County Park, Florida. Inhaling automobile exhaust fumes, which he had introduced from the tail pipe through a hose into his station wagon, he died in the same academic obscurity in which he had lived, unheralded and almost unrecognized in his discipline.

Ironically, the scientist's only public recognition had come from lay people, who had read his series of four books about unidentified flying objects.

Morris K. Jessup's first book, The Case For the UFO, had tended to alienate him from his colleagues, though it came and went with relatively few sales. Its publisher sold it off to second-hand bookstores at $1.00 each. Today it brings $25.00 or better per copy, if you can find one.

It was a paperback edition of the same book, published in 1955 by Bantam Books that enmeshed Jessup in one of the most bizarre mysteries in UFO history. An annotated reprint of the paperback was laboriously typed out on offset stencils and printed in a very small run by a Garland, Texas manufacturing company which produced equipment for the military.

Each page was run through the small office duplicator twice, once with black ink for the regular text of the book, then once again with red ink, the latter reproducing the mysterious annotations by three men, who may have been gypsies, hoaxters, or space people living among men. The spiral bound 8 ½" X 11" volume, containing more that 200 pages, became known as The Annotated Edition. The reprint quickly became legend. A few civilian UFO enthusiasts claimed to have seen copies, and it was rumored that a few close associates of the late Mr. Jessup possessed copies. Many people claimed it simply had never existed.

Because you are now holding a virtually exact facsimile of The Annotated Edition in your hands, it is most obvious that the book existed. But the big mystery still remains: why did a Government contractor go to so much trouble to reprint a book that had been rejected by the scientific community, and further to include mysterious letters to the author and even more bizarre annotations? And with this mystery goes the suspicion that the book may have been printed by the manufacturer at the request of the military, which implies Government interest in some of the weirdest aspects of "Flying Saucer" study.

Jessup's Background

Not much detail is known of Jessup's life before he emerged as one of the early writers on UFOs, mainly because nobody has taken the trouble to do the needed research. Probably the most that Ufology knows about him prior to his involvement with flying saucers is contained on the jacket flap of his first book.

He is described as having been an instructor in astronomy and mathematics at the University of Michigan and Drake University. The Jacket copy also notes that Jessup completed his thesis for the doctorate degree in astro-physics at the University of Michigan, though it does not state whether on not he was awarded the actual degree. In the academic business, usually the thesis is the thing that comes last, and is the final step in the awarding of the doctorate degree. Sometimes these doctoral candidates are deferentially called "Doctor" by their associates, though it cannot be used officially by them. This would seem to be the case of Jessup, who was often addressed as "Dr. Jessup", but who never used the title in correspondence, nor on the covers or title pages of his four books. Very likely Jessup was never actually awarded the degree.

Apparently, his thesis consisted of a report on his research program which (again according to the book jacket) resulted in several thousand discoveries of physical double-stars "which are now catalogued in the Memoirs of the Royal Astronomical Society of London".

The short biography also lists other important research activities by Jessup. It indicates that he was assigned by the United State Department of Agriculture to study the sources of crude rubber in the headwaters of the Amazon, though no date is given. He made archeological studies of the Maya in the jungles of Central America for the Carnegie Institute of Washington.

Without identifying the source of sponsorship or financing, the jacket states that he explored Inca ruins in Peru, and concluded that the stonework he found there had been "erected by the levitating power of space ships in antediluvian times". Also:

"Mr. Jessup's latest explorations have taken him to the high plateau of Mexico where he has discovered an extensive group of craters. They are as large as, and similar to, the mysterious lunar craters Linne and Hyginus N, and he believes them to have been made by objects from space. They are presently under study by means of aerial photography and the study will be ready for publication in approximately eighteen months".

Apparently the further exploration of the craters was never carried out. According to James W. Moseley, former publisher of Saucer News, Jessup sought university, foundation and private sponsorship of the project, but was unsuccessful in gaining sufficient interest and funds.

The Allende Letters

The mystery of the annotated paperback edition of The Case for the UFO was preceded by a series of strange letters from Carlos Miguel Allende addressed to Jessup. Two of these, reproduced as part of the Annotated Edition, appear in the following pages. The letters claimed that as a result of a strange experiment at sea utilizing principles of Einstein's Unified Field Theory, a destroyer and all its crew became invisible during October, 1943.

"The Field was effective in an oblate spheroidal shape," Allende wrote. He added that "any person within that sphere became vague in form, and that as a result of the experiment some of the crew went insane. Further horrifying aspects of the alleged experiment are detailed in the two letters (See Appendix).

The Allende letters became connected with The Annotated Edition when the Varo Manufacturing Company evidently got in touch with Jessup in regard to the latter.

Varo's unusual involvement in the mystery began a few months after February 1956, In April of that year Admiral N. Furth, Chief of the Office of Naval Research, Washington D.C., received a manila envelope postmarked Seminole, a small town in Texas. Written across its face was the notation "Happy Easter". When Furth opened the envelope he found a copy of the Jessup paperback. We are not certain of Furth's reactions, but we can assume that he thumbed through the book and that his interest was piqued by a series of notes, interjections, underscorings, etc., in three colors of ink, apparently written by three different people. Only the name of one of the authors of the annotations appeared in the notes, that of "Jemi".

The paperback had apparently been passed through the hands of the strange annotators several times. This conclusion could be drawn from the fact that the notes indicated discussions between two or all three of the men, with questions answered, and places where parts of a note had been marked through, underlined, or added to by one or both of the other men. Some had been deleted by marking through.

The notes had a tone of absolute weirdness. Sometimes they agreed with Jessup's original text; sometimes they contradicted it, as they referred to two types of people living in space. They specified two habitats for the space people: underseas, and what they termed the "stasis neutral", the latter term apparently in agreement with Jessup's exposition on points of neutral gravity in space.

They mentioned the building of undersea cities and identified two groups of spacemen, "L-M's" and "S-M's". The "L-M's" were designated as peaceful, the "S-M's" as sinister.

Some of the terms used would have been familiar to any ufologist of the 1950's, yet others expressed an alien-like vocabulary which had never been previously used in "saucer" literature.

Some of the terms were: Mothership, home-ship, dead-ship, great ark, great bombardment, great return, great war, little-men, force-fields, deep freezes, measure markers, scout ships, magnetic and gravity fields, sheet of diamond, cosmic rays, force cutters, inlay work, clear-talk, telepathing, burning "coat", nodes, vortice, magnetic "net".

They explained what happened to people and to ships and planes which had disappeared, as discussed in Jessup's original text – and elaborated upon the origin of odd storms and clouds, objects falling from the sky, strange marks and footprints, and other matters Jessup wrote about.

Two Theories

We do not know Admiral Furth's personal reaction to the strangely marked paperback. The history of this matter, again from a confidential source, next surfaces several months later, in July or August of the same year, when the paperback was passed on to Major Darrel L. Ritter, U.S.M.C., Aeronautical Project Officer of ONR. Soon afterward, and no date is available, Captain Sidney Sherby joined ONR, and, along with Commander George W. Hoover, Special Projects Officer, ONR, indicated interest in the book.

Sherby and Hoover were deeply involved in satellite development, and supervising the systems which would later place the first U.S. satellite into orbit. Some UFO buffs have expressed the belief that they were also coordinating gravity research, and that this was the reason for their interest.

The book was evidently taken to the Varo firm by Sherby, possibly in conjunction with Hoover. At that time, Varo was deeply involved in aero-space design and manufacturing for the military. One division was called "Military Assistance", which may have coordinated the firm's activities with the government, and occasionally performed personal services for military personnel (as any commercial organization might do).

At any rate, the Military Assistance Division agreed to run off a limited number of copies of the annotated book, and it was laboriously typed out my Miss Michael Ann Dunn, personal secretary to the president of the company, a Mr. Stanton. (Incidentally, Miss Dunn no longer is employed by Varo. Varo says that personnel records fails to find a record of her employment!)

Two theories evolve as to Varo's role in publishing the Annotated Edition:

(1) Top military brass passed this down through the lower echelon, thus avoiding the responsibility should there be any publicity, and it was published surreptitiously by Varo, the personnel of which may have had top military security clearance – avoiding sending it to a government printing source, where word might leak out. The Military was interested in applications of the notes to secret research being carried out by the U.S. After printing, the limited edition could be passed around to interested persons, and distributed to other contractors engaged in secret military development.

(2) Lower echelon officers, such as Sherby, had deep personal interests in the UFO mystery, and wanted copies to give to other Naval personnel who held similar interests. As a matter of personal interest, they asked the Varo company to make the reprint, knowing that the contractor would comply, as one of the many personal favors they may have extended to military personnel.

The latter of these alternatives is the writer's best guess. No great degree of secrecy seemed to have been employed. Jessup was called in by Varo and shown the book, and nothing in his subsequent writings or reported conversations indicates he was requested to maintain secrecy. Permission was obtained both from the author and the publisher, Citadel Press, to reproduce the text of the original book. Jessup was given several copies, probably the source of the copies a few UFO researchers reportedly possess.

One such copy, according to Riley H. Crabb, Director of Borderland Sciences Research, has been given to the late Bryant H. Reeves, author of two books published by Ray Palmer.

Crabb told me recently that he saw the Varo Edition while visiting Reeves at his home in Virginia Beach. Reeves agreed to lend the volume for a brief period, and Crabb, who told me he felt that both he and Reeves were "under surveillance", hesitated to carry it with him back to his home in California. He posted it to himself, but it was lost in the mails.

A tradition of bad luck or strange circumstances is connected with possession of the Varo Edition. One person's home, along with the book, was destroyed by fire shortly after he acquired a copy. Capt.

Edward J. Ruppelt, former head of Project Bluebook, suffered a fatal heart attack, allegedly shortly after he read a borrowed copy. Robert Loftin, UFO author, who also died prematurely, was another rumored owner of the book. Of course, except for the deaths, thus is purely hearsay, and, if true, could have been the result of coincidence.

Regardless of the motivation behind printing the Annotated Edition, neither Varo nor the military could foresee the zeal of civilian UFO research in its probing of the matter. Intrigued by the mystery, and questioning the untimely death of Jessup, Ufologists began delving. At least two national magazine articles explored Jessup's death and his connection with the book.

Our Personal Involvement

Our personal involvement with the mystery surrounding Jessup began after we heard of his suicide and began looking into rumors involving the above matters. Our findings became the basis for a book, The Strange Case of Dr. M.K. Jessup, published in 1963 by Saucerian Books, and reprinted in 1965 and 1967.

The book contained a chapter about The Annotated Edition and reproduced the Preface with annotations, though not in facsimile. The Preface was provided by Riley Crabb of the Borderland Sciences Research Associates Foundation, Inc. Our interest continued, though we had never seen an actual copy of The Annotated Edition, and often doubted that it really existed.

One of our correspondents claimed to possess the complete volume in photocopy form and sent us second generation copies of a few pages to prove his point. Brad Steiger provided miniature reproductions of three actual pages to illustrate an article, "Fantastic Key to the Flying Saucer Mystery," in Saga magazine, November, 1967. He noted that the reproductions were from a microfilm copy owned by Stephen Yankee.

We finally acquired one of the rare original copies in 1971 from a friend of the late Mr. Jessup, to whom he had given one of the few copies supplied him by its publisher. Observing the clarity of the printing and the good physical condition of our copy we began exploring the idea of a facsimile reprint.

I am president of a small publishing company, Saucerian Press, Inc., which specializes in limited editions of works pertaining to unidentified flying objects. Sales of these books rarely exceed 2,000 copies, and the main purpose of the publisher is to provide distribution for works, sales of which do not warrant general trade publication.

Publishing a facsimile of The Annotated Edition would present problems. It contained about twice the number of pages of our usual publications; it demanded expensive separation negatives and printing, and its appeal would be much more limited than our usual books. It would demand a run of no more than 500 copies and would have to sell at a relatively high price. While prudence urged that the idea be dropped, two overwhelming considerations urged us on. The original edition of The Case For the UFO had long been out of print, was becoming very rare among antiquarian dealers. The Annotated Edition was almost legendary, surrounded by excessive mystery and controversy, and unavailable to serious students of the UFO mystery, either in libraries or by their own personal acquisition.

In July 1972, Saucerian Press made the positive decision to publish this edition.

The Facsimile Edition

We have reproduced the original as faithfully as possible, within the photo-mechanical means available to us.

The body of the facsimile edition begins with the Introduction on the following page. No information as to the authorship of this Introduction is given in the original. It is, however, competently done, helps to explain what is to follow and comments further upon the arrangement of the volume.

In our original copy the Appendix is bound between the original Introduction to Jessup's text and Part One of the body of the book. While this could be a mistake in binding, the Appendix, consisting of the two Allende letters, does help set the tone and scene for The Annotated Edition and most likely was bound there on purpose. Not having a second coy for comparison, we have included the Appendix at the same place, even though this represents a radical placement.

The writer is happy that this work is going to be printed. He believes it will represent a contribution to the literature of Ufology, some minor monument to those strange and wonderful times that began with Kenneth Arnold in 1947.

INTRODUCTION

Notations that imply intimate knowledge of UFO's their means of motion, their origin, background, history, and habits of beings occupying UFO's provide an interesting subject for investigation. Such notations were found in a copy of the paperback edition of M.K. Jessup's "Case for the UFO's". Because of the importance which we attach to the possibility of discovering clues to the nature of gravity, no possible item, however disreputable from the point of view of classical science, should be overlooked.

The annotated copy, addressed to Admiral N. Furth, Chief, Office of Naval Research, Washington 25, D.C., came in a manila envelope postmarked Seminole, Texas, 1955. Written across the face of the envelope in ink was "Happy Easter." In July or August of that year the book appeared in the incoming correspondence of Major Darrell L. Ritter, U.S.M.C. Aeronautical Project Office in ONR. When Captain Sidney Sherby reported aboard at ONR he obtained the book from Major Ritter. Captain Sherby and Commander George W. Hoover, Special Projects Officer, ONR indicated direct interest in some of the material therein.

Varo Mfg. Co., Garland, Texas, offered to re-publish the book together with all notations in a very limited edition as a prelude to consideration of further pursuit of this unconventional material.

Miss Michael Ann Dunn has undertaken the task of rewriting this book including all notes, interjections, underscoring, and etc. By form, position, color, and footnotes as much of the meaning and relationships of the original annotated copy is retained as possible. No attempt has been made, with ultra violet light or other methods, to read material which has been crossed out by one of the correspondents.

It appears that these notes were written by three persons. The use of three distinct colors of ink--blue, blue-violet, and blue-green-- and the difference in handwriting lead to this conclusion. Hereafter they will be referred to as Mr. A, Mr. B, and Jemi.

It is assumed that the third person was Jemi because of the direct use of "Jemi" in salutations and references to that name by Mr. A (Green) and Mr. B (Blue) throughout the book. There are many, some of which appear on pages 2, 81, 122, 126, and 162 in the original book. It is possible of course that it is merely a salutation.

It is possible that two of these men are twins. There are two references to this word. They appear on page 6 and page 81 of the original book. The assumption that Mr. A is one of the twins may be correct. On page 81, Mr. A has written and marked through "…and I Do Not know How this came to Pass, Jemi." Then he has written, "I remember, My twin…". On page 6 he writes in an apparent answer to Mr. B, "No, My twin…" We cannot be sure of the other twin.

It is probable that these men are Gypsies. In the closing pages of the book Mr. B says, "…only a Gypsy will tell another of that catastrophe. And we are a discredited people, ages ago. Hah! Yet, man wonders where "we" come from…" On page 130 Mr. A. says, "…ours is a way of life, time proven & happy. We have nothing, own nothing except our music & philosophy & are happy." On page 76 Mr. says "Show this to a Brother Gypsy…" On Page 158 the reference to the word "we" by Mr. A could refer to the "discredited people". Charles G. Leland in his book "English Gipsies and Their Language" states that the Gypsies call each other brother and sister, and are not in the habit of admitting to their fellowship people of a different blood and with whom they have no sympathy. This could explain the usage of the term in the closing notes "My Dear Bothers" and perhaps the repeated reference to "vain humankind."

This book was apparently passed through the hands of these men several or many times. This conclusion is drawn from the fact that there are discussions between two or all three of the men, questions answered, and places where parts of a note have been marked through, underlined, or added to by one or both of the other men. Some have been deleted by marking through.

Shortly after the publication of his book, Mr. Jessup received a letter from a Carlos Miguel Allende. (A copy of this letter and the one that followed appear in the appendix.) Mr. Jessup said that he "had felt from the first that this man was the one who mailed the book to the Navy.." Consideration of the handwriting, style, content, and phraseology of both the notes and letter show a distinct possibility that the letter was written by Mr. A. This conclusion comes from the notes by Mr. A on page 130, 117, and 150. These references to Farraday, Hob-mail or cleated shoes, and catching fire are nearly the same as the ones in the letter.

The letter was received by Mr. Jessup in Miami, on Friday January 13, 1956. It was postmarked Gainesville, Texas, and mailed in an envelope of the Turner Hotel, Gainesville. It is copied as nearly verbatim as possible.

Mr. Jessup received a second letter from Mr. Allende postmarked Du Bois, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1956. Due to peculiar spelling and other idiosyncrasies there can be little doubt that Mr. A. and Carlos Allende are the same person.

These men have been careless in their spelling, capitalization, punctuation and sentence structure; though consistency indicates adherence to custom, perhaps dictated by their original language. The notes are arranged as close to the original as possible. In cases where a word or group of words could not be deciphered footnotes were used.

It might seem that the underscore in the book was in the form of a code or that if read separately that it would have a meaning of its own. Superficial examination has failed to disclose such a code. The underscored text usually refer to the notes by the same man.

The distinction between the original book and the handwritten additions to it is made by the use of red and black type. Black type indicates the type of the original book. Red type indicates any addition made in handwriting by Mr. A, Mr. B. or Jemi to the original.

The placement of the notes indicates the paragraph to which they refer, or to their precise position in the book.

The page numbers of the original book are denoted in parenthesis. The matter on the page numbered follows the number. The page numbers of this edition appear at the bottom of each page.

It had been necessary to disregard the italics of the original.

It might be helpful for you to know a little about the nature of the notes before you begin reading this book. The notes refer to two types of people living in space. Specifically the "stasis neutral" and the undersea are mentioned as habitats. They seem to live in both interchangeably. The building of undersea cities is mentioned. Many different kinds of ships are used as transportation. These two peoples, races or whatever they may be called, are referred to over and over again. They are called L-M's and S-Ms. The L-M's seem to be peaceful; the S-M's are not. It seems that the annotations are inclined toward the L-M's as they speak more kindly of them that the S-M's.

Terms such as: mothership, home-ship, dead-ship, Great ark, great bombardment, great return, great war, little-men, force-fields, deep freezes, undersea building, measure markers, scout ships, magnetic and gravity fields, sheets of diamond, cosmic rays, force cutters, undersea explorers, inlay work, clear-talk, telepathing, burning "coat", nodes, vortice, magnetic "net", and many others are used quite naturally by these men. They explain how, why, and what happens to people, ships, and planes that have disappeared. They explain the origin of odd storms and clouds, objects falling from the sky, strange marks and footprints, and other things which we have not solved.

These men seem to feel that it is too late for man to obtain space flight. They feel that mankind could not cope with "those mind wrecking conditions that space and sea contain" for mankind is to egotistical, values too much the material, wars over mer parcels of the planet, is too filled with jealously, and lacks true brotherhood.

How much truth is there in this? That cannot be answered. It is evident that these men provide some very intriguing explanations; explanations that may be worth consideration.

The subject of UFO's in its present stage is like astronomy in that it is a purely observational "science," not an experimental one; necessarily, therefore, it must be based on observation and not on experiment. Observation, in this case, consists of everything which can be found to have bearing on the subject. There are thousands of references to it in ancient literature, but the authors did not know that their references had any bearing, for the subject did not then exist. The writers were recording such things as met their senses solely through an honest effort to report inexplicable observational data.

Hoping, in those days, that something would "come of it" Nowadays, Science Is afraid that "Something Will Come of it." It will, too, In 1956 or 57 the Air force Will have Ships LIKE these in appearance & Will "feel" safe to announce that Human eyes Have seen Saucers from outer Space BUT to Not be Worried because "we too have these Ships" Oh! Brother What a farce! Ours will be JET propelled not M ◯ propelled.

Some of my contemporaries have attempted to prove that all of these phenomena are, in some way or other, illusory, and that in any case they do not involve flight, wingless or otherwise, mechanical propulsion or intelligent direction.

I consider their negative case unproven because there is an overwhelming mass of authentic evidence *(B) which can be cited as: (1) direct observation, (2) indirect observation, and (3) supporting evidence or indication.

There is one sphere of indirect evidence in the form of events of mysterious nature which have never been explained. These things would be easy to explain were we to admit the limitations of our own knowledge, and the possibility of "intelligence" elsewhere in the universe operating space ships -- quite possibly more than one kind of "intelligence" and more than one kind of space ship.

This world is full of unexplained oddities. The legends of Atlantis and Mu have been favorite targets of the scoffers. "They" say there are no ghosts, no spirits, nothing falls from the sky but iron and stone meteorites. But for centuries the earth was believed to be flat, there was no America, no heliocentric system of earth and planets, no fossil dinosaurs; yet we know these beliefs to have been wrong.

Reliable people have been seeing the phenomena known as flying saucers for a thousand years and more. There are good reports as far back as 1500 BC and before. Thousands of people have seen some kind of navigable contraptions in the sky, and some have sworn it under oath.

In a day When oaths were just as good as Money -in-Hand for if incorrect your Neck suffered "The Miracle"[1] from the Church as a knife from the out-raged who took your oath.

[1] Undecipherable: could be Nracle or Nrack.

I cannot agree with any astronomer who insists that all of these things are mirages, planets, clouds or illusions. The majority of the people are articulate enough to tell their stories, and sincere enough to make depositions before notaries public. Even scientists concede that these folk saw something.

I see nothing particularly odd in strange descriptions of phenomena the like of which has no earthly counterpart or for which we have no frame of reference.

If he does not, then he KNOWS the L-M's.

This work is a serious attempt to bring order out of chaos, an attempt to pull all of the facets of this controversy into a basic stratum upon which to make an intelligent evaluation of the subject.

If he does succeed in such evaluation Nobody cares enough to bother believing him for that would require the effort of Courage & the Gaiyar are such cowards & conformists. Even if believed, Nobody would dare say so for that would require action & They dare not act in BEHALF OF A BELIEF THAT INTERFERES WITH USUAL LIVING

NOTE:
Anyone reading this book would have to KNOW that Electron quatums (sic), Within Molecular structures, are similar in scope of "field" as Planets orbits.
They Would Have to know that. Electrons in Metal go across, What in Planetary Systems, would be BILLIONS OF MILES, Leaving three a Graviational field, Dead-spot or Node, or Vortice or Neutral as this one thing is variously called. Realizing this as Dr. Albert Einstien did, it shows clearly how solids may become Energy or Dissolute AND How then they May Pass easily out of Visual scope instantly.
This is Merely one Clue gleamed from Einstiens Theory of a Unified Magnetic Field through all substances AND throughout Whole inter-Galactic-Universe.U.S. EXPIERMENTS, 1943 ON ONE PART OF IT PROVED PLENTY!

The Case for the UFO is perhaps the most unusual and comprehensive volume yet produced *on the fascinating subject of the "flying saucers." To bring the rare combination of a scientifically trained mind, plus imaginative, fetter-free thinking to the mysterious subject of possible intelligence from outer space, is something which has been much needed. This is precisely what Jr. Jessup has done.

This book is a sound step forward in the great need to approach, dispassionately, material pertaining to the flying saucers; it goes far toward putting the topic on a down-to-earth basis. I have never before seen such apparently unrelated subject matter brought into focus so skillfully and analyzed so successfully.

He says "apparently" means "seemingly"

It is the men of insight and the men of unobstructed vision of every generation who are able to lead us through the quagmire of a in-a-rut thinking. It is the men of imagination who are able to see relationships which escape the casual observer*. It remains for the men of intuition to seek answers while others avoid even the question.

Mr. Jessup's analyses are based on phenomena which were of scientific record many years before the present controversial era, and are therefore objective; thus, the overall picture which we have here will, and should, become the bible for the UFO.

Whereas, I may not necessarily agree with Mr. Jessup in each of his startling deductions, certainly there is every reason to believe that his is the correct approach: indeed, many of his conclusions will be difficult, if not altogether impossible to refute!

Having brought to The Case for the UFO his ability to reason clearly, to research assiduously and to write lucidly and effectively, Mr. Jessup has performed a valuable service to all of us who know and believe "There are more things in heaven and earth… than are dreamt of in (our) Philosophy."

Jemi;
He may reason clearly but only to the point where Logical deduction stops & Emotionalism takes over, as do all Humans. Mortification or pride or Lack of enough evidence May put him on a Soap-box Level.
Yet, He is a Scientist and as such May show No such traits, as are ;usually found in Gaiyari. I see your point, Jemi, He could convince the whole thing but then have you ever tried to tell the Honest truth about Something of which only you have observed?
True enough, It cannot be done. So Let us see What

APPENDIX

The first letter received by Mr. Jessup from Carols Allende:

Carlos Miguel Allende
R. D. #1 Box 223
New Kensington, Penn.

My Dear Dr. Jessup,

Your invocation to the Public that they move en Masse upon their Representatives and have thusly enough Pressure placed at the right & sufficient Number of Places where from a Law demanding Research into Dr. Albert Einstiens (sic) Unified Field Theory May be enacted (1925-27) is Not at all Necessary. It May Intrest (sic) you to know that The Good Doctor Was Not so Much influenced in his retracton (sic) of that Work, by Mathematics, as he most assuredly was by Humantics. (sic)

His Later computations, done strictly for his own edification & amusement, upon cycles of Human Civilization & Progress compared to the Growth of Mans General over-all Character Was enough to Horrify Him. Thus, We are "told" today that that Theory was "Incomplete".

Dr. B. Russell asserts privately that It is complete. He also says that Man is Not Ready for it & Shan't be until after W. W. III. Nevertheless, "Results" of My friend Dr. Franklin Reno, Were used. These Were a complete Recheck of That Theory, With a View to any & Every Possible quick use of it, if feasable (sic) in a Very short time. There Were good Results, as far as a Group Math Re-Cheek AND as far as a good Physical "Result," to Boot. YET THE NAVT FEARS TO USE THIS RESULT. The Result was & stands today as Proof that The Unified Field Theory to a certain extent is correct. Beyond that certain extent No Person in his right senses, or having any senses at all, Will evermore dare to go. I am sorry that I Mislead You in My Previous Missive. True, enough, such a form of Levitation has been accomplished as described. It is also a Very commonly observed reaction of certain Metals to Certain Fields surrounding a current, This field being used for that purpose. Had Farraday concerned himself about the Mag. Field surrounding an Electric Current, We today Would NOT Exist or if We did exist, our present Geo-political situation would have the very time-bomish, ticking off towards Destruction, atmosphere that Now exists. Alright, Alright! The "result" was complete invisibility of a ship, Destroyer type, and all of its crew While at Sea. (Oct. 1943) The Field Was effective in an oblate spheroidal shape, extending one Hundred yards (More or Less, due to Lunar position & Latitude) out from each beam of the ship. Any Person Within that sphere became vague in form BUT He too observed those Persons aboard that ship as though they too were of the same state, yet were walking upon nothing. Any person without that sphere could see Nothing save the clearly Defined shape of the Ships Hull in the Water, PROVIDING of course, that that person was just close enough to see yet, just barely outside of the field. Why tell you Now? Very Simple; If You choose to go Mad, then you would reveal this information. Half of the officiers & the crew of that Ship are at Present, Mad as Hatters. A few, are even Yet, confined to certain areas where they May receive trained Scientific aid when they, either, "Go Blank" or Go Blank" & "Get Stuck". Going-Bland IE an after effect of the Man having been within the field too Much, IS Not at all an unplesant experience too Healthily Curious Sailors. However it is when also, they "Get Stuck" that they call it "HELL" INCORPORATED" The Man thusly stricken can Not Move of his won volition unless tow or More of those who are within the field go & touch him, quickly, else he "Freezes".

If a Man Freezes, His position Must be Marked out carefully and then the Field in cut-off. Everyone but that "Frozen" Man is able to Move; to appreciate apparent Solidity again. Then, the Newest Member of the crew Must approach the Spot, where he will find the "Frozen" Mans face or Bare skin, that is Not covered by usual uniform Clothing. Sometimes, it takes only an hour or so Sometimes all Night & all Day Long & Worse It once took 6 months, to get The Man "Unfrozen". This "Deep Freeze" was not psychological. It is the Result of a Hyper-Field that is set up, within the field of the Body, While the "Scorch" Field is turned on & this at Length or upon a Old Hand.

A Highly complicated Place of Equipment Had to be constructed in order to Unfreeze those who became "True Froze", of "Deep Freeze" subjects. Usually a "Deep Freeze" Man goes Mad, Stark Raving,, Gibbering, Running MAD, if his 'freeze' is far More than a Day in our time.

I speak of TIME for DEEP "Frozen Men" are Not aware of Time as We know it. They are Like Semi-comatoese (sic) person, who Live, breathe, Look & feel but still are unaware of So Utterly Many things as to constitute a "Nether World" to them. A Man in an ordinary common Freeze is aware of Time, Sometimes acutely so. Yet They are Never aware of Time precisely as you or I are aware of it. The First "Deep Freeze" As I said took 6 months to Rectify. It also took over 5 Million Dollars worth of Electronic equipment & a Special Ship Berth. If around or Near the Philadelphia Navy[2] and you see a group of Sailors in the act of Putting their Hands Upon a fellow or upon "thin air," observe the Digits & appendages of the Stricken Man. If they seem to Waver, as tho within a Heat-Mirage, go quickly & Put YOUR Hands upon Him, For that Man is the Very Most Desparate of Men in The World. Not one of those Men ever want at all to become again invisible. I do Not think that Much More Need be said as to Why Man is Not Ready for Force-Field Work. Eh?

You will Hear phrases from these Men such as "Caught in the Flow (or the Push) or "Stuck in the Green" or Stuck in Molasses" or "I was "going" FAST", These refer to Some of the Decade-Later after effects of Force-Field "ork. "Caught in the Flow" describes exactly the "Stuck in Molasses" sensation of a Man going into a Deep Freeze" or Plain Freeze" either of the two. "Caught in the Push" can either refer to That Which a Man feels Briefly WHEN he is either about to inadvertently "Go-Blank" IE Become Invisible" or about to "Get Stuck" in a "Deep Freeze" or "Plain Freeze."

There are only a very few of the original Experimental D-E's Crew Left by Now, Sir, Most went insane, one just walked "throo" His quarters Wall in sight of His Wife & Child & 2 other crew Members (WAS NEVER SEEN AGAIN), two "Went into "The Flame, "I.E. They "Froze" & caught fire, while carrying common Small-Boat Compasses, one Man carried the Compass & Caught fire, the other came for the "Laying on of Hands" as he was nearest but he too, took fire. THEY BURNED FOR 18 DAYS. The faith in "Hand Laying" Died When this Happened & Mens Minds Went by the scores. The expierement (sic) Was a Complete Success. The Men Were Complete Failures.

Check Philadelphia Papers for a tine one Paragraph (upper Half of sheet, inside the paper Near the rear 3rd of Paper, 1944-46 in Spring or Fall or Winter, NOT Summer.) of an Item describing the Sailors Actions after their initial Voyage. They Raided a Local to the Navy Yard "Gin Mill" or "Beer Joint" & caused such Shock & Paralysis of the Waitresses that Little comprehensible could be gotten from them, save that Paragraph & the Writer of it, Does Not Believe it, & Says "I only wrote what I heard & them Dames is Daffy. So, all I get is a "Hide-it" Bedtime Story."

Check observer ships crew, Matson Lines Liberty ship out of Norfolk, (Company MAY Have Ships Log for that Voyage or Coast Guard have it) The S.S. Andrew Furnseth, Chief Mate Mowsely, (Will secure Captains Name Later) (Ships Log Has Crew List on it.) one crew Member Richard Price or "Splicey" Price May Remember other Names of Dec Crew Men, (Coast Guard has record of Sailors issued "Papers") Mr. Price Was 18 or 19 then, Oct. 1943, and Lives or Lived at that time in His old Family Home in Roanoke, VA a small town with a Small Phone book. These Men Were Witnesses, The Men of this crew, "Connelly of New England, (Boston?), May have witnessed but I doubt it. (Spelling May be incorrect) DID Witness this. I ask you to Do this bit of Research simply that you May Choke on you own Tongue when you Remember what you have "appealed be Made Law"

Very Disrespectfully Yours,
Carl M. Allen

P.S. Will Help More if you see Where I can. (Z416175)

Notes in addition to and pertaining to Missive.
(Contact Rear Admiral Ransom Bennett for verification of info Herein. Navy Chief of research. He may offer you a job, ultimately)

Coldly & analytically speaking, without the Howling that is in the Letter to you accompanying this, I will say the following in all Fairness to you & to Science. (1) The Navy did Not know that the men could become invisible WHILE NOT UPON THE SHIP & UNDER THE FIELDS INFLUENCE. (2) The Navy Did Not know that there would be Men Die from odd effects of HYPER "Field" within or upon "Field." (3) Further, They even yet do Not know Why this happened & are not even sure that the "F" within "F" is the reason, for sure at all. In Short the Atomic bomb didn't kill the expierimentors (sic) thus the expieriments (sic) went on-but eventually one or two were accidentally killed BUT the cause was known as to Why they died. Myself, I "feel" that something pertaining to that Small-boat compass "triggered" off The Flames." I have no proof, but Neither Does the Navy. (4) WORSE & Not Mentioned When one or two of their Men, Visible-within-the-field-to-all-the-others, Just Walked into Nothingness, AND Nothing Could be felt, of them, either when the "field Was turned on OR off, THEY WERE JUST GONE! Then, More Fears Were Amassed. (5) Worse, Yet, When an apparently Visible & New-Man Just walks seemingly "throo" the Wall of his House, the surrounding area Searched by all Men & thoroughly scrutinized by & with & Under an Installed Portable Field developer AND NOTHING EVER found of him. So Many Many Fears were by then in effect that the Sum total of them all could Not ever again be faced by ANY of those Men or by the Men Working at & Upon The Experiments.

I wish to Mention that Somehow, also, the Experimental Ship Disappeared from its Philadelphia Dock and only a Very few Minutes Later appeared at its other Dock in the Norfolk, Newport New Portsmouth area. This was distinctly AND clearly identified as being that place BUT the ship them, again, disappeared And Went Back to its Philadelphia Dock in only a Very few Minutes or Less. This was also Noted in the Newspapers But I Forget what paper I read it in or When It happened. Probably Late in the experiments, May have been in 1956 after Experiments were discontinued, I can Not Say for Sure.

To the Navy this Whole thing was So Impractical due to its Morale Blasting effects Which were so much so that efficient operation of the Ship was Drastically Hindered and then after this occurrence It was shown that even the Mere operation of a ship could Not be counted upon at all. In short, Ignorance of this thing bred Such Terrors of it that, on the Level of attempted operations, with what knowledge was then available It was deemed as impossible, Impracticable and Too Horrible.

I believe that Had YOU then been Working upon & With the team that was Working upon this project With yourself knowing what You NOW know, that "The Flames" Would Not have been so unexpected, or Such a Terrifying Mystery. Also, More than Likely, I must say in All fairness, None of these other occurrences could have happened without some knowledge of their possibility of occurring. In fact, They May have been prevented by a far more Cautious Program AND by a Much More Cautiously careful Selection of Personnel for Ships officers & Crew. Such Was Not the case. The Navy used Whatever Human Material was at hand, Without Much, if any, thought as to character & Personality of that Material. If care, Great Care is taken in selection of Ship, and officers and crew AND If Careful Indoctrination is taken along with Careful watch over articles of apparel Such as rings & Watches & Identification bracelets & Belt buckles, Plus AND ESPECIALLY the effect of Hob-Nailed shoes or Cleated-shoes U.S. Navy issue shoes, I feel that some progress towards dissipating the fearfilled ignorance surrounding this project Will be Most surely and certainly accomplished. The Records of the U.S. Maritime Service HOUSE Norfolk Va., (for Graduated Seamen of their Schools) Will reveal Who was assigned to S S. Andrew Furuseth for Month of either Late Sept. or October of 1943. I remember positively of one other observer who stood beside Me When tests were going on. He was from New England, Brown-Blond Curly Hair, blue eyes, Don't remember Name. I Leave it up to you to Decide if further Work shall be put into this or Not, and Write this in Hopes there Will be.

Very Sincerely,
Carl M. Allen

The second letter received by Mr. Jessup from Carlos Allende:

Carl M. Allen
RFD #1 Box 223
New Kensington, Pa

Dear Mr. Jessup:

Having just recently gotten home from my long travels around the country I find that you had dropped me a card. You ask that I write you "at once" and So after taking everything into consideration, I have decided to do so. You ask me for what is tantamount to positive proof of something that only the duplication of those devices that produce "this phenomenon" could ever give you. At least, were I of scientific bent, I presume that, were I of Such a Curiosity about something, the which has been produced from a theory that was discarded (1927) as incomplete, I am sure that I would be of such a dubiousness towards that I would Have to be shown these devices that Produced such a curious interaction of Forces & Fields, in operation & their product Mr. Jessup, I could NEVER possibly satisfy such an attitude. The reason being that I could not, Nor ever would the Navy Research Dept. (Then under the present oss of the Navy, Burke) ever let it be known that any such thing was ever allowed to be done. For you see, It was because of Burkes Curiosity & willingness & prompting that this experiment was enabled to be carried out. It proved a White-elephant but His attitude towards advance & ultra-advanced types of research is just "THE" THING that put him where he is today. (Or at least, to be sure, It carries a great weight). Were the stench of such an Experiments results EVER to come out, He would be crucified.

However, I have noticed, that throo the ages, those who have had this happen to them, once the vulgar passions that caused the reaction have cooled-off AND further research OPENLY carried on, that these crucified ones achieve something akin to Saint hood. You say that this, "is of the greatest importance". I disagree with you Mr. Jessup, not just whole Heartedly, but vehemently. However at the same time, your ideas & your own sort of curiosity is that of mine own sort and besides my disagreement is based upon philosophical Morality and not upon that curiosity which Drives Science so rapidly. I can be of some positive help to you in myself but to do so would require a Hypnotist, Sodium Pentathol, a tape recorder & an excellent typist-secretary in order to produce material of Real value to you.

As you know one who is hypnotized cannot Lie and one who is both hypnotized AND given "Truth serum" as it is colloqually (sic) known, COULD NOT POSSIBLY LIE, AT ALL. To boot, My Memory would be THUS enabled to remember things in such great detail, things that my present consciousness cannot recall at all, or only barely and uncertainly that it would be of far greater benefit to use hypnosis. I could thus be enabled to not only Recall COMPLETE names, but also addresses & telephone numbers AND perhaps the very important Z Numbers of those sailors whom I sailed with then or even came into contact with. I could too, being something of a Dialectician, be able to thusly talk exactly as these witnesses talked and imitate or illustrate their mannerisms & Habits of thought, thus your psychologists can figure IN ADVANCE the Surefire method of dealing Most Successfully with these. I could NOT do this with someone with whom I had not observed at length & these men, I lived with for about 6 months, so you are bound to get good to excellent results. The mind does NOT ever forget, Not really, As you know. Upon this I suggest this way of doing this with Myself but further, the Latter usage of Myself in Mannerism & Thought pattern illustration is suggested in order that the Goal of inducing these Men to place themselves at & under you disposal (HYPNOTICALLY OR UNDER TRUTH-SERUM), is a Goal, the Which could Have FAR greater impact, due to co-relation of Experiences remembered Hypnotically by Men who have NOT seen or even written to each other, at all, for Nearly or over TEN years. In this, With such Men as Witnesses, giving irrefutable testimony It is my belief that were, Not the Navy, but the Airforce, confronted with such evidence, (IE Chief of Research) there would be either an uproar or a quiet and determined effort to achieve SAFELY "that which" the Navy failed at. They did NOT fail to, I hope you realize, achieve Metallic & organic invisibility nor did they fail to, unbesoughtedly, (sic) achieve transportation of thousands of tons of Metal & Humans at an eyes blink speed. Even though this latter effect of prolonged experimentation was (to them) THE thing that caused them to consider the experiment as a failure, I BELIEVE THAT FURTHER EXPERIMENTS WOULD NATURALLY HAVE PRODUCED CONTROLLED TRANSPORT OF GREAT TONNAGES AT ULTRA-FAST SPEEDS TO A DESIRED POINT THE INSTANT IT IS DESIRED throo usage of an area covered by: (I) those cargoes and (2) that " Field" that could cause those goods, Ships or Ship parts (MEN WERE TRANSPORTED AS WELL) to go to another Point. Accidentally & to the embarrassed perplexity of the Navy THIS HAS ALREADY HAPPENED TO A WHOLE SHIP, CREW & ALL. I read of this AND of THE OFF-BASE AWOL ACTIVITIES OF the crew-Men who were at the time invisible in a Philadelphia NEWSPAPER. UNDER HARCOHYPNOSIS I CAN BE ENABLED TO DIVULGE THE NAME, DATE & SECTION & PAGE NUMBER of that Paper & the other one. Thus this papers "Morgue" Will Divulge EVEN MORE POSITIVE PROOF ALREADY PUBLISHED of this experiment. The Name of the REPORTER who skeptically covered & Wrote of these incidents (OF THE RESTAURANT-BARROOM RAID WHILE INVISIBLE & OF THE SHIPS SUDDEN AWOL) AND WHO INTERVIEWED the Waitresses CAN THUS BE FOUND, thus HIS and the Waitresses testimony can be added to the Records. Once on this track, I believe That you can uncover CONSIDERABLY MORE evidence to sustain this, ------- (what Would you call it --SCANDAL or DISCOVERY?) You would Need a Dale Carneigie to Maneuver these folks into doing just as you wish. It would be cheaper than paying everyone of all these witnesses & Much more Ethical. The Idea Is, to the Layman type of person, utterly ridiculous. However, can you remember, all by yourself, the Date of a Newspaper in which you saw an interesting item more than 5 years ago? Or recall names of Men, their phone #'s that you saw in 1943-44.

I do hope you will consider this plan. You will Progress as Not possible in any other way. Of course, I realize that you would need a Man Who can cause people to want to have fun, to play with Hypnotism, one that can thusly dupe those he-you need to: #1 come to His Demonstrations & thus call on them to be either or both "Honored" as Helping with the show" & for doing Him a Great favor, &/or being part of the act for the mite of a small fee He would HAVE to be a Man of such an adroit ingenuity at Manufacturing a plausible story on the-instant-he-sizes-up-his-"personality-to be dealt-with THAT had cost PLENTY. The ability to convince people of an outright Lie as being the absolute truth would be one of his prime prerequisites. (Ahem.) Yes, some such skulduggery (sic) would have to be thought well out & done. THE ULTIMATE END WILL BE A TRUTH TOO HUGE, AND TOO FANTASTIC, TO NOT BE TOLD. A WELL-FOUNDED TRUTH BACKED UP BY UNOBFUSCATIVE PROOF POSITIVE. I would like to find where it is that these Sailors live NOW. It is known that some few people can somehow tell you a mans name & his Home address UNDER HYPNOSIS EVEN THOUGH NEVER HAVING EVER MENT OR SEEN THE PERSON. These folks have a very high or Just a High PSI factor in their make-up that can be intensified under stress or strain OR that usually is intensified under extreme fright. It also can be RE-intensified by Hypnosis, thus is like reading from the Encyclopedia Britannica. Even though that Barroom-Restaurant Raid was staged by invisible or partly invisible men, those men CAN SEE EACH OTHER THUS NAMES, In the excitement, were sure to have been Mentioned, whether last or first Names or Nicknames. A check of the Naval Yards Dispensaries or Hospital or aid stations or prison RECORDS of that particular day that the Barroom-Restaurant occurred May revela (sic) the EXACT NAMES OF PRECISELY WHO WERE THE MEN, THEIR SERVICE SERIAL NUMBERS & THUS THE INFORMATION ON WHERE THEY ARE FROM BE SECURED & by adroit "Maneuvuerings" (sic) of those still at Home, THE NAME OF THE PLACE where they are at present can be secured.

HOW WOULD YOU LIKE TO ACTUALLY SPEAK TO (or some of THE MEN) A MAN WHO WAS ONCE AN INVISIBLE HAMAN BEING? (MAY BECOME SO IN FRONT OF YOUR VERY EYES IF HE TURNS-OFF HIS HIP-SET). Well, all this fantastically preposterous sort of rubbish will be necessary, Just to do that, the Hypnotist-psychologist & all that. Maybe I suggest something too thorught (sic) & too Methodical for your taste but then I, as first subject, Don't care to be Hypnotized at all, But too, feel that certain pull of curiosity about this thing that, to me, is irresistible. I want to crack this thing wide open. My reasons are simply to enable more work to be done upon this "Field Theory".

I am a star-gazer Mr. Jessup. I make no bones about this and the fact that I feel that IF HANDLED PROPERLY, I.E. PRESENTED TO PEOPLE & SCIENCE IN THE PROPER PSYCOLOGICALLY EFFECTIVE MANNER. I FEEL sure THAT Man will go where He now dreams of being---to the stars via the form of transport that the Navy accidentally stumbled upon (to their embarrassment) when their EXP. SHIP took off & popped-up a minute or so later on several Hundred sea travel--trip miles away at another of its Berths in the Chesapeake Bay area. I read of this in another newspaper & only by Hypnosis could any Man remember all the details of which paper, date of occurrence & etc., you see? Eh. Perhaps already, the Navy has used this accident of transport to build your UFO's. It is a logical advance from any standpoint. What do you think???

The Case for the UFO's

"If it waddles…"?

If it looks like a duck, waddles like a duck and quacks like a duck, swims and has webbed feet--then perhaps it is a duck!

But a child, seeing his first platypus, will say, "It looks like a duck with four feet and fur! But what is it?

But what happens when a man sees something for the first time and asks, "What is it?"…and there is no one who can supply the answer?

Fortunately, our experience and knowledge enable us to explain the seeming inconsistencies of this freak of nature.

The controversy about the s0-called Flying Saucers began in just such a fashion with Kenneth Arnold-s startling announcement in 1947.

A businessman of Boise, Idaho, Mr. Arnold was on his way from Chehalis to Yakima, Washington. Flying in his private plane, he was startled to see a bright flash on his wing.

Looking in the direction of Mount Rainier, he was astonished to see nine gleaming disks, each approximately the size of a C-54. They were clearly outlined against the snow.

As he later told the story, "it was as if they were linked together. They flew close to the top of mountain in a diagonal, chainlike line."

Mr. Arnold estimated their speed to be around twelve hundred miles per hour, and he thought they must have been about twenty to twenty-five miles from his plane.

"I watched them about three minutes," he said. "The were swerving in and out around the high mountain peaks. They were flat, like a pie pan, and so shiny they reflected the sun like a mirror. I never saw anything so fast!

Thus, as of June 24, 1947, Flaying Saucers were born.

"I saw them--but what are they?" Mr. Arnold undoubtedly asked. And no one had the answer.

Since that memorable day, thousands of other sightings have been reported and verified, and still the question must be asked, "What are they?" But more importantly, where do they come from, what is their purpose here, and if they can do it, why can't we? Are they Russian secret weapons?

Not Worry, Jemi, those were L-M Ships, Not "S" Men.

Several well-documented volumes have been devoted to listings of sightings, to reports by everyone from boy scouts and families on picnics to astronomers and a man who claims to have had a conversation with a Saucer passenger from Venus.

But our answers to the questions, our evaluation of the potential answers to the fascinating and sometimes frightening questions, end where others begin. In other words, we shall not devote ourselves to the recent sightings and reports which have flooded newspaper offices, official bureaus of the government and, for some strange reason, airports. (Presumably, the public feels that anything which takes place in the air is the business of the airport!)

I have long been interested in the study of the unexplained areas of human existence, and as an astronomer with special interest in the moon, the early reports of flying saucers caught my attention. References in dusty volumes in the Library of Congress flashed through my mind, references I had noted years ago and which now, in the light of these developments, seemed to offer a new field of research, of analysis and co-relation which might throw light upon the matter.

I began to ask myself questions … and I began to see a shape, a form, take place in the entire field of observable phenomena which had remained obscure and previously unrelated.

This flying saucer was photographed over the Brazilian Jungle

Desmond Leslie, in the book, "Flying Saucers Have Landed," reviewed some of the interesting material gleaned from old manuscripts, many of which referred to sightings of unidentified objects flying through the air. The most cursory examinations of such material, when collected and organized into a readable whole, made it quite evident that conclusions could be drawn.

Does it follow, I wondered, that still further conclusions could be drawn if one were to collect and sift and evaluate data from many different fields? Would there be any indication that life does, in fact, exist in space? If so, would that life have direction, control, intelligence? Or would it be amoebic in nature, lacking intelligence, be a form of vegetable or animal-mineral life? Would a thorough study of material in many fields reveal a pattern, a consistency of any sort which would provide clues to the future activities of these Unidentified Flying Objects?

I wanted to know the answers. I wanted to know if the somethings existed, and if they did, what they were. I wanted to know where they lived and how they lived. I wanted to know what they were doing when we didn't see them. I wanted to know why some people saw them and some people didn't see them. I wanted to know why they appeared in one place and not another. I wanted to know whether they were friendly or hostile.

L-M? PALS; S-M?[1]

[1] This note is quite ambiguous. It may be interpreted as the above or as: L---M: PALS S-M? or since L-M closely follows the word hostile it might be: Hostile L-M? PALS: S-M? From the similarity of the marks following L-M and S-M the first interpretation is most likely the correct one.

For first they would refuse to even believe.
Requires true Humility or active[2] fascination.

I wanted to know, further, if they might be a Mark Twain-like hoax which a gullible public was swallowing, having tired of ordinary pursuits of happiness and excitement.

I wanted to know, too, whether we would have to wait until the things decided to visit us, or if we could possibly expect to pay them a surprise visit in their own territory in the near future.

Like a child seeing his first platypus, I asked myself questions. But unlike the child, I searched for my own answers.

UFO's Are Real

A serious approach to the question of Unidentified Flying Objects demands, first of all, that we face a fundamental change in concept as regards the world of our environment. We must loosen out thinking, let our imaginations fly with the winds, and, above all, we must want to think!

No human being with a closed mind need read further, for he will be asked to think as he has never thought before, to admit to possibilities which will shake the very foundations of his being.

For countless generations mankind has been confronted with an endless series of events, the causes of which have been obscure, if not altogether outside any casual sequence which his mind was able to imagine. In varying degrees, these happenings have generally been called supernatural: in more modern terminology, paranormal. This convenient phraseology may name them and, to a lesser extent, classify them; however, it does not explain the events, nor does it transmit and real knowledge to a groping mankind.

To gain understanding, therefore, we must do more than classify; we must analyze and theorize.

To do these things we must courageously invade a field which has so frightened formal science that it has been omitted from man's professed and organized cognizance. Only a few have dared to admit these phenomena and to investigate them Of the few, a large proportion have become outcasts from their chosen field of study. They have become nonconformists, and few sins are considered more basic. Yet the mass of our qualitative knowledge has come through nonconformity.

Don't Worry those few DO NOT COUNT. He again asks too much of Proud, Vain Humankind

In this volume, we are going to confront, for the first time, a number of hitherto incorrigible facts. We shall relate, for the first time, previously unrelated data and draw startling conclusions therefrom.

To begin such a leap into the maelstrom of the "supernatural," we must first clarify our use of the word "world." We must no limit it to a state or a continent. And, despite the fact that it may disturb our complacency and arouse vague fears, we can no longer limit it to a single planet. The earth is not alone, nor has it been for some time.

[2] Clearest translation. Could be actual.

Next, we segregate paranormal experiences into groupings having some family likenesses. Only by so doing can we give them the merciless scrutiny necessary to determine their significance. If there is enlightenment to be had from the, we shall have it. (If this be nonconformity, let us make the most of it; our orthodox opponents may try to make the worst.)

This segregation of "erratics" or "oddities" into groups having some similarity serves a two fold utility. First, it simplifies our problem of analysis, because it helps t bring order out of chaos-chaos which is the product of centuries of accumulated data with no co-relation, with no purpose other than that of cataloguing facts for posterity. We may now assume, and with great assurance, that we are the posterity for whom these data were recorded. The time has come when these isolated ? and lone facts, so long orphaned, must be brought into the light, marshaled, and made to serve our purpose. This heterogeneous mass of data has doubtless been preserved for some purpose, if life has any meaning at all, and the solution of the mystery of the UFO's may well be that purpose.

The second utility of grouping is to establish emphasis and striking power, for any one of these innumerable events is too weak to stand alone in the face of scientific scoffing. It does not matter, evidently, that a thousand, or even ten thousand, people observe and report paranormal events. One self-confident, assertive and arrogant scientist, backed by the tacit support of his esoteric profession, can deny the occurrence, obfuscate its record, nullify its import, and come close to convincing the ten thousand people that they did not see what they plainly saw. This, of course, is not really science. It comes close to a kind of intellectual dictatorship, and imperialism of the intellect. Thus, by relating the previously unrelated, we can build a wall unscalable by such conformists.

Such contempt for those badly frightened or Strictly Orthodox Namby-Pamby Scientists,
The Shade of Galileo Walks again in the Name of Better Science.Will he arouse & Enlighten as before?

No, my twin, He Walks throo cloudsl

But let us not be over ambitious. We can as easily overstep the bounds of our capabilities as we can shirk our responsibilities. Some of the unexplained phenomena do seem to lie in what, for lack of a better terminology, we must still call the paranormal or psychic fields. One must be on guard not to commit the prime fallacy of all analysis, that of evolving a theory and then proceeding to find facts by which to substantiate it. Therefore, we must sort our observations into two groups. One group will contain everything which can be attributed to physical action by intelligent beings or an undeified and nonspiritual status. The second group is the residue which, as far as one can judge after careful consideration, must remain associated with the psychic or spiritual realm.

Even a cursory survey of the vast and scrambled field of strange events--oddities, we can call them--shows us at least three major areas. One of these relates to things which fall from the sky, some of which come from space and which may be roughly classified as organic and inorganic. We use "organic" in the sense of something which is part of, or associated with, a living, thinking entity, and "inorganic" as being merely the debris of space. An ordinary iron-nickel meteorite from space is inorganic within the sphere of our present definition; but if this meteorite arrives on earth shaped like a seven-headed Malayan goddess, or a compound microscope, it's organic.

A second major category stands out in the bibliography of oddities. It is the great area of events which encompasses disappearing people, and ships; airplanes and airships crashing and disappearing without trace and without warning; instantaneous and mysterious transportations of people and things; inexplicable tracks and marks, such as the Devil's Footprints of Devonshire, and the "cup-marks" found in stone over much of the world; the organically shaped meteorites found in Tertiary rock and coal formations; evidences of levitation and flight from prehistoric antiquity; and many other phenomena which appear to us to be, or resemble, acts rather than things.

All of these are terrestrial events--manifestations more or less on the terrestrial surface.

But there is a third great area of observational data. It is that vast conglomerate of purely astronomical observations which relates to things and phenomena in space or on planets and satellites other than earth. These are the unpopular, poor relatives of orthodox astronomy, the untouchable erratics. These have come to be regarded with such disfavor that there are few published records of them within the past fifty to seventy-five years.

We may consider that the sciences of meteorology and mereoritics, whose nature we will discuss later, speak almost eloquently in behalf of the case for space life and UFO's. It is within these fields that we have found the greatest volume of detailed observation and data. And it is just here that we have found the most difficulty in grouping and organizing. Even here, however, we can not a primitive pattern and by simple use of it as a guide, we begin to separate acts of intelligence from "natural" acts of statistical nature.

Whereas the actual groupings are given in Parts Two, Three, and Four, the problems involved in the initial research are of interest. The resolution of those problems is still another key to the fact that we are on the right track, that by relating the previously unrelated we have discovered pattern and form.

An example of the way such things develop is our experience in classifying falling objects. Our first thought was that this was a minor field which could be disposed of with a casual perusal. Not so. It soon developed, as the pattern began to evolve, that we could not coordinate these onslaughts from the sky, nor interpret them, unless we gave consideration to their effect, their origins, and to concomitant phenomena. Not only that, but very shortly we were forced to acknowledge that falling objects and other phenomena in the sky must be considered in three categories if order was to ensue from chaos. In short, there seemed to be a class of objects which were merely physical debris cluttering up space and moving in orbits of varying shapes and which had little, if any, relationship to or association with intelligent being. A second group was obviously the product of thinking, if not, indeed, of higher mental characteristics such as purposefulness, determination, morality, and perhaps even humor. Then, especially in those instances where space phenomena appear to intermingle with our native meteorological condition, it became necessary to consider, as a third group, the less spectacular terrestrial events and to clarify our thinking by segregating these and getting them out of our way.

The upshot of this coercion was that we found more than half a dozen subcategories wherein we were allied with the sciences of meteorology which is the terrestrial science of the air, and meteoritics which is a branch of astronomy.

Let us, then, consider briefly these segments of our problem. To most of you who read this book, falling ice has been limited to hailstones, mostly small, perhaps the size of marbles. But in trying to organize data on ice which falls from the sky, we ran head-on into cases where chunks of ice weighing from a few pounds to some tons were known to fall, and without final proof we were forced to give thought to "spacebergs" which might weigh thousands of tons each, maybe hundreds of thousands, and which arrived from space in swarms of hundreds or even thousands, and left vast scars on the surface of the earth. We were compelled to consider some of these falling blocks of ice as having been produced by, or at least associated with intelligent entities. It was even necessary to consider various sources for the orbital ice, depending on whether it came from the exploded fifth planet, whether it was blasted off the earth by prehistoric atom scientists, whether it was detached from the earth by tidal action when the earth and moon were united, whether it fell off the moon, or just where did it come from? In sifting out these cases where intelligence seemed to be involved, we found the process to have certain resemblances to panning gold nuggets from alluvial gravel. At least if the nuggets were there, we had to do our own sifting.

We went through similar compelling experiences with regard to falling stones, falling live animals, and falling animal or organic matter. We found that life arriving from the sky was almost universally of a low order, such as reptilian or aquatic, and we found that some of it involved such intellectual elements as functionality, localization of target and repetition in fixed areas. The only common denominator for all the observed conditions turned out to be -- of all things --hydroponic tanks in space craft!

ON THE HEAD!

And if we are confronted with a falling object of crystalline rock obviously shaped as an optical aid, are we to cravenly call it an erratic, and discard or ignore it? And are we to cringe before the deposition of a few hundreds of dead birds from the heavens, all on one city, but of species completely scrambled and mostly unknown within hundreds of miles of that city?

What would you do with a piece of meteoric iron, unmistakably shaped by intelligent hands, but which was equally unmistakably removed from solid formations of geological Tertiary Age of 300,000 years ago? Wouldn't you perhaps reshuffle your conception of the antiquity of intelligence and wonder whether it was, for a fact, indigenous to this planet?

If you found raw meat, with hair attached, falling over a two-acre space, from a clear and undisturbed sky, wouldn't you struggle even harder to find some kind of category for it, and a common denominator of explanation relating it with other phenomena?

SPOILED FOOD, DROPPED.

If you found that water sometimes arrives from the sky in solid masses, flooding little brooks until they washed away villages, but neglecting the brooks a half mile away, wouldn't you look for a category outside routine meteorological storms?

These problems all had to be faced. Something had to be done about them -- and they all arose from objects falling from the sky. Also, they had to be distinguished from meteorological storms -- for some of the clouds which we studied just appeared, spat a stone or two and passed on. They were not thunderstorms, What were the?

Those were the problems which we faced in a welter of data on things coming from the sky, but they were, on the whole, less puzzling than events which directly involve people, or which were clearly current actions and not merely things which may have been operated in distant times and places. Among those phenomena involving people, the sudden disappearances are probably the most amazing. Some have disappeared instantly, while being watched by friends and close relatives. Crews have mysteriously disappeared from ships-- sometimes within sight of their home port--without warning and without trace.

HEH! IF HE ONLY KNEW WHY, HE'D DY OF SHOCK.

There are too many instances of planes and ships disappearing for us to ignore them. One plane is reported to have flown into a cloud from which it never emerged, while the crew of a blimp disappeared before the eyes of dozens of watchers. We are still wondering what happened to about fifty passengers from a plane whose wreckage was found recently on a mountainside in the Pacific Northwest.

These are several of the instances which have prompted some writers to postulate that UFO's were on the attack. My contention is that, at the very worst, such an attack is no more organized or malicious than that of a redcapped hunter stalking deer in the Pennsylvania mountains is an attack by the human race against the deer; and there may be elements of similarity.

It is almost an inseparable corollary to our thesis that we admit to an unfathomable antiquity for mankind, or at least intelligence, upon the earth, and its vicinity. This conclusion is made unavoidable by the antiquity of records of UFO's and wingless flight. It is apparent in the innumerable megalithic works of stone which involve masses too huge to be moved by means other than levitation and which have been standing for ages before any written record now available.

THE MAN IS CLOSE, TOO CLOSE.

As these pieces of the jigsaw puzzle make themselves known, and as we realize fully that this is an old, old problem, we can begin to take comfort. If UFO's have been here for 300,000 years and have not yet chosen to launch a mass attack on humanity, it is scarcely likely that they will do it now -- unless they are forced to do something to prevent the world's experimenting militarists and scientists from destroying the earth through ignition of its hydrogen, thus crating another nova or new star in the galaxy, a may well have been done when the fifth planet disintegrated at an incalculable time in the past.

So there are two elements of importance in our study of the antiquity of intelligence: the proof that superior beings have been here longer than mankind has been civilized, and the demonstration that forces were at work in those millennia, the magnitude and nature of which are only suspected today.

Is this, then, a hint that we are at this moment awakening and, like a chrysalis, emerging into a new and much more powerful state of existence and cognizance? Are, therefore, our current troubles, domestically and internationally, but the excruciating birth pains of such a renaissance, as we could not have imagined one short generation ago? Will we, then perhaps be welcomed rather than repelled by the intelligences which inhabit the UFO's or which may even be the UFO's?

Man's Emotional structure is such that he cannot awaken to Powers of 'True-'Thinking.'

Alright so it was not thougth that man would ever mature, Don't worry, Jemi.

Probably the oldest, and almost surely the most prolific of sources bearing on wingless flight, are the records of the Indian and Tibetan monasteries. These in themselves are almost conclusive. Records of 15,000 years ago imply wingless flight at least 70,000 years prior to that. Add this to the recorded visit of a space fleet to the court of Thutmose III, approximately 1500 B.C., and we are close to paralleling the sightings of today. Evidence of continued interest by the space dwellers comes from medieval France where Adamski was completely scooped by elements of the French populace who were given rides in the UFO's.

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

> No Not pals but the French are such of an general Pholosophic attitude Even in that Day that they were chosen to be contacted. Now, some L-M's live in france out of preference in field of Philosophical Study. They like it.

If early visits to Asia, subsequent contacts with the Egyptians at the peak of their culture, rumored associations of flight with the disappearance of Atlantis, and tours of France some centuries ago, indicate a pattern, then it may be of little wonder that the civilizations of today, perhaps the most spectacular of all, are receiving attention.

In many ways, the most intriguing data of all comes from the skeptical astronomers. Their observations do tend to be quantitative, timed, and documented. The astronomical data is more than merely qualitative. In other words, the astronomers themselves, being conscientious data hounds, were not content with merely seeing things move in space. Although unaware of the true nature of what they saw, they recorded as much as time and equipment would permit, and, as a result, they have enabled us to locate the habitat of the UFO's.

As with out own observations today, any single sighting by an astronomer could be a mistake or an illusion. But hundreds of sightings are involved, and dozens of serious, reliable astronomers.

BOY! IF ONLY HE KNEW THE THOUSANDS.

Many round things have been seen crossing the discs of the sun and moon, and some in space with no background. Roundness implies spherical or discoid shapes. Lights have been seen in space, some of them near Mercury, Venus, Mars, and the moon, and some between us and those orbs, so that they might be on their surfaces. In the case of the moon, lights have been seen on the surface. There have been shadows on the moon and on the earth which could have been cast only by manipulated space contrivances. The advent of the great comets and the red spot on Jupiter in the late 1870's was coincident with the mysterious appearance of a new crater on the moon precisely the size of the UFO's seen by astronomers between the earth and the moon.

The astronomers have seen two distinct classes of objects: the spherical, definitely outlined ones, and the hazy, nebulous ones. Both have appeared to undergo intelligent manipulation and exhibit erratic motions. In all of these are features that have counterparts among the sightings listed by lay observers since 1947. Simultaneous observations by tow or more observers have at times established the approximate distances of the UFO's through study of parallax. ("Parallax" is the displacement, often measurable, caused by looking at an object from too different points; e.g. hold up a finger and view it with first one eye and then the other. The displacement against a distinct background is parallax.) All-I-all, the astronomical evidence for UFO's while less voluminous than other types, is better grounded in factual and quantitative data. It must be given great weight.

If, in reality, the astronomical profession is to be forced into the position of being the principal witness for the defense, in the case of the UFO's its members will suffer a most peculiar type of embarrassment, for theirs is the unenviable position of having been most dogmatic and derogatory.

It seems unfortunate that astronomy, once the leader in the search for qualitative knowledge, is apparently degenerating into opposition to pioneering. Yet, astronomy, while strictly an observational and not an experimental science, takes front rank in denying authentic observational data which threatens in the slightest to upset its own scientific applecart.

IT SEEMS QUIOTICALLY RELIABLE OF HUMANS TO WAIT

TILL THEY THEMSELVES HAVE KNOWN FLIGHT & THINK NOW OF SPACE-FLIGHT BEFORE ADMITTING THAT OTHERS TOO HAVE FLIGHT. NOT, OF COURSE, (HE!-HEH) THAT THEY ARE SURPASSED,NO NOT WHEN THEY NOW ARE CLUED TO AN EQUALING IDEA IN FORCE FIELDS. THEY NOW HOPE TO BECOME EQUALS. ALAS!

In an observational science such as astronomy, laws have to be built from innumerably repeated observations and not, as is partially true in physics and chemistry, on the basis of duplicative laboratory experiment. In such cases, as the astronomer knows only too well, repeated observations must be accepted as tantamount to proof.

H-K HAS Enough observations, as he says, They ignore them

Many of astronomy's tenets are in such a category. To take only one example, the hypothetical life history of stars is based entirely on the so-called spectral sequence built solely upon spectroscopic observations of thousands of stars and the subsequent grouping and arranging of these into some logical structure. Even in this ponderous sequence there are erratics, or stars with peculiar spectra, whose real nature is a matter of speculation even after a hundred years of spectroscopy. Yet, the astronomer can hardly deny the existence of the obviously shinning star, no matter how recalcitrant may be its light waves.

There Is Intelligence in Space

The vast amount of material from the past, in all categories, shows clearly that intelligence exists in space! "Intelligence" is the sine qua non of our analysis. Without it our thoughts may be meaningless. Wit it, our corollary postulates are automatic.

Is Nothing, Harvard expiereiments show that only a few Humans Have Pie factors of any depth. They cannot tele-talk to any Clarity, Nor thusly are they able to "see" beauty of Each others Souls. Thus they are forced into Matierialistic Values & concepts & and Lack any SORT OF REASONABLE PHILSOSPHY TO LEAD THEM UPWARDS. SAVE THE GREAT BOOK.

Throughout this book, we make some rather fine distinctions. The difference between rain and "falling water" is one. For our concepts of our spatial environment we have to make a similar division between "mind" and "intelligence." "Mind," for our purposes, is the thinking function of the brain of mankind, or perhaps of lower animals. By "intelligence," we must conceive more broadly of an ability to think, construct, direct, analyze, plan,, navigate, laugh, etc., which is not necessarily a part of, or associated with, a carnate brain. In short, we must adjust our ego to the possibility that intelligence exists in space, that it may be and probably is superiour to our own, and that it may inhabit physical entities of a discarnate nature such as the nebulous or cloudlike bodies observed by Barnard (described later.)

Throughout, we are searching for objects, bodies, events which have been made, shaped or guided by forces obviously controlled by an "intelligence" which has the power of decision as opposed to those which have merely been acted upon by "physical" forces and "physical" laws, such as gravitation, and the Keplerian or Newtonian laws. Only thus can we establish "intelligence" as a universal component of neighboring space.

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

Einstiens Theory of Unified Field throughout all Space & atmosphere WAS SO WELL PROVEN that upon realizing Mans Misanthropic emotionality He Withdrew it. 1927

Nobody know the precise nature of this spatial intelligence, much less the nature of the physical body within which its resides. This intelligence seems to manifest itself in many ways. In our study of storms we have been driven inexorably to admit that some storms have an artificial aspect, as sort of organic appearance, an air of being manufactured for a purpose and to be carrying out that purpose. We therefore postulate some percentage of artificiality, or intelligence, among that small percentage of storms which suddenly appear in otherwise undisturbed skies, proceed with a purposeful manner, as though concealing something, and discharge peculiar materials. They seem to concentrated, perhaps too directive, to be entirely meteorological in their orgins (sic).

DEAD GIVE-AWAY! HE KNOWS, SAYS AS MUCH, TOO.?

As a means, then, of assuring that we do not knowingly overlook any possible contributory evidence in the case for the UFO's, I ask you to keep these storms and cloud formations in mind, and, if possible, to fit them in to the basis of any comprehensive conclusions which you may eventually draw.

I believe that space structures of five to twenty miles in diameter are sufficiently large to produce such storms, and there may be elements of purposefulness in so doing, if only for camouflage or concealment.

THE L-M GREAT ARK=BIGGER!

It may be difficult to see the significance of antiquity in the consideration of space flight or space inhabitance. But failure to consider the sprawling background of the UFO problem is the greatest single factor in the appalling chaos which engulfs this enigma. Take but one small item: the little piece of meteoric iron which was found deep within a tertiary coal bed. The locale and the finding are authentic. The shape is purely artificial. It is but an inch or so square, practically a cube. Four sides are squarely faced, and the other two are convexly shaped, with complete symmetry. Around the four surfaced sides runs a groove, geometrically contrived. Here are three established facts:

1. Placement in an incipient coal bed some 300,000 years ago.
2. Made of meteoric iron, identifiable by structure and chemical content.
3. Clearly shaped by artificial means.

The number of explanations as to how it got into that coal bed may be few or several, but there is one underlying fact which cannot be scoffed into oblivion: This piece of natural steel was shaped by an intelligent instrumentation at least 300,000 years ago!

BEFORE STEEL WAS KNOWN TO H.S.

We can go on, but somebody has to make a choice, or deny and ignore the entire factual substratum. Science has ignored it. The choice is most galling to face: Was this gadget, created as it was by intelligence, placed there by man indigenous to earth, or was it dropped from space by a space traveler?

You choose to say: placed by Man? Then there was a race of men here 300,000 years ago who knew enough to shape steel, and, by inference, make machinery. If they could do that, they most likely had locomotion of some sort, and there is no good reason to deny that they could have found space flight either by research or accident. At worst there was time to develop a civilization of any preassigned refinement. Science doesn't like that. Alternative to that horn of the dilemma, we must contemplate space flight of 300,000 years ago, capable of bringing this little machine part to the earth, or of bringing civilization itself and planting it here within that type of animal life judged most likely and suitable to perpetuate and develop mental capacity. It is indeed a nasty choice for inhibited minds.

TO WIT; THEY HAD THE WHEEL IN MANY FORMS.

EINSTIEN WASN'T ALIVE THEN, BUT THE NATURAL FUNCTIONS OF OUR UNIVERSE & this planet Worked Well without him.

We can conclude that space habitation has existed for many a millennia. We do not care whether earthmen took to space as a matter of convenience, comfort, and safety after blowing off a portion of the planet; or whether space inhabitants created terrestrial intelligence "in their own image." Bluntly: "What's the difference?" The basic thought is that man is living in a world in which he is neither the completely dominant nor the supremely intellectual being.

HUH, HE'LL NEVER ADMIT IT, THOUGH: PRIDE.

There has been a raging controversy for generations between pro-Atlantians and anti-Atlantians as regards the antiquity of civilized mankind upon this planet. The archaeological remains of those nuclei civilizations, which have, for 7,000 years or more been recovering from the celestial impact which caused the traditional flood, redistributed the surface soil of the earth, destroyed continents and made new ones, sunk Atlantis and Mu and raised hob in general, are readily available in quantity. They offer easy materials for study. Archaeology and ethnology, sharing with astronomy the feature of being observational and not experimental, have built their entire framework upon the study of those remains. Yet, underlying and intermingled with this vast array of material, there are remnants of cultures of almost unspeakable age. Their artifacts have been subjected to geological and cosmic cataclysms of almost incomprehensible violence and few major relics remain for perusal. Those few, however, are cast aside as the erratics of archaeology and ethnology, and their very existence is buried or denied in efforts to avoid toppling the house of cards so laboriously established by those branches of learning.

THAT'S JUST IT, NO ONE HAS DARED SPEAK, EXCEPT

These studies break down almost completely at an antiquity of approximately 7,000 years, at which point they meet with what the mathematician calls discontinuity. Many of the oases of culture thus studied appear, suddenly, in final analysis, as going concerns, with little indication of forward development and considerable to show that they were degenerate remnants of something already lost behind the misty curtain of antiquity. It is my belief that we must admit to the "doings" of man in the eons prior to the collision of the earth with a vast aggregate of meteoric material which struck the Western Hemisphere some 10,000 to 15,000 years ago.

Books have been written, libraries of them, to show this antiquity, but it has not yet been accepted, even in principle, by any branch of science. Geology opposes any type of cataclysmic change in the structure of the earth and will go to any extremes to avoid coming to grips with its erratics.

Yet every science breaks down when it is forced to contemplate the origin of man's intellectual development. (Printing in Red is A & J)

IE. WHAT INSPIRATION CAUSED MAN TO BECOME MAN BY STARTING TO USE TOOLS. WHENCE CAME THE IDEA. SCIENCE SAYS "OF NECESSITY" BUT THE SAME NECESSITY EXISTS FOR APES…. EVEN NOW.

The few erratics in the following pages show that there have been very ancient cultures, or civilizations, which may have and could have developed methods of flight much simpler and more effective than ours, and more directly associated with forces which we do not yet comprehend. Again we are dealing with indirect evidence, not always of the greatest clarity. Yet in support of an antiquity of such an order I have seen and touched stonework carved out of the solid mountains of rock in South America, which certainly antedate the Andean glaciers, and almost as certainly predate the formation of the mountains themselves. This work is superior in technique to that accomplished by our currently machanized civilization. Much of that construction, sculpture and tunneling could only have been accomplished by "forces" different from those in use by us today. The quandary is largely resolvable by admitting to a levitating force developed and used by the same common denominator--space flight--which simplifies so many other puzzles for us.

PRIDE IGNORANCE

On the basis of the evidence of an antiquity involving epochs of 50,000 to 200,000 or 300,000 years or more, we postulate the ancient development of some kind of science which either produced space flight or was brought to this third planet via space flight. I do not believe it is of great significance to our thesis at the moment whether one, or the other, of these assumptions is most likely to be true. Either is abhorrent to science and to some religions, yet either presents a background of conditionality favorable to an extremely ancient development of wingless flight. Nothing else answers all of the conundrums presented by observed and recorded facts.

As you will see, history is replete with stories of another great category of phenomena: the mysterious and ghostly disappearances of people, singly and in groups, publicly or in unobserved obscurity. These skin-ting-ling episodes seemed at first to have little in common with the falls of objects and the antics of storms. Many are incidents which, if their reality has been admitted at all, are in the view of scientists, spiritualists, and students of the occult, considered to belong to or border on the so-called supernatural. Within these segregations we must place the disappearance of the crews of ships, such as the Sea Bird and the Marie Celeste; the disappearance of individuals while in the company of their peers. There is not much hypothecating to be done with these. The stories can be told, and the cases lumped together as one big unexplained group of events. No explanation other than that of abduction by intelligently navigated aerial or celestial craft can be advanced: It is almost a case of proof by default.

With planes, there is perhaps some added element other than metal fatigue which involves striking some apparently solid object while in the air, or being rent by unimaginable forces just before falling. (Because of this additional evidence I have put the accidents to planes into a separate section of Part Three, below.)

Planes seem to hit something which crushes them or tears them apart, which is nevertheless invisible, and which strikes with such suddenness that the pilots do not have time to make an outcry via their ever-live radios.

Then, too, there are cases of dead or frightened birds, and the cases of people being struck by unseen forces, as with seventeen marching soldiers in eighteenth-century France who were simultaneously struck down by an invisible agency.

One had a compass on him, fouled a "SWEEP" made L-Ms ANGRY

After analyzing these things, one speculates as to new types of obstacles as well as new forces. Take the mysterious Maunder object, which moved deliberately across the sky above southern England in November 1882. Rand Capron, an authority on auras, said it was auroral, while other equally competent scientists said it was a physical or material object. Then there are the many modern sightings of things which seem to manifest intelligent action, and to possess all normal physical characteristics except mass or weight. We recollect that radar sees things which are not visible to the eye.

ARK IN STASIS, THEN CAME OUT OF STASIS.

From such analysis we come by easy stages to conceive of a force, ray, or focal point, in some force-field either; unknown to us, or at least not understood, which produces rigidity in a localized or sharply delimited volume of air, or possibly in space itself. We are thinking of something like crystals of ice freezing within a body of water. The element remains the same but its physical attributes change suddenly and drastically.

DEH O', They Can't Prove it yet!

Another example might be the passage of a limited but powerful magnetic field through a scattering of iron filings or iron powder. Before the approach of the magnetic flux, the powder lies loose, flexible, and penetrable. Yet, when the flux enters it, invisibly and imperceptibly to the senses of man, this docile powder become rigid, tenacious, coherent, and at least semisolid. Do the space dwellers have a force which produces this temporary rigidity In the air, or even possibly in the gravitation field itself? Or do they create "local" concentrations of the gravitational field as we are able to do with the magnetic field?

REVERSE MAG. FORCE?

Suppose that some intelligent entity was directing a concentration of potential which could make small volumes of rarefied air rigid, could set up a sort of island in the gravitational or magnetic field, moving the island about as the spot of a searchlight is moved on thin clouds. Such a thing would be invisible, would have many of the physical attributes of a solid body, but very small mass. For example, its movement through the air would be wavelike, and would not envolve translation of the medium any more than the spot of the searchlight would require movement of the cloud which enabled the beam to attain visibility. In moving, this island would simply "freeze" on the advancing edge and "thaw" on the trailing edge. In this way it could have almost infinite velocity, and also acceleration, just as the spot of the searchlight. In this manner it would appear to be free of mass, and actually it would be free of mass, because only the force beam would move, not the air. Yet in resisting the impingement of a bird, a plane, or perhaps a meteor, it would have mass, and a very destructive mass at that. A pilot flying a plane into such a body would have no warning. Yet if such a thing were a few hundred yards in diameter, its mass in resisting the plane would be thousands of pounds, perhaps tons. The analogy to a ship hitting an iceberg would be very close.

If such a force island were formed in the upper atmosphere, it might be very possible for it to have many of the physical characteristics of a solid body, and yet in matters of illumination it could behave exactly as any other auroral phenomena. In this connection we must remember that auroral phenomena are magnetic and may be caused by streams of electrons from the sun which are, in effect, precisely the type of force beam upon which we are speculating.

Yes, He is Close, but doesn't think of Mag. Inductors or of Gravity as "air" Or thought of in Jet propulsion. He doesn't know gravity & Magnetizm (sic) can be drawn into a ship, built up to High Power, While being converted & used as a Force-Propulsive HE MAY KNOW OF FORCE-SHIELDS of Primitive Ancient type.

It seems obvious that a single beam could not have the effect which we have suggested, else the freeze would take effect along the entire length of the beam. However, it is possible that the three-dimensional volume enclosed within the intersection of two beams might create such a congealed island.

Speculating further on this weird possibility, remember that oxygen is a magnetic substance. It is not, perhaps, paramagnetic like iron, manganese and nickel, but nevertheless sufficiently magnetic that it can be separated from the other constituents of air by means of a magnetic field.

2000 Watt Cyclotron, built 1948, N.Y. STATE GIVES PROOF OF THE ACTUALITY OF "SOLIDITY" IN FORCE-FIELDS (sic) HOWEVER, IS NOT RECOGNIZED YET, OR THOUGHT OF YET AS TOOL.

If such a congealment were possible, consider the result of crossing the two beams at the exact aerial position of a flying plane and congealing the air around and in the plane. Could you, in this way, hold a plane in suspension, or even carry it away? Could you, by a similar concentration of beams, freeze two aviators on the sands of the Arabian Desert, and carry them away? Could you freeze a man and instantly lift him out of sight, or cause him to be invisible within the block or frozen air or oxygen? Could you freeze the crew of a ship, and remove them from the vessel? Could you catch or kill birds, quickly and over a vast area, with such a thing, and dump them on a city in Louisiana? All these peculiar things happened, but we don't know how, or why.

Before we leave this tantalizing topic, give thought to the nature of an aurora borealis. As early as the time of Maunder's object, it was recognized that auroras are magnetic phenomena, or at least associated with the earth's magnetic field. It has been further ascertained that they are related to sunspots, and that they are probably due to the interaction of electronic streams from the sun or from sunspots. Is not an aurora, then, something very much akin to the congealed islands which we have just postulated? Is it not a delimited volume of rarefied air caught within the tripping reaction of an electron stream passing through a magnetic field? Was Maunder's object, then, in a sense both material and nonmaterial; both massive and nonmassive? Is it the incounter with the "pockets" which makes meteors explode? Do they make blips on a radar screen?

S-F REGARDED AS FANTASTIC DREAMERS. D-W

Have we a clue here, or are we dangerously close to science fiction?

Short-Cut to Space Travel (He has "hit the nail")

It is but a step from such contemplations to a similar analysis of the "Foo" fighters, fireballs, the comet-like objects usually seen in groups of six or eight, and the darting evanescent things seen now and then over Washington D.C. Such phenomena must be considered as most likely due to intelligent manipulation, or remote control, from distant structures, and technically trained observers have often said as much. We do not entirely rule out a self-contained intelligence, but many of these manifestations have more the quality of something which, for want of an established terminology, we might call the searchlight type of UFO. Many reports have described objects or UFO's as appearing to have been operated by remote control. I believe that they are exactly that.

It is by no means clearly established that all apparently self-luminous phenomena are of this nature. There are still a number of luminous spheres and discs which seem to have a more material nature and to contain the intelligences which operate them. The widgets seen by astronomers in space are examples, and I think, too, of such things as the ruddy disc which buzzed Captain Manning's DC-3 near south Bend, Indiana.

The "Devil's Hoofprints" and related phenomena, discussed below in Part Three, offer another key or clue, and in segregating them from the mass of unclassified data we can, again, remove a considerable segment of the load which burdens the psychic and paranormal field. The misinterpretation adherent to the Hoof marks are more fantastic than the phenomenon itself. It is unbelievable, to me at least, that people intelligent enough to make a living among their fellows would try to interpret a linear sequence of exactly duplicated marks, crossing roof tops, walls and haystack unfalteringly and indiscriminately as animal tracks. These marks were equally spaced, occurring singly, not in twos or fours. Even in the old mythology there is no tale of a one-legged animal.

The Measure-Marker was accidently Left Idling, that time. Nowadays, Measure-Markeres are Not used, except by Undersea-Explorers. (Italics by A)

Here is something clearly mechanical. With equal clarity it is something maneuvering in the sky. Since the mysterious phenomenon occurred half a century before our race developed mechanical flight, this, to me, is an isolated and clear-cut indication of space flight.

Throughout the series of modern (after Arnold) sightings of UFO's there is a thread of frequent references to "Mother Ships" and huge superconstructions. The vast thing chased by Mantell and the ten-mile-long thing/over Kansas are examples. There can no longer be serious doubts of their existence. It seems probable that these constructions are the domiciles of the small-fry discs, spheres, balls of light, etc., which are so frequently seen in proximity to the earth's surface and to our planes, rockets, air fields and cities.

It is my belief that these constructions are few in number, not many (there is some possibility, in fact, that there may be only two of them) and that they do not come from distant planets such as Venus, Mars, Jupiter or the vastly more distant stars. It is my belief that they are usually globular, sometime spindlelike, and that they are an indigenous part of earth-moon binary-planet system. I make this statement on the basis of hundreds of astronomical observations in which the rough determinations of parallax can be made. Parallax shows these objects to be somewhere between a few hundred miles away and a maximum of something less than the distance of the moon. While I believe that these space islands probably use both earth and moon for their own convenience, I suggest that their most natural and permanent habitat is at the gravitational neutral of the earth-sun-moon, three-body system which is well within the orbit of the moon.

Why Not, The Neutral has Less wearing effects on Tissue, Nerves & Lets one Live Much, Much Longer. Humans Die Due to Gravitational Wear & tear, too.

Dean Swift was prescient in regard to his astronomy, predicting that Mars had two small satellites, one of which was close to Mars' surface and made two revolutions daily. It has been pointed out that this inner body is too close to Mars to be in adjustment with any known postulate of the natural distribution of satellites relative to their parent body. This may be an indication that Mars' inner satellite is artificial.

Also an old "Dead-Ark" S-M MAKE

It has been postulated that gravitation need not be considered as acting with uniform continuity, from the center of the attracting body outward, even if subject to the inverse square law. Such a concept, today, would be especially horrendous to physics and astronomy. Yet, there is a suspicious rhythm to the distribution of planets, outward from the sun. This has been somewhat crudely expressed in Bode's "law," and in spite of scientific protestations there is a similarity between atomic structure as we comprehend it and the obvious structure of the solar system.

TODAY IS When it could be if the Most Technical use Tomorrow is too-Late for these War-Lovers.

& HOW ABOUT MOLECULAR STRUCTURES & ITS "FIELDS"???

Refinements of Bode's law indicate nodes in the gravitational field, at which planets, asteroids, and possibly comets and meteors tend to locate themselves. An extension of the theory to the satellite systems of the major planets indicates a similar system of nodes on smaller scales, where planets, rather than the sun, are gravitational centres. This indicates a sort of generality, and since these smaller planets, such as Venus, Earth, Mars, do not have satellite systems (the moon is more of a companion than satellite and may have joined the earth through acquisition rather than formation), it might well be that these gravitational nodes are occupied to some degree by navigable construction.

"Nodes," are the old Traps & burial "Grounds" Here Lay quite a few Dead-Ships they cannot get away. The old types couldn't but these new types can. It was nodes in great number on Surface of this Earth that gave the clue to L-M's of How to Neatralize forces but a floor pattern in METAL ACTUALLY SHOWED THE MEANS.

Over a period of almost two hundred years there have been many modifications of Bode's law, in an effort to completely generalize it, and to make it theoretical as well as empirical. Many researchers have extended the law so as to establish nodes right down to the surface of the central bodies, and in so doing the nodes become closer and closer together so that there may be many of them at short distances from the parent body. Thus, if the law or its derivatives have significance, there could be a number of these orbital nodes between the moon and the surface of the earth.

We can therefore, take it as highly probable that there are many zones of convenience around the planets, as well as around the sun, which are presently unoccupied by planets or satellites of any considerable size and which may well be used by enlightened space dwellers. Such zones, if they exist, are in addition to the demonstrable earth-sun-moon neutral. Since this system of nodes appears to be some function of the radius of the attracting body, it may be that there is a complete series of them in concentric circles starting at the surface of a parent body such as the earth, but their existence or true nature can hardly be known to us until we can in some way determine the nature of gravity itself.

No, they are Part of Same Physics Principal.
They DO Extend outward concentrically, Usually stay in position, Not, always.

There may even be hints available to us regarding gravity. For instance, no final settlement has ever been made of the argument over the opposed wave and corpuscular theories of the propagation of light. An assumption that the ether, a necessary adjunct to the wave theory, is identical with the gravitational field, whatever that may be, would reconcile the opposing theories and a quantum of light would then be merely a pulsation or fluctuation in the gravitational field. Intense studies of the movements of space-navigable UFO's might furnish vital clues to such problems.

It would only tell all, What this one has guessed.

Let us go back for a moment to the matter of masslessness of some of the UFO's. Their ability to achieve enormous acceleration has been one of the greatest puzzles to scientists. Time after time we are told that the UFO's could not possibly contain living bodies of flesh and bone -- that such bodies could not withstand the stresses imposed by the observed accelerations. Yet such argument can well be based on entirely erroneous ideas as to the nature of the propulsive forces used by the UFO's. Acceleration is damaging only because the forces necessary to produce it are applied externally to the living body, or to the structural members of any flying machine. Any force which would simultaneously accelerate every molecule of either the living body or the mechanical structure would avoid all such stresses, and both the living and the mechanical could undergo any amount of acceleration without the slightest damage or discomfort!

Ei! Yeih:

GOTTEN FROM "TANKS" & in the tiny "Life-boat-ships, Was seen.

IT WORKS FINE.

Since the UFO's, even the material, structure like ones, are observed to sustain acceleration without mishap, we cannot but conclude that whatever the force used for such violent propulsion may be, it must be of such a nature that all fractions of the accelerated bodies are acted upon individually. This could only come about through reactance with the gravitational field, because nonmagnetic materials do not react to a magnetic field. Therefore, since such movements are observed, we have to stop thinking in terms of jet or rocket propulsion, or reactance with a magnetic field, any of which subject both flesh and metal to outside pressures, and instead, ascertain how space craft obtain reactance with gravity. (red is A&B)

DO MOST CERTAINLY REACT.

It should be obvious to all engineers and scientists that rocket propulsion will never solve the problems of space travel, not only because of the unavoidable problems of acceleration, but because of the impossibility of transporting the necessary fuel and carrying the heavy reactance motors. Few laymen realize that, for rocket flight, the fuel is of dual purpose. Its ability to produce energy is no whit more valuable than its ability to produce inertial reactance when expelled through a jet, and therefore, any rocket propulsion craft must carry mass in some form for the purpose of being expelled so as to create reactance. Using fuel for both energy and reactance is only a partial solution of the problem, and obviously limits both the range and speed of a space craft. (Red is A & B).

QUITE TRUE, ROCKET CARGO (word illegible) DO.

Atomic power is certainly not the answer, at least not as regards jet or reactance propulsion, for all of the atomic power in the world will not move a space craft, by reactance propulsion, unless there is an enormous mass to be ejected and lost. The amount of such expendable mass is proportional to the weight of the craft and the square of the speed obtained. It is exactly here that the great cost and impracticality of current attempts at rocket flight occur.

True*, in the way he thinks of applying. Can XXXXXX Worked in Combination.

A cheap power must, therefore, be found. By cheap power we have in mind something like the effect of the winds on sailing craft, [1] or the reactance of revolving cylinders with the winds, as was tried on a Scandinavian vessel twenty to thirty years ago. Such a force or power will have to originate in reactance directly with the gravitational field, since magnetic fields will not account for the observed accelerations nor are they, so far as we know, extensive enough in space.

[1] This probably refers to the series of notes on the preceding page.

If the money, thought, time, and energy now being poured uselessly into the development of rocket propulsion were invested in a basic study of gravity, it is altogether likely that we could have effective and economical space travel, at a small fraction of the ultimate cost which we are now incurring, within one decade.

Our present path of development will not give it to us.

Science has consistently scoffed at any thought of gravity control or levitation, and such scoffing has had to be accepted as authoritative in the absence of proof to the contrary. Such proof now seems to be within sight, or at least there is increasingly strong evidence that gravity is neither so continuos so immaterial nor so obscure as to be completely unamenable to use, manipulation and control. Witness not only the documented movements of UFO's in the form of lights, discs, nebulosities, etc., but the many instances of stones, paper, clothes baskets and many other things which have been seen to leave the ground without apparent cause. The lifting of the ancient megalithic structures, too, must surely have come through levitation.

I should have enjoyed seeing Lemis Chieftran trying to Maneuver The first Craft before directional field induction was discovered. That, to Me, is a Classic tale of Howlingly Good Humor.

The same inhibited thinking which has consistently aroused our protests is responsible for the maladjusted direction of our attack on the problems of space flight through rocket power. There must be, and almost certainly is, a better, shorter way of accomplishing it. The difference between the pre-Incan methods of handling huge stone masses and those of our present-day engineers offers a kind of parallel. We should be looking for the simpler, more direct course-- not wasting our resources on unworkable methods.

In the magazine, Look, August 24, 1954, there was an article entitled "How Close Are We To Space Flight?" by J.Gordon Vaeth. He thinks we are not very close. If we accept his reasons we have to agree with him. He says the problem is too massive, too expensive, too intricate. We might add, ponderous. And--he is quite correct if we continue along present channels of research and development. Our procedure is expensive, cumbersome, tedious, and extremely wasteful of money, time, manpower, and intellect.

If, on the contrary, we shift our concentration to the intensive study of gravity, and put on that problem brains and education comparable to those which have solved the problems of fission and atomic structure, it is my honest belief that we can whip the problem of space travel inexpensively within a decade. It is my belief that something of the sort was done in the antediluvian past, through either research or through some fortuitous discovery of physical forces and laws which have not as yet been revealed to scientists of this second wave of civilization.

It is always easier to uncover a principle, or a fact, if it is known in advance to exist. This is certainly a fact that helped the Russians in their development of the atomic bomb and the H-bomb. It probably helped Columbus in his quest for the "Indies," even though he found something slightly different. It is my belief that the possibility of gravity control, or at least gravity reactance, has been strongly indicated by the phenomena listed in this book.

He May know of this principle but he needs to

The Home of the UFO's

There seems to be something of periodicity in events of celestial and spatial origin. This has been called to our attention by John Philip Bessor in the Saturday Evening Post as early as May, 1949; but no one has thus far been able to catalogue and classify enough of this data to determine for certain whether such cycles exist, much less their time period or cause. It is not particularly astonishing that these phenomena should be cyclic, for practically everything astronomical is periodic. If periodicity could be firmly established for these phenomena, that fact alone would be proof of their reality and integration with the organic world about us.

The rush of oddities and unusual events in the decade 1877 to 1887 is very much in evidence. Perhaps it does seem to be drawing the long bow a bit if one tries to make out that the presence of the great comets, or the activity of the Red Spot on Jupiter, were influential in causing such events, but that all of these were concomitant is undeniable. If space life is limited to the earth-moon system, there is probably no common cause, but it must, however, be borne in mind.

Of greater pertinence is the observed and authenticated activity on the lunar surface during those and the immediately preceding years. Not only were there appearances and disappearance of lunar craters abaout the size of some of the larger space craft which have been seen but there is some evidence that nebulous entities hover over these evanescent craters and contribute to their obscuration.

Observations of UFO phenomena and related events on or near the earth's surface may be distorted by excitement, emotionalism and prejudice. But the direct observations of space life and its contingent activity, as seen by astronomers are more objective and more coolly recorded. We can feel more relaxed in dealing with them, on more solid ground.

Astronomical observations break naturally into three categories: lights, shadows, and bodies. Lights and shadows, perhaps, in reality comprise one group since one is the counterpart of the other, while bodies, on the other hand, tend to divide into two groups, one made up of solid contrivances and the other of nebulous or cloudlike units.

Lights seem to be especially representative of intelligence, particularly when they appear to have independent movement, or to shine in places where there seems to be no natural organic activity, for lights have to be created as well as manipulated. The hundreds of observations of lights on or near the moon and in other parts of nearby space --lights which seem to exhibit volition, purposefulness and direction – are extremely difficult to explain on any other basis than intelligent activity in space. On the other hand, they become a natural corollary to such activity. Again, since science has failed utterly to offer any other acceptable explanation, we ask that these lights be taken as one more phenomenon which can be simply adapted to our organic environment by the one common denominator of space flight and space life.

Shadows are almost as easily identified with intelligence as are lights, and one is pretty well the counterpart of the other. Their validity cannot be denied. Russell's shadow on the moon, 1,500 miles in diameter, holding a steady position for hours, cannot be lightly dismissed. The shadows on our own clouds, as seen in Texas and England, are irrefutable proof that some kind of dirigible bodies are moving in our upper atmosphere or in nearby space.

Bodies seen in space may be considered to have more direct and obvious connection with intelligence than do lights and shadow. There was a time when astronomers, seeing these by the dozens, thought them to be intra-Mercurial planets, or asteroids. Keen analysts have long since dispelled that misapprehension, but they have not discouraged nor discredited the sightings. These have remained without explanation for many decades, and some for hundreds of years. All of these observations gradually came to be regarded as erratics, to be ignored if possible. Astronomers who did not make any such observations liked to call them hallucinations, especially the spindleshaped ones whose configuration did not resemble that of more commonly known celestial objects. Mass passages, such as those seen be Herschel and Bonilla, were laughed off as being bugs, birds or seeds; or at worst, meteor swarms.

Ship frames, unfinished & being pushed or turned to new bases, during the Last War.

Little effort was made to determine the parallax of such objects, so their distance was never fairly established. We cannot blame the individual astronomer too much for this, particularly since many of those observations were made by amateurs. In those days it had not entered our comprehension that any of these spatial wanderers could be so close to the earth that parallax would be noticeable between observers only a few score miles apart. It has remained for us, awakening to the importance of those old observations, to make what we can of parallax studies for determining the distance of the objects sighted. It is not astonishing that our findings substantiate earlier analyses, but there may be an element of amazement in finding that these bodies are being navigated within the earth-moon system.

There is something more of astonishment, however, in finding that the astronomical observations include two distinct and divergent types of bodies: the solid, geometrically shaped structures, and the ill-defined nebulous clouds. Both have been recorded by impeccable witnesses. Both have been shown to exhibit evidences of intelligent direction or control. Both have their parallel instances among the current observations of UFO's seen by the man in the street, since 1947, and by our forebears as shown in historical records.

Strangely enough, however, the cloudy types have been seen really far out in space, and rather probably associated with such large comets as that of 1882. But whether seen two-thirds of an astronomical unit away or hovering over New York Harbor, they have had peculiar characteristics. Some of those seen by Schmidt in the neighborhood of the great comet in 1882 were moving both with the comet and at right angles to it, and there were undoubtedly objects moving about within the head of the comet.

The astronomical observations are so definite that we must leave them largely to speak for themselves, other than to point out again their concentration in certain years. It may be that further investigation will disclose other years of concentration, but the task is an enormous one. It is possible to say, however, that the search has been fairly exhaustive for the years 1877-86. There is reason to think that the next intensive investigation might bear fruit if concentrated around the prior years 1845-1860.

It is my contention that these observations of space movements are well explained by the existence of controlled space clouds and space structures, and that nothing else known to man does explain them. That the structures are the habitat of some kind of intelligence seems reasonable enough, but we also begin to wonder if intelligence is also inherent in the big clouds. If it is, then we are almost certainly going to have to adjust ourselves to a new type of intelligence and "life."

Have refused acceptance for 200 ages, How could they ever adjust to What they refuse to accept?

Observations by Harrison, Gould, Perrine, Swift, Brooks and others demonstrate incontrovertibly that some of the objects seen by astronomers are subject to volitional and purposeful controls, whether they are cometary (nebulous) (sic) type (as per Harrison, Perrine, Gould, Bone), or of the planetary (structural) sorts (as per Watson, Swift, Lescarbault, Gruitheinsen, et al.).

The astronomical literature from 1885 to the present has been but sketchily included and researched. If it is but a fraction as prolific as that of the "comet years," there is, indeed, a wealth of UFO lore awaiting some research. It is to be doubted if there is as much in later years, because it became increasingly unfashionable to publish such information. It is barely possible that the editorial offices of some scientific publications may retain some of their old correspondence, and, if so, readers who have enough interest and access to those files might reap a rich reward from a bit of browsing. Search of observers' notebooks and observatory files might also bear fruit, and the old files of daily and weekly papers, especially where there are professional observatories or active amateur clubs, might disgorge some valuable information. I welcome reports of such items.

I suggest an alliance between amateur astronomers with telescopes and UFO enthusiasts, for the purpose of keeping eyes on the gravitational neutral of the earth-sun-moon systems. At times of new moon and of solar eclipse, this neutral point will be directly in line with the sun and moon, which will either be superimposed in the sky or be very close to each other. As the moon approached first quarter the neutral will swing to the east (left) of the sun and will move back into line between first quarter and full moon. After full moon and until third quarter the neutral will move to the west (right) of the sun, and will again swing toward the sun between third quarter and new moon. The neutral will reach its maximum distance to left of right at first and third quarters, but will not follow the moon around the earth. At new moon the neutral will be very close to the moon and that will be the time to watch for objects landing or taking off from the moon, although it is the worst time of all to see anything in that region because of the glare of sunlight. On the other hand, at the time of full moon the neutral will be closest to the earth, and directly in line with the sun, and that will be the time to watch for objects crossing the disc of the sun, probably from left to right. All of this on the assumption that space structures do make use of the neutral on account of the lessened navigational problems. Look for formations and groups which are especially indicative of intelligent action.

Cometary masses, on the other hand, will be more easily seen in other parts of the sky and are less likely to be using the neutral. Look for them in the northern sky on dark nights and expect them to look exactly like small comets without tails, or like a small nebula. Their rapid motions will give away their nature. Watch the regions of terminator on the moon for lunar surface activity. You might get a surprise.

"What are we (humans) that Thou hast placed us only a Little "Lower than the Angels"

Are UFO's Russian

The October 1946, issue of the Intelligence Digest said:

The Soviets have ordered the building of a special centre of Astronomical research--in which will be a number of institutes, observatories and special airdromes where flying observatories, special balloons and airships are to be based for carrying out protracted studies at high altitudes.

Special machinery was acquired and there were further reports of work with monster mirrors. Intelligence Digest reported that the Russians were known to be working on a highly secret project involving cosmic rays, which (without much proof) was surmised to be related to atomic development. They were reported to have made some discoveries far in advance of the atomic research. One of their reported accomplishments was said to be a method of freezing large areas of ground to subzero temperatures, killing everything therein.

If that is so then they also have a Heat Generator all in one IF this is Like to what I'm thinking about, in Principle.

The reporting agency, Intelligence Digest, of London, has proved remarkably accurate in many instances, as for example their prediction in November, 1948 of the explosion of a Russian atom bomb which did actually occur during the following August, within two months of the time predicted.

This is not to say that the UFO's are definitely Russian. But it does appear that Russia has had something during the postwar years, which was worth some very extreme efforts to conceal. Since we were presumably ahead of them in atomic research and development in the late forties, it does seem unlikely that concealment of their own atomic work would have justified such tremendous effort.

One wonders if their vast military deployment has been of that nature--for if they intended to use it against us, their ideal time was in 1950-52 when the United States was weak and spread most thinly over the world. There was just enough ostentatious secrecy about their military operations to make them appear to be the major interest.

UFO's, as we have seen, and as has been pointed out by Palmer and Arnold, Leslie, Wilkins, Fate, and others, have been around for thousands of years. It has been no* secret that some principle of space flight or levitation was in existence; the problem was to rediscover it for contemporary civilization. As we have said before, it is easier to discover a scientific principle if it is known to exist. The Russians have known this as well as we have known it.

We are contemplating space travel via cumbersome methods within a few years-- at most a few decades. If earthlings can be that close to it now, other races, either nonterrestrial or of great terrestrial antiquity, can already have it. If the U.S.A. can foresee space navigation in such a short time, there is no reason why Russia's mathematicians and physicists cannot have stumbled onto the principles which makes it possible.

But there is another, and much more plausible, possibility. Have the Russians captured a space ship? Or have space people taken over the Red Empire?

NUTS.

The secrets of ancient flight and levitation, according to researchers into very ancient oriental records and reported by Churchward, Leslie, and others, have been preserved in the monasteries of the Himalayas: in Tibet, Nepal, India and China. Can there be a direct relationship between this fact and Russian anxiety to capture and control those mountain fastnesses?

Could easily be so.

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

Russia FINALLY admits atomic Warfare would obliterate Civilization from the Earth, No Winner & etc. Would they admitt such if they knew of Nothing better?

Russia may have discovered such a new force or principle, either through accidental scientific discoveries or through capture of a space ship or association with "Space People."

If the UFO's are, indeed, interested in preventing disintegration of the earth through atomic warfare, it is but natural that they would act through control of one or both of the nations now throwing around their atomic weight. Do they, then, control the United States, secretly? Or do they control the Soviets? Or have the Soviets captured a space ship? Whether we like it or not, and whether or not our governments admit the true state of affairs, these are some of the possibilities which we must consider.

If such a condition exists, then even the development of atomic and hydrogen bombs could be diversionary.

Space Flight: Common Denominator

If I should be asked to state my thesis in one word, I believe that this word would be isolationism, or if I could squeeze in a hyphen, anti-isolationism.

Whatever else we may do or think, we have to extend our ideas of one world to include at least one solar system, and maybe more. But, whether or not, it is beyond the comprehension of our weary minds to go further at the moment, and we will just have to be content to consider our solar system as one living entity. This war-weary, heartsick and bedraggled planet is not alone--it is just one cell in a multicellular unit.

GALACTICLY SPEAKING

Let us revive from the sedative idea fostered by both science and religion that man, homo sapiens, of here and now, of the United States and today, is the final, glorious, end-point in the work of an omnipotent and benevolent creator, all alone in an infinite universe. It cannot be true and in our honest hearts all of us know that it is not so.

IT IS NICE TO HAVE COMPANY. EH? DRAGA?

Were I to be granted one more word, that word would be Truth. I am interested in true knowledge, for its own sake. It is my philosophy that science and religion should have at least one thing in common: the untiring, unceasing, unwavering quest of unbiased, undistorted true knowledge of the world around us… and, again, I use the word world in its old, original and all-comprehensive sense.

To cry out that we have discovered the truth about UFO's would be to invite ridicule, even for our effort. Therefore, let us summarize our conclusions and preface them with the same statement of open-mindedness which we demand of others whom we invite to immerse themselves in our studies of historical, meteorological, and astronomical erratics. We believe that our analyses have taken every possibility into account and have provided us with the most logical answers. (Red is A and B)

What this guy Believes he has knowledge to Prove his beliefs in the Main.

Psychological appeal to be Man enough to keep an open Mind, Lively with wanting to know, and to try Not to form any opinion until book is concluded.

Our general conclusions then, are:

1. A vast number of hitherto unexplained phenomena are readily accounted for by admitting that they result from intelligent action on the part of being living in space in navigable contrivances.

2. Abundant observations by accredited astronomers, despite the general attitude of the profession, indicate both the existence and location of the parent structures from which UFO's come.

3. UFO's inhabit the space between the earth and the moon, probably at the approximate region of the earth-sun-moon gravitational neutral, about 165,000 to 170,000 miles from the earth.

4. While some of the larger widgets (like the one chased by Mantell and the ten-miler seen over Kansas) may occasionally come close to our terrain, we see, mostly, the small, agile observers of both solid and nebulous types which they send on exploratory missions.

5. They have developed a source of power much superior to anything of which we aware.

6. UFO's have pointed the way too a shortened research program which might give us space travel in a decade, at a small fraction of the cost of trying to develop rocket flight, if we will only concentrate our research into the proper channels.

7. Russia may well have captured a UFO and be developing the resources gained therefrom, employing atomic experimentation as a diversionary measure.

NOT SO or else she'd have cornered the Worlds Diamond Market by Now as a dead-Give-away that she'd Caught one. (Takes a Powerful Magnetic "Net" to do so) one with a reverse "snap Neutralizer" in it.

8. The very number and variety of the UFO's which are constantly seen is almost a priori proof of an origin close to the earth. Even the distance to nearby planets such as Venus and Mars seems too great to permit of such promiscuity.

We can conclude that the UFO's are permanent because they have been here for many centuries. That we have so suddenly become aware to them may be due in part to an increased activity, but it is more likely the result of our own slow awakening from intellectual immaturity. Exhaustive research has disclosed records of sightings covering thousands of years, and occasionally actual visits and contacts with our race. More of these incidents are coming to light constantly as research is pursued with UFO's in mind. Now that we are aware of UFO's and know what to look for the uncorrelated data of our predecessors takes on a meaning hitherto lacking and becomes significant. It is now up to us to discover and analyze all the data, and to correlate it with current observations.

We can allay our fears of present-day "Flying Saucers." They have been here since before the dawn of our civilization, so what is there to get excited about? If we haven't been molested seriously in two thousand centuries, why get excited now? If anything is at stake, it is our ego, not our physical welfare. (Red is A&B)

Yet, it is hard to discourage the innate feeling that there has recently been a great surge of activity on the part of UFO's as if in preparation for something big. One does not have to look far for a motive. These entities have probably been living in the solar system long enough to have seen the fifth planet explode, destroying itself and perhaps jeopardizing life throughout the system. They may have originated on that planet. Should one be astonished if these space dwellers are preparing to prevent a few fearstricken human beings from blowing up another planet, perhaps the only remaining one which offers supplies and a haven to space navigators? If we are incapable of the self-control necessary for our preservation, are we to assume that superior neighbors will permit their safety to be imperiled by our immature behavior?

Matches our own thoughts.

It is no longer necessary to explain them as visitors from Mars, Venus, or Alpha Centauri. They are a part of our own immediate family-- a part of the earth-moon, binary-planet system. They didn't have to come all of those millions of miles from anywhere. They have been here for thousands of years. Whether we belong to them by possession, like cattle, or whether we belong to each other by common origin and association is an interesting problem, and one which may soon be settled if we keep our heads.

He Knows Something but How Does He know.

In final summary, the UFO's have been around us for a long time and probably are a connecting link with the first wave of terrestrial civilization. They have been used against us in some very minor and insignificant cases, but, on the whole, have either been friendly or indifferent. They are operated by forces currently unknown to us, but of vastly greater efficiency than anything we now contemplate. Space contains enough miscellaneous debris to supply many of the requirements of space life, and the remainder are obtained from the surfaces of the earth and moon, while the UFO's spend most of their time at the neutral points in space. The Russians have something which they have determined to conceal at all costs. The Russians have been doing very advanced experimental research with cosmic forces; UFO activity was stepped up greatly just a year or so after intelligence reports noted the unusual Russian scientific activity. It is not necessary to assume that the Russian basic science is far ahead of our own if we can believe that a space ship has landed in inner Asia and that they have captured it and are studying its principles and experimenting with models -- or that the space people have taken over the Russian high officialdom and are directing their efforts and supplying know-how.

We do have the UFO's. They are of several kinds, always have been, so they may come from various sources. They are either terrestrial, extraterrestrial, or both. We think they are extraterrestrial, but remotely of terrestrial origin.

We believe they are both, and that the Russians may have captured one or more. We think that some new scientific principles are with us, perhaps even now operating within our military laboratories, and may burst forth at any moment -- and that as a race we may be on the verge of something akin to what the modern atomic scientist calls a "quantum expansion"!

No other set of conclusions will serve as a common denominator for all observable facts.

The possibility of the Ruskies have FOUND an old "Dead-Ship" is Not without the realm of probability. His admittance to other forms of Humanoid Life is near-revealatory to what I surmise; He is being Lead by his short-Wave Telepathic nose, so to speak; too "SEE" these things. He says, "WE" and that could imply anything from one friendly L-M to a fellow scientist or his Wife or Some Member of U.S. Government.

If What I, now, surmise, is true, then the L-Ms are in trouble or the S-Ms Wish to War upon the L-Ms & are USING this Man, telepathically, to "get help." Whether this consideration is of import to him only remains to be seen. If is isn't , then, He will be Left out on a Emotional Limb, trying to say "See, I am right, "They" are Wrong" & will forget what IS important here.

Falling Ice

It has been postulated that there are "lands in the sky" from which ice falls to earth periodically. But there has never been a positioning of these lands. No one tells us what kind of lands, where they are, why ice falls from them or why ice exists on them. The lands in the sky theory is based solely on the locale of the falls and the kind of ice noted.

Read the following citations, bearing in mind our thesis that intelligence or intelligent direction does explain the selectivity of materiel and locale.

Selectivity can be intelligent or nonintelligent. The affinity of hydrogen and oxygen, which produces water, is what we consider nonintelligent selection. The direction which makes rifle bullets strike on or near a target is what we believe to be intelligent direction or selectivity.

Repetition of falls on the same pinpointed area from fixed regions above a spinning and revolving earth is incredible. But repeated showers, selectively directed by intelligence, is a probability within the grasp of the uninhibited thinker.

We list these occurrences with two thoughts: first, to show that there is a great amount of activity in space which has origins difficult to explain on the bases of Newtonian or Keplerian laws, second, they indicate that the simplest explanations common to all of these puzzles is that they originate from the actions of space contrivances or the intelligence directing such mechanisms.

The following reports are from The Books of Charles Fort:

1802: During a storm in Hungary on May 8, a mass of ice fell which was three feet long, three feet wide, and more than two feet thick.

1808: The sun suddenly turned a dull brick red on May 16. At the same time there appeared, on the Western horizon, a great number of round bodies, dark brown, and seemingly the size of a hat crown. They passed overhead and disappeared on the Eastern horizon. It was a tremendous procession lasting two hours. Occasionally one fell to the ground. When the place was examined, there was found a film which soon dried and vanished. Sometimes, on approaching the sun, the bodies seemed to link together in groups not exceeding eight. Under the sun they were seen to have tails, Away from he sun, the tails were invisible. Whatever their substance may have been, it is described as gelatinous "sopy (sic) and jellied."

1811: Lumps of ice, a foot in circumference, fell in Derbyshire, England, on May 11.

1828: A mass of ice about a cubic yard in size fell in Candeish, India.

1829: A block of ice weighing four and one-half pounds fell at Cazorta, Spain, on June 15.

1830: A profound darkness came over the city of Brussels, on June 18, and flat pieces of ice, an inch long, fell to the ground.

1844: A block of ice weighting eleven pounds fell at Cette, France, in October.

1849: An irregular-shaped mass of ice fell at Ord, Scotland, in August, "after an extraordinary peal of thunder." It was said that this was homogenous ice, except in a small part, which looked like congealed hailstones. The mass was about twenty feet in circumference. The story, as told in the London Times, August 14, 1849, is that, upon the evening of August 13, 1849, after a loud peal of thunder, a mass of ice, said to have a circumference of twenty feet, has fallen upon the estate of Mr. Moffat, of Balvullich, Rosshire. It was said that this object fell alone, without hailstone.

1851: Ice the size of pumpkins fell in Gunfalore, India, on May 22.

1851: Masses of ice, each piece about a pound and one-half in weight, fell in New Hampshire, August 13.

1853: Masses or irregularly shaped piece of ice fell at Pouen, France, on July 5. They were about the size of a hand and described as looking as if all had been broken from one enormous block of ice.

1854: At Pourhundur, India, December 11, flat pieces of ice, many of them weighing several pounds each, fell from the sky. They are described as large "Ice-Flakes."

1857: The London Times of August 4 reported that a block of ice, described as "pure" ice, weighing twenty-five pounds, had been found in the meadow of Mr. Warner, of Cricklewood. There had been a storm the day before. As in some of our other instances, no one saw this object fall from the sky.

1860: January 14, in a thunderstorm pieces of ice fell on Captain Blackiston's vessel. "It was not hail, but irregular-shaped pieces of solid ice of different dimensions, up to the size of half a brick."

1860: In a snowstorm in Upper Wasdale, England, on March 16, blocks of ice fell which were so large that at a distance they looked like a flock of sheep.

1864: During a storm at Pontiac, Canada, July 11, pieces of ice fell which were one-half inch to two inches in diameter. What is most extraordinary is that a respectable farmer, of undoubted veracity, says he picked up a piece of ice, in the center of which was a small, green frog.

1869: Near Tiflis, large hailstones fell which had long protuberances. The most remarkable point is that a very long time must have been occupied in their formation.

1877: Ice as large as men's hands killed thousands of sheep in Texas on May 3.

1880: In Russia, June 14, red hailstones, blue hailstones and gray hailstones fell in profusion.

1882: A mass of ice weighing about eighty pounds fell from the sky near Salina, Kansas, in August. Mr. W.J. Hagler, a North Santa Fe merchant, collected it and packed it in sawdust in his store.

1882: Pieces of ice eight inches long and an inch and one-half thick fell at Davenport, Iowa, on August 30.

1883: A lump of ice the size of a brick, weighing two pounds, fell in Chicago, on July 12.

1883: There was a storm at Dubuque, Iowa, on June 16. Great hailstones and pieces of ice fell. The foreman of the Novelty Iron Works stated that in two large hailstones, melted by him, were found small living frogs.

The pieces of ice which fell at that time had a peculiarity as bizarre as anything in this book. They seemed, evidently, to have been motionless for a long time floating somewhere.

There could be no more perfect description of ice suspended in meteoric orbits.

1886: In a small town in Venezuela, April 17, hailstones fell, some red, some blue, and some gray.

1887: In Montana, in the winter, snowflakes fell which were fifteen inches across and eight inches thick. (Snowflakes?)

1889: Intense darkness at Aitkin, Minnesota, April 2; sand and "solid chunks of ice" fell.

1889: At East Wickenham, England, on August 5, an object fell, slowly, which was about fifteen inches long and five inches wide. It exploded, but no substance was found from it.

1891: Snowflakes the "size of saucers" fell near Nashville, Tennessee, on January24.

1893: A lump of ice weighing four pounds fell in Texas, on December 6.

1894: From the Weather Bureau of Portland, Oregon, a tornado was reported on June 3. Fragments of ice fell from the sky. They averaged three to four inches square and about an inch thick. In length and breadth they had smooth surfaces and "gave the impression of a vast field of ice suspended in the atmosphere, and suddenly broke into fragments about the size of the palm of the hand."

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

Crystal, Ice in Great Curved sheets is used at odd times as a Gigantic Lens for close observation of Humankind or Merely for amusement.

1897: Rough-edged, but smooth surfaced pieces of ice fell at Manassas, Virginia, August 10. They looked much like the roughly broken fragments of a smooth sheet of ice. They were two inches across, and one inch thick.

1901: On November 14, lumps of ice fell during a tornado in Victoria, New South Wales, which weighed a minimum of one pound each.

1908: A correspondent wrote that, at Braemar, Switzerland, July 2, when the sky was clear overhead and the sun was shining, flat pieces of ice fell. Thunder was heard.

1911: Large hailstones were noted at the University of Missouri. They exploded like pistol shots. The reporter had seen a similar phenomenon at Lexington, Kentucky, eighteen years before.

The entire report below, from the Science Record of 1876, is worthy of note.

At Potter Station, on the Union Pacific Railroad, recently, a train was just pulling out from the station when a storm commenced and in ten seconds there was such a fury of hail and wind that the engineer deemed it best to stop the locomotive. The "hailstones" were simply great chunks of ice, many of them three or four inches in diameter and of all shapes: squares, cones, cubes, etc., and the first "stone" that struck the train broke a window and the flying glass severely injured a lady on the face, making a deep cut. Five minutes later there was not a whole pane of glass on the south side of the train, the whole length of it. The windows of the Pullman cars were of French plate three-eighths of an inch thick, and double. The hail broke both thicknesses and tore the curtains to shreds. The wooden shutters were smashed and many of the mirrors were broken. The deck lights on top of the cars were also demolished. The dome of the engine was dented as if pounded with a heavy weight, and the woodwork of the south side of the cars was ploughed as if someone had struck it all over with sliding blows of a hammer. During the continence of this fusillade, which lasted fully twenty minutes, the damage amounted to several thousand dollars and several persons were injured.

Note, particularly, the size and shapes of the "hailstones." This was obviously not a hailstorm. Winds strong enough to have torn mountain icesheets to bits and carried them across the country, would have lifted the train from its tracks. Note, too, the suddenness of the attack.

A more definite case of meteoric ice could scarcely be imagined.

Lest we fall into the trap of suspecting these reports merely because of their age, I shall depart from my desire to draw upon material reported before the present flying saucer phenomenon, and reproduce this letter in Fate Magazine, August, 1950.

The Great Hail

On Sunday, September 11, 1949, three acquaintances, Dr. Robert Botts, Dr. John Tipton, and Dr. T.J. Treadwell, went dove hunting on the Eugene Tipton Ranch in northwest Stephens County, Texas.

Dr. Botts told me about it, and said that it was a fairly clear, hot afternoon on the ranch when the skies let loose with about forty pounds of ice, all in one chunk. Dr. Tipton and Dr. Treadwell substantiate what Dr. Botts says that he saw.

Dr. Botts was sitting by an earthen tank, waiting for birds. He said that he "heard a whistling sound, and when I looked up, I saw a glistening, whirling object falling. It landed fifteen feet from me and shattered into hundreds of pieces." He added that the ice knocked a hole several inches deep in the ground. He immediately called his companions, and, when they arrived, all three saw that the ice was milky white, and when they tasted it they found that it had a soapy flavor.

Botts said there were a few thunderheads in the sky, but none overhead. He declared that no airplanes had passed overhead.

The ice fell about 4:30 P.M., and had not completely melted when Dr. Botts and his friends left, about two hours later.

Treadwell, said that he did not hear the sound of the ice falling, but he arrived on the scene immediately after and saw the chunk where he was sure there had been no ice when he walked by the tank earlier.

Tipton, whose uncle owns the ranch, said that the ice did not look like the truck-delivered variety, but did have something of the appearance of hail, except for the dimensions. All three declared that the pieces were not dry ice, and both Drs. Tipton and Treadwell agreed that there had been no airplanes heard overhead, before or after the ice fell.

After hearing this story, I turned to my Bible, Revelations 16:21 -- "And there fell upon men a great hail out of Heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent." According to a dictionary definition, a talent is fifty-eight pounds.

Can you explain this mystery?

Lewis W. Mathews,
Fort Worth, Texas

Now… how do we interpret these strange falls of ice? What, after careful consideration, do they mean to us?

We have already enough data to indicate three classes of falling ice:
(1) real hailstones, from thunderstorms, or normal meteorological phenomena,
(2) large and small blocks of meteoric ice, which may have been blasted from the polar regions, or oceans, when scientists of Mu invented the first series of atom and hydrogen bombs, and removed Mu, plus a few million square miles of surrounding land and seascapes from the southwest corner of our harassed planet, and (3) ice from some superstructures which make repeated visits to the atmosphere of the earth.

Since some of the pieces of ice, which show evidence of some contact with a smooth surface, fell long before the days of modern mechanical flight, we are forced to assign their origin to some other, older type of space inhabiting, moving mechanism.

It seems most natural that a space contrivance, if made of metal, and coming in from cold space, would soon become coated with ice. That ice should fall, or be pushed off by de-icing mechanisms, or even melt off when the space ships are heated by friction with the air, or become stationary in the sunshine, seems equally natural. If these contrivances are drawing power from surrounding media via an endothermic process, the space structure will become colder and colder to more power it draws, and, in the atmosphere, ice would tend to form on it, just like the frosting of the coils in a refrigerator.

I am fully convinced that huge ice swarms are moving around in space, in orbits like those of meteors. Somewhere in space there is a borderline--beyond it the sun's rays will not melt ice: on the sunward side of the line, melting takes place slowly.

I cannot accept the idea of a floating ice field permanently near the earth. In contrast, I postulate vast masses in orbital motion, so that when they approach the earth they are held against its attraction by the dynamic force of their velocity. Meteoric and cometic orbits are of what we call very high eccentricity, which is to say that the material following such paths varies extremely in it distance from the sun, as compared to the movement of the earth and other planets, which have orbits almost circular. Then, as the ice swarm approach the sun, in its periodic orbital circuit, tiny amounts of ice are melted and, being fluid, the film of melted ice is pulled toward the side of greatest gravitational attraction, probably earthward or sunward. This melted ice flows toward the direction of greatest gravity, on the surface of the spatial iceberg exactly as, and for the same reasons that, the sun and moon pull water toward the proximate side of the earth in their production of ocean tides.

We come to the inevitable conclusion, therefore, that this series of falling ice cannot be explained other than as vast masses of ice in orbital motion, in which case they are an intrinsic element of the space life or space craft, and that their very inconsistency indicates intelligence in space. Since they are not consistent with natural laws, there must be direction behind them.

Falling Stones

What, indeed, do "falling stones" have to do with UFO's?

We shall list, herein, but a few of the more interesting and entertaining examples of stones having fallen from space, and we can note that quartz and other materials not of usual meteoric types indicate something other than meteors. Where else, then, but from UFO's?

Yes, quartz, it has its uses Electro-Magnetically and otherwise on the Home-ships.

It is essential, too, to keep reminding ourselves that because we attribute intelligence too these otherwise inexplicable phenomena, it does not necessarily mean human Intelligence. It is a blow to our ego to accept the fact that our racial intelligence is anything but the supreme summation of creation; however, the quicker we adjust to the notion that the human body and the human mind are but incidental in a limitless welter of space life and activity, the quicker we shall approach a true grasp of the nature of the Universe and our own true purpose in it.

"WHAT IS MAN THAT THOU HAST PLACED (planted) HIM A LITTLE LOWER THAN ANGELS." "angelic" is a good discription of the Little-Men when they aren't on business.

On June 20, 1887, during a violent storm, a small stone fell from the sky at Tarbes, France. It was thirteen millimeters in diameter, five millimeters thick, and weighed two grams. It was reported to the French Academy by M. Sudre, Professor of the Normal School, Tarbes.

It is difficult for the conventionalists to press the old, convenient expostulation that the stone was there in the first place. Such a dodge must be resisted, for…the stone was covered with ice.

The object had been cut and shaped by means" similar to human hands and human mentality." That expression, "similar to," begins to tell a story. It was a disc of worked stone, "tres regulier." "Il a ete assurement travaille." There is no word of any known whirlwind or tornado, or notes of any other objects or debris which fell at, or near, this date, in France. It was a single entity. It had fallen alone!

Can part of our trouble with the acceptance of miscellaneous falls lie in our definition of "sky" and our use of the word sky instead of space? When we get far enough out into space, Only a few hundred miles, the word sky becomes meaningless.

To the surface dwellers, sky is essentially something opposed to earth, or the solid understratum of dirt and pavement on which we live. It is usually thought of as the immediate layer of air above us. But out in space, the earth, with its air and sky is but a minute detail. If you were in a space ship remote from planets, completely surrounded by the blackness of infinity, but nevertheless bathed by the sea of sunlight, what would be your concept of sky?

Monthly Review, 1796: "The phenomenon which is the subject of the remarks before us will seem, to most persons, as little worthy of credit as any that could be offered. The falling of large stones from the sky, without any assignable cause of the previous ascent, seems to partake so much of the marvelous as almost entirely to exclude the operation of known and natural agents. Yet a body of evidence is here brought to prove that such events have actually taken place, and we ought not to withhold from it a proper degree of attention."

That was one hundred and fifty-nine years ago! It is a part of a paper read to a very learned society. These were intelligent and erudite men. They had to overcome their own prejudices, and those of even more bigoted people. They had to undergo a change of concept and to accept a less egocentric or geocentric, viewpoint. They had to attain an increased degree of objectivity. And they had to do it innately, spontaneously, on the basis of accumulating evidence which ran contrary to their every belief and tenet.

1846: Something described as "slag" fell at Darmstadt, Germany, on June 6.

1875: Ashes fell on the Azores.

1879: A quantity of "slag" fell from the sky near Chicago, on April 9. A professor who did not see the fall and who was not there, said that the slag was there all the time. But the New York Times of April 14, 1879 said that about two bushels had fallen.

1881: Two silver crosses were found by Charles C. Jones in Georgia. An unintelligible inscription was upon them and they were definitely not Christian since both arms of the cross were of equal length.

1884: Nature, of January 10, quotes a Kimberley newspaper: "Toward the end of November, 1883, a thick shower of ashy matter fell at Queenstown, South Africa. It was in marble-sized balls, soft and pulpy, and crumbled when dry. The shower was confined to one narrow strip of land, and thus hardly attributable too Krakatao almost halfway around the world. With the fall, loud noises here(sic) heard."

It is most significant that this shower was confined to a narrow strip of land.

1908: A white substance, like ashes, fell at Annoy, France, on March 27.

1910: Charles F. Holder wrote that on September 10: "Many years ago a strange stone, resembling a meteorite, fell into the valley of the Yaqui, Mexico, and the sensational story went from one end of the country to the other, that a stone bearing human inscriptions had descended to the earth… The stone was brown igneous rock, about eight feet long, and on the 'eastern' face was the deep-cut inscription… I submitted the photographs to the Field Museum and the Smithsonian, and others, and, to my surprise, the reply was that they could make nothing of it."

A lot of coke, cinders, ashes and slag fell in, the proximate to, the decade of the 1880's. There are too many cases of stones, fire balls, and other things falling in storms. It is useless to argue that storms pick these things up. The list is too selective. So we have to think of some reasons why these things fall during storms; and one wonders if the storms were created by something outside of what we are commonly calling meteorological conditions?

1885: It was reported that a good-sized stone, of clearly artificial form, had fallen at Naples, in November.

La Science Pour Tous, 5-264: At Wolverhampton, England, June, 1860 a violent storm, there fell so many little pebbles that they were cleared away with shovels… Rept. Brit. Assoc., 1864. Great numbers of small black stones which fell at Birmingham, England, in August, 1858 – in a storm… Mon. Weath. Rev., July, 1888: Pebbles of the water-worn variety, not common to the locality, fell at Palestine, Texas, July 6,1888…Am. Jour. Sci., 1-26-161: Many round smooth pebbles fell at Kandahar in 1834…Mon. Weath. Rev., May, 1883: "a number of stones of peculiar formation and shapes, unknown in this neighborhood, fell at Hillsboro, Illinois, May 18, 1883."

Concentrate on the selectivity—a function of intelligence—and possibly shape. Possibly, we should consider the coincidence of storms, to which we can hardly attribute this selectivity nor the dexterity with which to implement it.

1815: Hailstones the size of baseballs, which were said to contain small pebbles, fell near Annapolis, Maryland.

1824: Small symmetrical objects of metal fell at Orenburg, Russia, in September. A second fall of these objects at Orenburg, January 25, 1825.

Selectivity, repetition, symmetry, timing: attributes of intelligent action!

1884: A report from the Signal Service observer at Bismark, North Dakota, states that at 9:00 P.M., May 22, sharp sounds were heard throughout the city, caused by the fall of flinty stones at Bismarck. Fifteen hours later there was another fall of flinty stones at Bismarck. None reported falling anywhere else.

1860: Professor Sayed Abdulla, Professor of Hindustani, wrote an account of the fall of stones at Dhurmsalla, India, which were of "divers forms and sizes, many of which bore great resemblance to ordinary cannonballs, just discharged from engines of war."

Note that some of these Dhurmsalla stones were spherical. Spherical stones are most likely shaped by intelligence. It is further noted that, within a few months of the fall of the Dhurmsalla "meteorite," there had been a fall of live fish at Berares, a shower of red substance at Furrackabad, a dark spot observed on the disc of the sun, an earthquake, "an unnatural darkness of some duration," and a luminous appearance in the sky that looked like an aurora borealis.

1855: A series of explosions in the sky, fall of debris, slag, cinders, powder, discolored rain, reported at and near Crieff, England.

Recurrence, in a localized area, of unusual events, mostly of celestial, or mysterious origin.

1858-1868: Dr. C.M. Inglsby, a meteorologist, wrote: "During the storm on Saturday (12) morning, (May), Birmingham was visited by a shower of aerolites. Many hundreds of thousands must have fallen, some streets being strewn with them." Many pounds of stones gathered from awnings. Greenhouses damaged. The same type of stones fell again at Wolverhampton, thirteen miles from Birmingham, June 9, 1860, two years later. Eight years later they fell again in Birmingham. Birmingham Daily Post, May 30, 1868: Letter from meteorologist, Thomas Plant, who said: "I think for one hour the morning of May 29, 1868, stones fell from the sky at Birmingham. From nine to ten o'clock, meteoric stones fell in immense quantities in various parts of town. They resembled, in shape, broken pieces of Rowley ragstone…in every respect they were like the stones that fell in 1858." In the Post, June 1, Mr. Plant says the stones of 1858 did fall from the sky, and were not washed out of the pavement by rain (although of the same shape) because many pounds of them were gathered from a platform which was twenty feet above the ground.

This phenomenon may have continued in driblets, for in the Post of June 2, 1868, a correspondent wrote that on the first of June, his niece, walking in a field, was struck by a stone that injured her hand severely. In the Post, June 4, someone else wrote that his wife had been cut on her head by a stone while walking down a lane.

Some of these big falls occurred in storms, and all of the falls are identified as being of the same appearance as the Rowley ragstone with which Birmingham was paved, and the old explanation of whirlwinds is invoked. But regardless of the origin, there is again repetition and a selectivity of material which is inexplicable except through intelligent manipulation. Why anyone or anything would pick up Rowley ragstone and dump in on Birmingham and Wolverhampton, repeatedly, is more than we can say! There must be a reason.

1896: On February 10, a tremendous explosion occurred in the sky over Madrid, and throughout the city windows were smashed. A wall in the building occupied by the American Embassy was thrown down. The people of Madrid rushed to the streets and there was a panic in which many were injured. For five and a half hours a luminous cloud of debris hung over Madrid, and stones fell from the sky.

Here we have stone falling from the sky, a hint of a localized cloud, luminosity, and definitely the suggestion that some violent activity had come from space. There is also a haunting resemblance to the circumstances of the Great Heresford Quake, in England, of December 17, 1896.

A disc of quartz fell on the plantation, Bleijendal, Dutch Gueana,(sic) and was sent to the Layden Musuem (sic) of Antiquities. It measures six centimeters by five millimeters by about five centimeters. I am puzzled by these dimensions, unless the disc is slightly oval and is six cm. in its major axis and five cm. in the minor axis. This seems to be a good datum. It has some individuality. Even if we omit space ships from our cognizance, this thing could have been blasted into space by our progenitors in Mu when they lost control of the atom.

The Muaneans Never knew What an atom was & Niether did the Atruscan-Lems. They only know & knew Force-field work as their top accomplishment & found that throo Inlay work in Metal that the Anything about quartz that appears to come from the sky is interesting because it helps to illustrate the diversity of debris which drifts around in space. Quartz, as celestial debris, is scientifically damned at present, for science has not yet admitted, openly, the existence of meteoric material other than the two conventional types. Certainly, we do not find meteoric quartz to be plentiful. It's so scarce that if you encounter it, you almost feel instinctively that it has some connection with intelligent being. That may seem an arbitrary assumption; however, worked quartz is something else again!

As I said; it has its uses.

There is the instance of a man, his wife, and his three daughters, of Casterton, Westmoreland, who were looking at their lawn during a thunderstorm when they saw a stone fall from the sky, kill a sheep, and bury itself in the ground. They dug. They found a stone ball. The object was exhibited at a meeting of the Royal Meteorological Society and is described in its Journal as a sandstone ball and it is described as a sandstone by Mr. Symons.

There is a suggestion of symmetry and structure in this object, and it had an external shell separated from a loose nucleus.

Science maintains that it is impossible for quartz to come from any place other than earth. I offer that quartz not only can, but has come from elsewhere. There are two possible sources: (1) that items such as quartz, closely resembling our own geological specimens, may have been blown off this planet by erratic Muvian scientists when they erred in their explosions of hydrogen, and that some of these things are coming home after several eons in orbital isolation, and (2) they may be a part of the space ships or be attracted by them as they pass, drawing them up and then, through some spatial phenomenon, dropping them at a later date.

Bode's law indicated a gap in the planetary sequence between Mars and Jupiter, and near the beginning of the nineteenth century small planetoids began to be discovered at the designated place. They now number much over a thousand, and it is suspected that millions of small pieces of space debris occupy this belt. Astronomical science has never fully accepted the idea that a planet exploded in that location, but a case can be made for such a cataclysm, and it would explain the origin of stones which fell to the earth.

The asteroid zone is the only gap in the Bode systems, but some of the derivatives of that system, which seem to fit observed data a little bit more snugly, have gaps which do not seem to be filled. Furthermore, such systems indicate zones surrounding the larger planets which are not always occupied by satellites, and which may contain interplanetary debris.

The earth-moon system is unique. It is really a binary planet, and while we speak of the moon as being earth's satellite, it may be that this is a misnomer, and the result of a misconception of the formation of the little system. There are a number of traditions, among ancient tribes and races, to the effect that their forefathers were thriving before there was a moon. This would hint that the moon was picked up by acquisition and not formed in the original coagulation of earth-material. At any rate, neither the earth nor its twin Venus formed satellite systems such as accompany the outer major planets. Nevertheless, the laws, such as Bode's imply physical conditions in which either satellites or belts of debris could exist. If this is true, then we see no reason for not suspecting that there may be gravitational nodes around the earth, as around the sun, and major planets; and these nodes may very well be the abode of all manner of particles, either directed or undirected.

Bodes Law to that extent is Proved.

Most of the material in these belts would doubtless be meteoric material, but our experience is that meteoric material includes a much broader category than has heretofore been accepted, and that mixed with it are things associated with intelligence.

MOON NOW RECOGNIZED AS RECENT ACQUISITION OF EARTH. NOT KNOWN FROM WHENCE IT CAME. STRONGLY SUSPECT QUANTUM "GAP" indicated Bodes Law as original position of our Moon.

Falling Live Things

Food expieriments (sic) to compensate for Growing Population of L-M and Mutations.

In the reported falls of live things, we find again selectivity and localization.

There are recorded, by Charles Fort, two hundred and ninety-four distinct reports of showers of living things. The reports are authenticated and are quoted in magazines of learning, substantiated by countless eyewitnesses and newspaper articles, contemporary with the falls. This is excluding, or course, the numerous ancient and biblical references. The latter, for the uninhibited thinker, are not difficult to allow.

Live things falling from the sky have been almost exclusively confined to sea life and lower forms: snails, worms, reptiles, fish, crabs, and a few insects. Most of these have high reproductive rates, simple living habits, and require a minimum of attention to raise.

In case someone is thinking "hoax!" why was it, or would it be, confined to these lower forms? Why not rabbits or groundhogs or cats? Why snails, fish, worms?

Accepting as I do the veracity of the many reports of live things having fallen from the skies, I submit that they are the inhabitants of celestial hydroponic tanks and that their falls come from one of two things: (1) when the tanks are dumped and cleared for refilling, for whatever reason there might be, (2) that the falls may be the residue from the collection from earth while the monitors of the tanks are replenishing their supplies.

Some of Both & of Wrecks & repair-Jobs on Most Ships.

Again we are faced with the admission of intelligence and direction. An intelligence in space controlling either the collection, dissemination, or nurture of sea life, either for study or for food or both, is the only answer which satisfies all the elements of all the reports.

Let us scan but a few of the more dramatic of the falls.

1886: There was a shower of snails, during a heavy thunderstorm, in Cornwall, England, on August 13.

1890: Fish showered over Montgomery County, California, on February 6.

1891: A great shower of fish took place at Seymour, Indiana. They were completely unknown and remain unidentified. This was August 8.

1892: At Coalburg, Alabama, on May 29, a tremendous shower of enormous eels took place. The eels were of a variety unknown in Alabama, though somebody said he knew of such eels in the Pacific Ocean. There were piles of eels in the street, and farmers came with carts and took them away to use for fertilizer.

1892: A yellow cloud appeared over Paderborn, Germany, and a torrential rain fell from the cloud in which there were hundreds of mussels.

1921: Innumerable little frogs appeared in the streets of northern part of London during a thunderstorm on August 17. A thorough search of newspapers of the day indicated no whirlwinds or storms, nothing but frogs!

1922: Toads dropped for two days at Chalon-sur Saone, France.

1924: A shower of red objects fell, with snow, at Halmstead, Sweden, on January 3. They were red worms varying from one to four inches in length.

1925: Mr. C.J. Grewar reported, on March 21, from Uitenhage, Transvaal, that on "The Flats" about fifty miles from Uitenhage he noted some springboks leaping and shaking themselves unaccountably. At a distance he could conceive of no explanation for such eccentricities. He investigated and found that a rain of little frogs and fish had pelted the springboks. Mr. Grewar heard that, sometime before, at the same place, there had been similar shower.

It is interesting to note that this localized repetition; the yellow cloud over Paderborn, Germany, appears to have been an artificially created cloud which might well conceal a navigable structure. It makes us think again of someone opening a vast hydroponic tank in which mussels are grown.

1842: Enormous numbers of fish were reported to have fallen at Derby, England.

1873: A shower of frogs was reported during a rain storm in Kansas City, Missouri. The sky was exceptionally dark.

1877: It was reported that during the winter of 1876-77 at Christiana, Norway, worms were found crawling upon the ground. The worms could not have come up from the ground because the ground was completely frozen at the time and, too, the fall of worms was reported from Sweden.

1877: In Memphis, Tennessee, after a violent storm during which rain fell in torrents, thousands of snakes were found in the space of two blocks! They were crawling on sidewalks, in yards and in streets, masses of them.

Again note the localized area, as if a "dumping" had taken place.

Perhaps the most glamorous of all falls in this category took place in Geneva, Switzerland, on March 21, 1922. The incident, as reported in the Boston Transcript, reads as follows:

"Geneva, March 21. During a heavy snowstorm in the Alps, recently, thousands of exotic insects resembling spiders, caterpillars and huge ants fell on the slopes and quickly died. Local naturalists are unable to explain the phenomenon…"

There are several other records of similar falls in the Alps, and usually in late January. It is interesting to note that most falls of worms and insects are recorded in late winter and often in the snow. It may be that this is merely because we are unlikely to see or notice them otherwise.

Again we encounter selection and segregation, despite the fact that we have a mixture of species. These falls, nevertheless, do indicate selection as they are always of relatively the same order and remain unmixed with twigs, grasses, or other debris from space.

The reports are too lengthy and detailed for inclusion in such a volume as this; however, we should at least mention the many unexplained records of eels appearing in inland ponds and mountain tarns; seals and squids in Onondaga Lake; sudden appearances of plants in unexpected areas; a five and one-half foot alligator found frozen on the bank of Rock River, Janesville Wisconsin; parakeets, one after another, appearing in Scotland, These are all verified, substantiated reports.

But, as we have pointed out, most of the falls of animal life have been reptilian, insect, or other low-grade life forms, especially of marine varieties. Fish are among the highest types. There must be significance in this. Are these things indicative of the eating habits of the beings that run space contraptions? Or are they representative of the operators themselves?

We almost drift into fantasy with the "tremendous red rain" in France, October 16-17, 1846. It is said that this rain was so vividly red and so blood-like that many persons in France were terrified. Two analyses were given. One chemist noted a great quantity of corpuscles—whether blood-like or not—in the red rain. The other chemist set down the organic matter at thirty-five percent. Of significance is the fact, that with this substance, larks, quail, ducks, and water hens, some of them alive, fell at Lyons, Grenoble, and other places.

Chico, California, must be a crossroads for celestial phenomena. Not only are there very extensive falls of stone in Chico, but there have been other phenomena there. In the New York Times, September 2, 1878, it was said that on August 20, 1878, according to the Chico Record, a great number of small fish fell from the sky, covering the roof of a store and falling in the streets and upon an area of several acres. Perhaps the most important part of the observation is that the fell from a cloudless sky.

Hah! Even yet they Honor their Heros of The Great Battle.

1917: A Baton Rouge correspondent to the Philadelphia Times reported that in the summer of 1896, into the streets of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and from a "clear sky," hundreds of dead birds fell. There were wild ducks, catbirds, woodpeckers, and "many birds of strange plumage," some of them resembling canaries.

Usually one does not have to look very far from such an event to learn of a storm, but the best that can be done in this instance is to point out that there has been a storm on the coast of Florida.

Isn't there more than just a hint of intelligent action in the fall of these birds? Especially such a heterogeneous collection of species from widely separated places of usual habitat which are not usually found flocking together? Doesn't this smack of dumping, as in the many cases of fish, frogs, periwinkles, etc.?

I have seen reference to live birds which flew head-on into a locomotive, as though frightened into complete panic; also a group of starlings flying as though completely terror-stricken into suicidal collision in New York streets. What had they seen, or encountered? Something real, but invisible to, or unnoticed by man? Have we some clues in the apparently unmaterial things which are being reported today under the misnomer "flying saucers"?

1921: A shower of little frogs fell upon Anton Wagner's farm, near Sterling, Connecticut.

By way of coincidence, Professor Campbell of Lick Observatory, Ace Aviator Eddie Rickenbacker, conservative astronomer, Colonel Marwick, and Dr. Emmert, of Detroit, all reported from widely separated points of the earth that an unknown, luminous object had been seen near the sun on August 6 and 7. "Near the sun," means, in astronomical parlance, something more or less in line with the sun as seen from terrestrial observation. It actually means "apparently near the sun," not necessarily physically close to that orb.

In conclusion, let us summarize the vital features of these phenomena as they relate to our thesis.

Most falls involve only low forms of life, most of which require water for their environment, or at least a moist habitat. Many falls are reported in clear weather from a clear sky, but most are associated with torrential downpours of water – not an ordinary rain. In some cases, isolated and strange-looking clouds are responsible, and some of these suddenly appear in otherwise cloudless skies. The descriptions of these storms and clouds have an element of similarity and the haunting suggestion arises that these storms and clouds are the result of artificial conditions as opposed to ordinary meteorological forces.

This does not prove that hydroponic tanks exist for the convenience of our space race; however, whether these tanks are for supplies or experimentation, it substantiates our thesis for either a race originally from earth which drove itself to space, or a race which originated in space and keeps in touch with earth.

Falling Animal and Organic Matter

Perhaps the least substantiated, but most fascinating, of the itemized falls include animal and organic matter for which no real explanation is yet available. This material is usually considered, but without real thought, to be the result of whirlwinds picking up the material in one locale and dropping it elsewhere. It has also been suggested that buzzards have been disgorging the matter, particularly the bits of bone and bloody flesh. That no whirlwinds were reported at the time of the falls, and that no flights of buzzards have been reported seems to have been of little consequence.

It is up to us, therefore, to ask: Is there another explanation?

1887: On December 13, in Cochin, China, a substance like blood, somewhat coagulated, fell from the skies.

1888: There was a repeated "red rain" in the Mediterranean region on March 6, and again on March 18. The substance, when burned, had a strong and persistent odor of animal matter.

It is in the records of the French Academy that, on March 17, 1669, in the town of Chatillon-sur Seine, a reddish substance fell which was "thick, viscous and putrid." Only organic matter can become putrid.

There is also a story of a highly unpleasant substance which fell from the sky in Wilson County, Tennessee. A Dr. Troost visited the place and investigated the reports. He declared that the substance was clear blood and that portions of bloody flesh were scattered upon tobacco fields.

On March 3, 1876, at Olympian Springs, Bath County, Kentucky, flakes of a substance that looked like beef fell from a clear sky. Nothing but this falling substance was visible in the sky. It fell in flakes of various sizes; some two inches square, and some four inches square. It was a thick shower, on the ground, on trees, on fences, but it was narrowly localized on a strip of land about one hundred yards long and about fifty yards wide. For the first account see the Scientific American, 34-197, and the New York Times, March 10, 1876.

It is very important to consider the familiar landmarks of selectivity and localization. The geometric shape of distribution, fifty yards by one hundred yards. It corresponds to the size of many of the well-defined falls of toads, fish and frogs. Note, too, the thick shower on trees, fences, and the ground.

In the American Journal of Science of 1833-1834, in many observations upon the meteors of November, 1833, are the following reports of falls of gelatinous substance: (1) that according to newspaper reports, "lumps of jelly" were found on the ground at Rahway, New Jersey. The substance was whitish, or resembled the coagulated white of an egg; (2) that Mr. H.H. Garland, of Nelson County, Virginia, had found a jellylike substance of about the circumference of a twenty-five cent piece; (3) that according to a communication from A.C. Twining to Professor Olmstead, a woman at West Point, New York, had seen a mass the size of a teacup, which looked like boiled starch; (4) that according to a newspaper of Newark, New Jersey, a mass of gelatinous substance, like soft soap, had been found. "It possessed little elasticity, and, on the application of heat, it evaporated as readily as water."

A story from California, reported in the San Francisco Evening Bulletin, August 9, 1869, tells of flesh and blood which fell from the sky, upon Mr. J. Hudson's farm, in Los Nietos Township—a shower that lasted three minutes and covered an area of two acres. The conventional explanation was that these substances had been disgorged by flying buzzards. "The day was perfectly clear, and the sun was shining, and there was no perceptible breeze"; and if anybody saw buzzards, buzzards were not mentioned.

Has anyone ever seen buzzards in one flock to disgorge over an area of ten square yards – much less two acres?

The flesh was in fine particles, and also in strips from one to six inches long. There were short, fine hairs. One of the witnesses took specimens to Los Angeles, and showed them to the editor of the Los Angeles News, as told in the News, August 3. The editor wrote that he had seen, but had not kept, the disagreeable objects. "That the meat fell, we cannot doubt. Even persons of the neighborhood are willing to vouch for that. Where it came from, we cannot even conjecture."

S-M's Work. They eat so revolting amount of Sea Food that Red-Meat is a Madness in Them?

The bulletin also said that about two months before flesh and blood had fallen from the sky in Santa Clara County, California.

These falls of flesh and blood coincide, temporally, with a vast fall of dead birds in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Again we have a familiar pattern: segregation, isolation, clear sky, "about two acres of ground."

There is an interesting item from the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1847. On March 16, 1846, at about the time of the fall of edible substance in Asia Minor, an olive-gray powder fell at Shanghai. Under the microscope it was seen to be an aggregation of hairs of two kinds: Black ones, and rather thick white ones. They were supposed to be animal fibers, but, when burned, they gave out "the common ammoniacal smell and smoke of burnt hair or feathers." The writer described the phenomenon as a "cloud of 3,800 square miles of fibres, alkali, and sand."

According to Professor Luigi Palazzo, head of the Italian Meteorological Bureau, on May 15, 1890, at Massagnadi, Calabria, something the color of fresh blood fell from the sky. The substance was examined in the public health laboratories of Rome and found to be blood. Some said that migratory birds were caught and torn in a violent wind, but there was no record of a violent wind at the time, nor any feathers or dead birds. Later, more blood fell from the sky in the same place.

The Literary Digest of September 2, 1921 published a letter about a fall of a substance resembling blood in southwest China on November 17. It fell upon three villages, and was said to have fallen forty miles away as well. The quantity was great, and in one village it covered the ground completely. The writer in the Digest accepts that this substance did fall from the sky because it was found on rooftops as well as on the ground. He rejects the conventional explanation of dust because the material did not dissolve in several subsequent rains.

In the American Journal of Science, 1-42-196, we are told of a yellow substance that fell in great quantities over a vessel one "windless" night in June, in Pictou Harbor, Nova Scotia. The writer of the article analyzed the substance and it was found to "give off nitrogen and ammonia, and an animal odor."

I don't think there is much intelligence required in the matter of depositing "a yellow substance giving off nitrogen, ammonia, and an animal odor," on a ship. But there could be purposefulness! I feel that there may have been intent or necessity, either of which implies some kind of control or cognizance

Monthly Ship-Cleaning.

In these few examples of flesh and blood having come from the sky, we can readily see that it is not beyond the realm of possibility that our space friends are flesh and blood: however, it is a more likely assumption that these "disgorged" materials have more to do with experiments and "captures" than anything else.

Kuts, Sky burial impossible.

It is possible that there we may have a clue to the whereabouts of the people who have vanished suddenly under mysterious circumstances that have baffled witnesses and those seeking to explain these mysteries.

Other organic materials have frequently been attributed to meteoric activity, but again we are faced with the simple fact that materials fall which do not exist in meteors.

In 1872, on March 9, 10, and 11, something fell from the sky and was accompanied by dust. It was described as red iron ochre, carbonate of lime, and unidentifiable organic matter.

In the American Journal of Science, 1-2-335 (1819), is Professor Graves' account, communicated by Professor Dewey, that on the evening of August 13, 1819, a light was seen in Amherst – a falling object – with accompanying sounds as if from an explosion. In the home of Professor Dewey this light was reflected upon a wall of a room. The next morning in Professor Dewey's front yard, in what is said to have been the only position from which the light could have been reflected, a substance was found "unlike anything before observed by anyone who saw it." It was a bowl-shaped object, about eight inches in diameter, and one-inch thick, bright buff-colored, and having upon it a "fine nap." Upon removing this covering, a buff-colored, pulpy substance of the consistency of soft soap, was found – "of an offensive, suffocating smell," A few minutes of exposure to the air changed the buff color to a "livid color resembling venous blood," It absorbed moisture quickly from the air and liquefied.

Note that the "thing" fell with a burst of light. It is not reported to have come with a storm. It was obviously of either organic or artificial character, and the "sounds as of an explosion" were scarcely normal or commonplace.

But it is interesting to compare that report with another; that in Marcn, 1832, there fell in the fields of Kourianof, Russia, a combustible, yellowish substance, covering an area at least two inches thick, and six hundred or seven hundred square feet. It was resinous and yellowish so one inclines to the conventional explanation that it was pollen from pine trees – but, when torn, it had the tenacity of cotton. When placed in water it had the consistency of resin. "This resin had the color of amber, was elastic, like India rubber, and smelled like prepared oil mixed with wax."

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

Stuff causing "Explosion" was "Force-Impacted" Material Expanding back to Natural "size". Thus,Explosions where no Sound is heard, only seen close by.

In Philosophical Transaction of 1695 there is an extract from a letter by Mr. Robert Vans, of Kilkenny, Ireland, dated November 15, 1695, that there had been "of late," in the countries of Limerick and Tipperary, showers of a sort of matter like butter or grease …"having a very stinking smell." There follows an extract of a letter from the Bishop of Cloyne, Leinster, that for a good part of the spring of 1695 there fell a substance which the country people called "butter" – "soft, clammy, and of a dark yellow" – that cattle fed "indifferently" in fields where this substance lay. "It fell in lumps as big as the end of one's finger." It had a "strong, ill scent." His grace called it a "stinking dew." In Mr. Vans's letter, it is said that the "butter" was supposed to have medicinal properties, "and was gathered in pots and other vessels by some of the inhabitants of the place."

The yellow substance at Kourianof, combustible (organic_ covering six or seven hundred square feet – about the size area we have so often noted – some characteristics of pine pollen… but who ever saw pine pollen of fibrous nature which "when torn had the tenacity of cotton"? Two inches thick means tons!

I am inclined to think that there is something of an indication in these buttery things. There is a haunting quality which says that these substances were formed by some guidance of a higher intellectual grade than the chemical law of averages.

The constant references to substances, rather than naming definite elements, compounds, or natural organic products, is significant. Why, if all this stuff that admittedly falls from the sky is commonplace, natural material or life, is it usually so difficult for experienced and trained scientists and naturalists to give it positive definite identity?

There have been many reports of so-called "spider-webs" and "angel hair" that have fallen from the sky. To give but one example, let us look at the Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser of November 21, 1898, which reported numerous batches of a spider-weblike substance which fell in Montgomery. Some of it fell in strands and some in masses several inches long and several inches broad. According to the writer, it was not spiders' web, but something like asbestos. It was reported, too, as phosphorescent.

It has been suggested that all of the "falling material" is the result of occasional wrecks of interplanetary, super-space contraptions, or even the dumping from them while in route from planet to planet. If one considers this proposition carefully, the natural question is: why so often?

On the other hand, if adjacent space toward the gravitational neutral at the edge of the earth's sphere of influence, perhaps 180,000 to 200,000 miles away from here, should be the habitat of a vast number and considerable variety of intelligently operated space widgets or urban concentrations of the like, then the whole proposition begins to take on a certain amount of plausibility.

In the past two or three decades, there has been a great discussion about miniature fossils found in meteorites, and something about spores and mono-cellular organisms, maybe alive, or at least viable. Everyone, but those whose weak ego demands that they maintain scientific dignity by making categorical denials with professional aplomb, will concede that this question is debatable, and has been since the findings were first announced. But, debatability is something different from inconceivability, incredibility, negative proof, positive proof, or even smug denial. It is an important point to settle.

If settled positively – that meteorites do contain fossils, viable spores or dormant protozoa – than we have proved that life, or remnants of it, does come from outer space. This is obviously a qualitative decision. It is on the periphery of science, especially astronomy, biology, and geology. It can be an anthropological question if it can be shown that human life has mergers with life in outer space.

If one or more of these fossils or elements of incipient life can be shown to arrive on this planet via meteors, we are confronted with a major problem of deciding whether the meteorites were thrown off this earth in the remote past, whether they originated in the explosion of another planet, whether they arrive from interstellar space, whether they grew spontaneously in the general melee of the origin of the solar system –- or where, in fact, did they originate?

A Dr. Hahn has claimed to have found miniature fossils in meteorites, including corals, sponges, shells and crinoids, all microscopic, which he photographed. Some, who didn't see them, taking an attitude of professional scorn, claimed they were not valid. Some trained and intelligent men, like Francis Blingham, who did see them, agree that they are real and were contained in meteorites.

Much miscellaneous junk does seem to come from space, and, with all of this material in space, it is but a step to acceptance of intelligence, or life, some of it in control of vast assemblages of spatial objects or of individual little ones.

One supposes organic material to be a product of life processes, associated with life, or the abode of life. Life implies intelligence, even of an incipient, primitive or rudimentary type. Our contention is that some kind of intelligence has adapted itself to this environment, if it was not actually indigenous thereto.

We shall close this section with a mystery. The following is from Fate, of April 1951.

The Mystery of the Falling Grain

One day last summer construction men were working on the top of the Empire State Building tower, 1,467 feet above the street, preparing to put up a new television mast. Suddenly, something stung the check of one of the men. Then another reached into his shirt collar and picked out a grain of something or other. He looked at it in puzzlement, then flung it aside.

Then other men began to notice the kernels falling upon them. While they looked in bewilderment, nearly a peck of grain fell upon the men. It stung their faces and necks and bounced off the steel floor.

Where was it coming from? They heard no airplanes overhead nor did they see any. There was no wind or storm, though the sky was overcast. Meanwhile the grain continued to fall. Tenants along the north side of the building heard it rattling against their windows.

Samples of the grain were taken to Dr. Michael Lauro, official chemist of the Produce Exchange, who identified it as barley. Dr. Lauro suggested that it might have come from one of the great breweries of New York -- possibly carried up through cyclone chimneys – but hastened to add that he was just guessing. Ernest J. Christie, of the U.S. Weather Bureau, said that the winds that day were too light to have borne the grain aloft. He did not consider it likely that it had blown in from the Midwest. One scientist suggested, but dropped the idea hastily, that birds had dropped the barley.

Of a reasonable satisfactory explanation, there was none.

This Man hints much at there being two distinct species or groups of Similar species to be involved in his observation. Why does he presist in Mere Hinting so strongly. I believe that he KNOWS FOR CERTAIN but can do Nothing. L-M's ARE in for a surprise if he does do something.

Falling Shaped Things

I use the word "shaped" here to mean forming by intelligence.

I suggest the following classifications of things that have fallen from the sky:

A. Object unassociated with intelligent action.

1. Substances of inorganic nature, shaped or moved by random forces: e.g., inorganic dust, "true meteoritic material," etc.

2. Miscellaneous objects.

B. Object associated with intelligent action.

1. Symmetrical Objects: wedges, spheres, discs, threads, carvings, works of art, nails; any object not obviously the product of the unguided forces of nature.

2. Objects and substances of organic or functional nature.

3. Objects, lights, substances, or groups of these, of any kind, which demonstrated motions, control, accumulation placing, selection, delimitation, direction, defiance of gravity or other natural forces, locomotion, gregariousness, purposefulness, or any dynamic or volitional characteristic not attributable to recognized physical forces alone.

We have to consider some of the utilitarian or functional categories as including items which might be used for food: shrimps, periwinkles, snails, etc., or edible substances.

Two purposes will be served in this chapter. We will consider shapes and functional things as related to intelligence and to falls from space, but will also include gadgets which indicated the extreme antiquity of some type of intelligence or intelligent life on earth; and items found in locations and strata where falls from space, or space ships, might have placed them.

In some of these cases we have to decide between several possible alternatives:

(a) Extreme antiquity, attributable to ancient civilizations without space flight;
(b) The same, but with space flight developed internally;
(c) Space flight independent of man on earth, bringing occasional widgets from extraterrestrial sectors of intellectual development;
(d) Falls of items originally on the earth but previously expelled by explosion or other force;
(e) Falls of items blown off other exploding planets.

We cannot forever ignore the immense antiquity of some archaeological items. It is not fashionable with archaeological circles, which is anything but an exact science, to admit the existence of culture or rather civilization, more remote than that of the historically recorded Egyptians and Orientals: four to seven thousand years at most; and heaven forbid if one suggests advanced races in eras of ten, twenty, forty, or one hundred thousand years ago. Yet no scientist has found a logical common denominator for the various races, cultures, and civilizations of which we have unmistakable records, except that of a common source predating the Egyptians, the Chinese, the Indians (Asiatic), the Incas, and the Mayas, and in fact all branches covered by the study of anthropology and ethnology. Much as we may deride writers such as Churchward (as per De Camp; Lost Continents) in his rather crude presentation of his hypothesis of the Lost Continent of Mu, his is the only general explanation of terrestrial intellectual development and distribution to be advanced which in a broad way explains the observed data. Such explanations, however desirable, are ruled out by the fashion of the day which decries emphasis on qualitative knowledge in favor of quantitatively investigating the fifth place of decimals or other exaggerated refinement of classified knowledge.

Who is Churchward or this DeCamp? Some "Gaiyor" Baini who guessed or knew right???

Because we feel so strongly on this subject, we list some of the obstreperous items which prove that articles created by intelligence existed tens or scores of thousands of years ago. These things prove either, or both, of two things: there was a vast and advanced civilization on the earth in those distant times; or those articles have come here from space, via ships, or from a scattering of debris in space. Anyway you look at it, the arrogant omnipotence of homo sapiens takes a beating – for our present egotistical state of culture was preceded by another of unfathomable age.

If intellectual development is that old, isn't it logical that it may have created a form of flight not yet known to our engineers? Let's forget the fifth decimal place – go back to unity – to the objective assimilation of qualitative data; back to philosophical generalizations and the divination of natural law; back, in fact, to the mentality of a Humboldt, a Newton, a Copernicus. Science is starved for such ability, more than at any time in the past century.

A Dr. Gurlt, in 1877, reported an object found in a tertiary coal bed. In several magazines of that general period there were questions from speculative scientific men as to why, if meteors have been encountering the earth from remote times, there are no meteorites in tertiary coal deposits. Subsequent finds have answered the questions. Well, anyway, this object, incongruous in its carbonaceous environment, is a fossil meteorite. There has been much debate, some of it venomous, as to whether it can be more than merely that. The find has been placed in the Salzburg Museum, after being taken from a block of coal in Lower Austria.

The specimen was examined by many interested persons and scientists, who did not fully agree on its origins. Some said that it was a meteorite; some said that it was an artificial production; others remarked that is resembled a meteorite modified by the hands of man. (Nobody, so far as I know, ever suggested that modification could have been effected through the agency of intelligence other than human.)

The object is an almost perfect cube, and many examiners consider it too geometric in shape to be entirely natural. Two opposite faces are a little bit rounded, reducing the size of the other four. A deep incision runs around the cube. The material is of a variety conventionally conceded to be meteorite iron and nickel, roughly three by two by two inches. It weights 785 grams, has a specific gravity of 7.75, and it is hard as steel, as are all iron-nickel aerolites.

I can't help thinking of the little stone of Tarbes: are most of the things, which come from space of a little more physical delicacy than most of the indigenous items of the same types?

This cubic meteorite is most disturbing to conservative science. Its tertiary age cannot be denied, nor its authenticity – that much is firm. That is, it was certainly placed in the coal bed in tertiary times, but no one knows how much older it may be. Equally firm is its nature as meteoritic iron, nickel and carbon (it is really a form of steel.)

The greater puzzle is its geometric shape, including the circumscribed groove, so regularly and doubly "artificial" that it seems certainly to have been shaped by hands.

"Hands"? Human hands, in the tertiary era? No! say the anthropologists. Extraterrestrial hands, maybe on an exploded planet, or blasted off this bedeviled old earth when Mu went up in cosmic glory?

Hands with 3 fingers & thumb

To uninhibited thinkers, facts remain facts. This specimen is artificially shaped; it is a fossil of tertiary coal beds; it is of meteoritic structure and material which even conservative science has reluctantly admitted as being from outer space. So this must have been shaped by intelligence either before or after falling, but certainly prior to or surely concomitant with the formation of tertiary coal.

For our purpose, we do not care whether one says it was fashioned by extraterrestrial hands or terrestrial hands, for we are just as much interested in proving the extreme antiquity of civilized man as we are in indicating the existence of extraterrestrial intelligence. This obstreperous whickeroo was dropped into an embryonic coal bed, either from an indigenous civilization or by an off-shore agency of some kind.

If there was civilization in tertiary times – terrestrial or spatial – the sequel of intelligence in space, then or evolving later from the ground variety, is a quantitative development, and the emergence of space travel is inherent in the later case and an almost inevitable emergence in the former.

It is recorded in the Annals of Scientific Discovery, 1853-71, that Sir David Brewster had made a startling announcement at a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1853. He had, he said, to call to the attention of the meeting an object of so incredible a nature that nothing short of the strongest evidence was necessary to render the statement at all probable. He claimed that a true crystal lens had been found in the treasure house at Nineveh. It is on record that many of the temples and treasure houses of old civilizations were in the habit of preserving things which fell from the sky and things which, to these ancient peoples, were already antiquities.

This egocentric race has been so imbued with its own importance that it cannot believe that optical equipment could have evolved in times prior to the Renaissance. We will concede that such items were not in use during the Dark Ages, nor, apparently, during the centuries from that period backward to some thousands of years BC. But such a concession is, in fact, a victory, for it then becomes necessary to concede a knowledge of optics some millennia before the incarceration of this lens at Nineveh. And that is a major part of our whole tenet.

In The Microscope and its Revelations, Carpenter presents two drawings of the lens, but he argues that it is impossible to accept that optical lenses have ever been made by the ancients. He says the object must have been an ornament. Brewster says it was a true optical lens.

Then we are right back where we started with the little worked meteorite. If either, or both, of these shameless trinkets are indigenous to our planet we must, perforce, accept a civilization with a knowledge of optics, predating all presently recorded history.

These Were Muanian in Make

The London Times of February 1, 1888, has reported the finding of a roundish, or ovate, object of iron which was found in a garden at Brixton, after a violent thunderstorm on August 7, 1887. It is described as an oblate spheroid about two inches across its major axis. An oblate spheroid is the shape generated by an ellipse if rotated about its minor axis, and a prolate spheroid is similarly generated by rotation about its major axis. A football is shaped something like a prolate spheroid, while a flattish pumpkin or tomato is close to being an oblate spheroid.

The paper discussed this object at length, while also describing an "iron cannon ball," found in a manure heap after a thunderstorm. Both items seem to be too shapely, or symmetrical, to have been created without the aid of intelligence. There may be some significance in the fact of their all being small, a couple of inches or so in diameter.

The Scientific American, 1851-52, has the following to say, which is contributory to our theme:

A few days ago, a powerful blast was made in the rock at Meeting House Hill, in Dorchester, a few rods south of Reverend Mr. Hall's meeting house. The blast threw out an immense mass of rock, some of the pieces weighing several tons, and scattered small fragments in all directions. Among them was picked up a metallic vessel in two parts, rent asunder by the explosion. On putting the two parts together, it formed a bell-shaped vessel, four and one-half inches high, six and one-half inches at the base and two and one-half inches at the top, and about an eighth of an inch in thickness. The body of this vessel resembles zinc in color, or a composition material, in which there is a considerable portion of silver. On the sides there are six figures of a flower or bouquet, beautifully inlaid with pure silver, and around the lower part of the vessel a vine or wreath, inlaid also with silver. The chasing, carving, and inlaying are exquisitely done by the art of some cunning workman. This curious and unknown vessel was blown out of the pudding stone fifteen feet below the surface...there is no doubt but that this curiosity was blown out of the rock as above stated...the matter is worthy of investigation, as there is no deception.

Inlay Work the Mark of Atruscan-Lemurians.

The London Times, for June 22, 1844, reports that some workmen, quarrying rock close to Tweed, not far from a place called Rutherford Mills, had discovered a gold thread embedded in the stone at a depth of about eight feet. A piece of the gold thread had been forwarded to the office of the Kelso Chronicle. That is a very simple item, indeed! Just a wee bit of gold thread in solid rock!

Matching the gold thread in interest is something found inside a lump of coal by a Mrs. Culp, at Morrisonville, Illinois, in 1891. When the lump of coal for her cooking range fell apart she was startled to find embedded in circular fashion, a small gold chain about ten inches long and of quaint workmanship. If the cubical Austrian meteorite is not enough to convince you that things of intelligent manufacture were falling into coal beds in tertiary times, then surely this one will.

Cube shaped by Mag. Force compressor.Caused tremendous Heat, thus the regard of it as being a Meteorite.

It is further reported that James Parsons, and his two sons, exhumed a slate wall in a coal mine at Hammondville, Ohio, in 1868. It was a large, smooth wall, disclosed when a great mass of coal fell away from it, and on its surface, carved in bold relief, were several lines of hieroglyphics. Nothing further seems to have been reported, and if any reader knows more of this incident the author would welcome a report (send care of the publisher) – perhaps from some local newspaper of that date. This item, at least, we will concede was not dropped by space ships. It must represent the work of contemporary, indigenous civilization in tertiary times.

In the London Times of December 24, 1851, it is stated that a citizen of Springfield, Massachusetts, a Mr. Hiram de Witt, had returned from California bringing a chunk of auriferous quartz about as big as a man's fist. It was accidentally dropped and broke upon. It had a nail in it. A cut iron nail, about the size of an ordinary six-penny nail, a bit corroded, "straight and with a perfect head."

DISCARDED FORCE-CRYSTAL

According to the Reports of the British Association, 1845-51, Sir David Brewster astounded the assembled brethren with an account of a nail which was found in a block of stone from Kingoodie Quarry, in North Britain. The block of stone was nine inches thick. There was little, if any, evidence as to what part of the quarry it came from, except that it could not have come form the surface. The quarry had been worked for about twenty years, and consisted of alternate layers of hard stone and a substance called "till." The point of the nail extended upward into the till and was badly eaten by rust. Part of the nail lay on the surface of the stone, but about an inch, including the head, was embedded in the stone.

Head imbedded thus could Not have been pounded in Head first, It Would Not go in.

This till intrigues me. Once upon a time I read the book, Raganork, by Ignatius Donnelly, who was a U.S. Congressman with time on his hands, and who spent that time in the Library of Congress, making himself one of the most literate Congressmen ever to invade Washington. His theme was of Atlantis, and he built up a case for this till having been splattered all over the Atlantic hemisphere of the earth by collision with a comet. In this splash were transported the erratics of the till which are so annoying to geologists. Maybe this nail was one of these erratics.

The Learned Rep. Was right, save that It was done by MANY "Comets" in The Great War.

Under the title "Mysterious Monoliths," Fate Magazine, March 1950, shows a photograph of some spherical sandstone balls which were blasted out of solid rock by a highway crew near Hornbrook, California. The balls appear incredibly ancient. Sandstone balls of nearly spherical shape are not especially rare, and they are oblate spheroids which used to be sought after for garden ornaments throughout the Middle West. They were called concretions, and were shaped either by the action of water or by successive deposits of sand which later solidified, according to geologists. We can believe in their natural formation, since the condition in which they were found seem to indicate that this is true. But these balls in California were apparently found in quantity, in solid rock. Their symmetry indicates artificial shaping, they are an indication of antiquity, rather than a proof.

W.S. Forest, in Historical Sketches of Norfolk, Virginia, reports the finding of a coin at a depth of thirty feet, by well borers, in September, 1833. burial at very early dates is indicated. A coin described by Donelly is fully discussed in Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, and was brought up from a depth of one hundred and twenty feet, with the borings of a well in Illinois. The crosses reported in the Smithsonian Institute Reports, 1881 are puzzling. Looked at in a mirror, some of the inscription resembles Roman numerals, but is not quite intelligible. Their appearance is certainly not indicative of anything within everyday experience. They may have been dropped from space ships. The alphabetical characters resemble our own to a degree, but are not interpretable in any known language. These were found in an ancient grave in the state of Georgia.

We continue to have a choice between terrestrial antiquity or spatial antiquity. But antiquity we do have, and a race so ancient, on earth, could very well have invented space travel.

Andes were impelled upwards by Great force once by Nature once by "The War of the Great Freeze" & by, in part "The Great Bombardment"

Some scientists believe that the Andes have been formed twice, and that the last formation was perhaps 10,000 to 12,000 years ago. It probably was farther into the past than that. The meteor craters spread across the southwestern United States and down into tropical Mexico have an apparent age of 8,000 to 12,000 years. The traditions agree that "Atlantis" or its equivalent, was destroyed about 9,000 years or so BC. There are several traditions in several parts of the world that the ancestors of some races and tribes were flourishing before the moon existed.

A detailed build-up for this antiquity is beyond the scope and ability of this book. Mainly we are interested in showing that such an antiquity did exist, and that it is conceivable that some very early race, 200,000 years ago or so, may have developed space flight, and after the cataclysm of 12,000 years ago may have chosen to stay in space, thinking it a safer habitat than this uncertain planet.

We offer no proof for this supposition. What we do offer is a set of conditions which might make it possible, plus a long series of observations of activity in space which gives every appearance of being the result of intelligent direction. Such a hypothesis relieves us of having to assume that the UFO's of today must necessarily come from another planet, or another star. We submit that our postulate is an improbability of lesser order, and that the growing evidence of the antiquity of mankind, far beyond anything heretofore admitted by science is a contributory factor worthy of consideration.

Falls of Water

There are many instances of lights, clouds or structures which seem to exhibit voluntary or controlled motions. This applies to some isolated freak storms which appear in otherwise undisturbed skies. Some of these storms seem to have organic entity. They seem to have many components, including debris of all sorts, and their clouds are apt to be of unique shape, density, texture, or color; they may be luminous or contain lights; they often produce extremely violent winds and stygian darkness.

It is my contention that some of these storms are associated with intelligent action, that they may contain navigable structures which may surround themselves with clouds, for purposes of camouflage, or merely through natural interaction with the atmosphere. We will try to distinguish between these and the meteoritic disturbances proper, some of them very huge indeed, which sometimes appear to share some of their physical characteristics.

Also, we are going to draw a very fine distinction. We must distinguish between rain and falling water. We are going to assume that the rain is falling water, but that falling water is not necessarily rain – at least not as understood by meteorological science.

DEC. 22, California Mysteriously flooded, 1955.

All through our research into the falls of unusual objects from the sky, we frequently encounter the statement that these objects fall in a torrential downpour of water, and almost as frequently we find references to peculiar cloud formations which do not appear to have their origin based on normal, or at least familiar, meteorological conditions – conditions of weather, that is.

We hope that you will give very special thought to the world-wide scope of some of these intense and violent storm periods. There are many cases where storms and floods which inundated a considerable part of our own country have been almost universal in their action. This tends to hint the entrance of the earth into a large cosmic cloud of water and debris sufficient to deluge most of the areas in both northern and southern hemispheres together. The volume of water falling and the concomitants of mud, black rain, stones, etc., indicate unity of external origin.

There are some cases where the distribution of violence follows restricted belts of terrestrial latitude, so that one thinks of the rotation of the earth as carrying successive longitudes into the disturbance.

About the middle of September, 1886, water was falling from a cloudless sky, always within an area of twenty-five feet square, at Dawson, Georgia, and showers were reported over an area ten feet square at Aiken, South Carolina, and at Cheraw, South Carolina, (Charleston News and Courier, October 8, 21, 25, 26). Falls of water from a cloudless sky, to a point in Chesterfield County, South Carolina, and falling so heavily that streams of it gushed from roof pipes.

To the honest skeptic, either layman or meteorologist, who protests that these events, while not usual, are nevertheless not abnormal nor paranormal, I would ask: "Since when are meteorological conditions so stable that water can condense and fall over precisely delimited areas, over such periods of time?"

There is an account from a Dr. Wartmann about water which fell from the sky, at Geneva, Switzerland. It seems that there were clouds on the horizon at 9:00 AM, August 9, 1837, but the sky was clear at zenith. It may not be startling that some raindrops should fall from a clear sky, but these were large drops of warm water, and they fell in such abundance that people were driven to shelter. This kept up for several minutes, and there were repeated falls during a period of an hour or so. Warmed, perhaps, by meteoric velocity?

Repetition, selection, pinpoint localization, warmth!

Not only do we have pinpoint accuracy in these precipitations but there is an obvious tendency for reports of them to be restricted to certain general areas.

Compare these extremely localized falls of water with the highly delimited falls of other objects, and the purity of segregation which is so characteristic of most of the falls which we have noted. It is falls of water, of this type, which we believe should be included in the same overall category with ice, stones, live organisms, etc., together with the dumpings of water concomitant with the unloading of periwinkles, fish, etc. We suggest that intelligence is involved in the obvious selection and placement.

As with the case of ice, we believe there are three types of water falling to the ground. That class of water which seems to partake of direction and isolation corresponds to the ice, for instance, which we postulated to have origin in, on, or with, space navigating objects. We hope it will be apparent that cloudburst and the almost solid masses of water know to fall are the counterpart of the large pieces of ice or their congregations of "chunk-like" nature: in other words, both the ice and the water are meteoritic. Then we have the common variety of meteorologically formed hailstones and rain. To us, there appears a parallelism.

It seems, at times, that there is a merging between the space structure, the water and cloudbursts. Here is a little item from the New York Tribune of July 3, 1922. For the fourth time within a month, it is said, a great volume of water, or a "cloudburst" had poured from one local sky, near Carbondale, Pennsylvania. This event, or series of events, has the localization and repetitive qualities which we have learned to associate with falls of periwinkles, snails and frogs and other things. In addition it has the almost cataclysmic feature, on a small scale, of the impacts of meteoritic masses of water. But in line with our speculation regarding the dumping of hydroponic tanks, we find it convenient to link repetitive, highly localized impacts of dense masses of water with the dumpings. Sometimes there is animal life in the water; sometimes not. We think that some judgment can be exercised in deciding which of these falls of water are meteoritic and which are connected with space contrivances.

In Symons Meteorological Magazine, for 1889, it is said that the annual fall of rain, at Norfolk, England, is about twenty-nine inches, and that is not a dry or desert locality. But Mr. Symons points out that volumes of water up to twenty-four inches fell from May 25,to 28 in New South Wales—and of a deluge much greater, thirty-four inches, which engulfed Hong Kong on May 29 and 30. In the United States, one inch of rain a day is a big fall and two inches is a flood. A normal thunder shower can bring from one-eighth to one-half inch of rain water. Mr. Symons called attention to these two splashes which were a couple of thousand miles or more apart, and posed the question of whether they were merely coincidence, but leaving it to ⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘⌘ professional meteorologist thought ⌘⌘⌘⌘nds of miles apart, might be remarkable, and not easy to explain on any known basis of meteorological science.

This is another example of partial data and partial thinking. Newspapers reported the soak in New South Wales, but from their reports: columns of water fell in other places, notable Avoca, in Victoria; Tasmania was flooded, its fields gutted with floating rabbits. The Melbourne Argus "explained": a waterspout had burst in Victoria. Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales—a whole continent and more – and Hong Kong. That is not local, and bulks of water are not normal. We look for outside help.

Let us now follow the startling cases of the floods of 1913 which seriously damaged our Middle Western States but which were practically world-wide and, for some reason, failed to attract much attention from science or to be recognized as a single, complex disturbance. It is especially this sort of condition to which we direct your attention. We believe that you should question how such a widespread upheaval of our normal meteorological processes could be generated without an encounter with extraterrestrial clouds of space matter.

In March, 1913, farmers were caught short with their spring planting. People were alarmed and driven from homes… March 23, 1913, found the State of Ohio flooded, inundated. Torrents were falling and rivers were out of control. The floods at Dayton, Ohio were singularly disastrous and they were the center of attraction in the national press. 250,000 people were homeless, many homes were obliterated.

Dayton was a shambles of bodies, stalled street cars, snarled traffic, wrecked buildings, and the general flotsam of any flood. Dayton got the headlines, I remember them. I was two hundred miles away, on a farm in western Indiana. It rained there, too. We couldn't plow the land, much less plant crops. That was the year I got my first camera, and I bought a brownie. And one of the very first rolls of film I used was to photograph the tiny brook which ran through our pasture. Only it wasn't tiny then, it was a raging torrent and I snapped my sister standing by it. The little brooklet had a drainage basin not over a half a mile long, but it was a river that day in March. So I remember 1913 and the news from Dayton—the last dispatch: "Dayton in total darkness—no power."

Meteorology was not as advanced in 1913 as it is today, but it was a lusty infant and weather forecasting was not wholly undeveloped. But there was no warning to farmers about the protracted deluge. It surprised the scientists as well as the layman.

On March 23, 24, and 25, a watery sky sat on the Catskills and Adirondacks. It slipped and ripped its pants on a peak, and rivers invaded the streets of Troy and Albany. Lampposts disappeared and furniture floated against the ceilings of rooms. In New Jersey something called a "cloudburst" grabbed factories and made a mess of them, cluttering up the nicely laid out streets. There were a thousand dead in Columbus, Ohio, which is close to Dayton, and the Delaware River at Trenton was fourteen feet above normal. The Ohio River floods at the slightest opportunity—it had a field day. At Parkersburg, West Virginia, people called on their second-story neighbors in rowboats. There were lakes in Vermont. Farmers were caught napping in Wisconsin. Destructive floods occurred in Illinois and Missouri.

By March 27, the meteorologists began to catch up, and the weather bureau was issuing storm warnings (New York Tribune, March 28, 1913). Indiana was an inland sea.

Waters were falling and freezing on trees in Canada, breaking power lines and telegraph wires and flooding powerhouses. Towns were in darkness, listening to crashes of trees heavy with ice. California, two thousand miles from Ohio, was drenched; torrents were falling in Washington and Oregon. Texas should be warm, maybe hot, in latter March; there were unprecedented snows, as also in New Mexico and Oklahoma. Alabama was inundated; Florida flooded.

Deluges in France. All Europe was wet. Not much sunny evaporation there. In Spain, near Valencia, there was a hailstorm: trains were stalled by unusually large hailstones, piles three feet deep.

South Africa is practically antipodal to our Midwest; there were watery fists from the skies of Colesburg, Murraysburg, and Prieska, and one of these bulks was the equivalent of one-tenth of the total normal rainfall of South Africa for a whole year!

Summer in the South American Andes? Maybe, but snow was covering them two months ahead of schedule—and in the jungles of Paraguay people were dispersing in panic from flooded rivers. The Uruguay River was rising—governments were rushing supplies and equipment to thousands of starving, homeless people.

The Fiji Islands were drenched and Tasmania was under water. On March 22, the day before the catastrophe in Ohio and four neighboring States, there began a series of great thunderstorms in Australia; a "rain blizzard" in New South Wales, in Queensland all transportation was tied up.

According to the Wellington Evening Post, of New Zealand, March 31, there was "the greatest disaster in the history of the colony"; where there had been listless rivers there were unruly torrents embellished with the woolly bodies of sheep and the accouterments of farming. The roar of rivers was the cry of drowning and cattle. Store windows were smashed; dead bodies were wrapped in silk curtains from the red-light district.

May, 1889: There was a spectacular "afterglow" in France although no volcanic eruptions had occurred to fill the air with dust—and storms everywhere had supposedly cleared the murky air. There was a red rain in Cardiff, Wales, and red dust fell on the island of Hyeres, off the coast of France. An unknown substance fell for several hours from the sky at St. Louis, crystalline particles, some pink and some white. Fine dust fell in Dakota: looked like a snowstorm. In Greece there was a monstrous debacle and the rivers choked with cattle. The Bahama Islands were on a spree of water. A downpour was described by a newspaper on St. Helena. A drought occurred in British Honduras, followed by heavy rains, June 1 and 2. Floods raged in California, Ceylon, Cuba; cities and plantations of Mexico were raped by deluges.

All in certain Range of Latitude.

Deluges and falls of lumps of ice throughout England. France deluged. Water dropped from the sky in Switzerland, flooding some streets five feet deep. It was not rain: there were falling columns of water from what was thought to be a waterspout. "Bulks Dropped! and one of them was watched—or some kind of a vast, vaporous cow sailed over the town, and people looked up at her bag of water. Something that was described as a large body of water was seen at Coburg, Ontario. It crossed the town, holding its baglike formation. When it broke, it splashed rivers that broke all dams between Coburg and Lake Ontario. In the Toronto Globe, June 3, this falling bulk is called a waterspout. Fall of a similar bulk was noted in Switzerland and Saxony." (Quoted from The Books of Charles Fort.)

One can find plenty of other references to concentrated, local cloudbursts. They are all of a pattern: solid masses of water flooding small demarcated areas, causing local floods and flash flash floods. One was observed in France, yet two miles away, dry land.

These are what we may call single, or isolated slugs of meteoric water.

What can account for these erratics?

Surely, here is proof of intelligence, or selectivity and regularity of a sort which must be attributed to something in space.

Clouds and Storms

Many of these singular objects which are known to have fallen with storms come from storms having some peculiarity. Sometimes the only notation is that the storms were of unusual violence, but even then there is something, perhaps of statistical significance. These small, you might say independent, storms sometimes seem to have causes other than the accepted meteorological conditions. They are quick, tempestuous, sometimes luminous; frequently with geometrically defined clouds of rare and striking colors. They often appear suddenly in clear skies.

As in the instances of some other phenomena, there appear to be three classes of clouds. The first, and most common, of course, are the ordinary meteorological or "weather" clouds. Everybody sees them by the million. Then there are clouds that seem to come from, at least be connected with outer space. These, we can sort into two broad categories, although there may be some merging of one into the other. Of these, the small, peculiarly formed, and sometimes startlingly colored, are the more difficult to define and the rarest in literary descriptions. They are often noted only by a casual phrase in passing, in connection with hailstorms, earthquakes, and sudden violent disturbances of the air; or in some other way they call themselves to the attention of observers whose most urgent interest lies in the more forceful physical aspects which may endanger him, or his crops, animals and home. It is seldom that anyone has the time or opportunity of observing such clouds carefully, and even more rarely does he make notes.

ED: The following has no obvious reference or necessary position.

1955, 9 Hurricaines (sic) Where they never were before & all of a sudden, too

The other category of clouds, or storms, of seemingly cosmic nature, are larger sometimes we think they may be larger than the earth itself, and in the case of dusts or mists they may be very much larger. They seem to cause all sorts of widespread trouble and disturbance, either directly or by generally upsetting the earth's meteorological balance. They may cause discoloration of the sun for considerable periods; or diminution in its light, with ensuing darkness; or very cold weather, such as the extremes of the winter of 1882-83, when space around the earth seemed to be replete with clouds of spatial debris. They may bring floods to the whole earth, simultaneously, they do not always seem to be wholly vaporous, and there are some which are certainly made up of debris, dust, water, stones, ice, etc.

It seems impossible to organize a firm classification from data not at hand. There are apparently mergings or blendings of each type into the others. We will describe and list some of them. Maybe something will work out as we go along.

1697: A horrid black cloud, attended by frequent lightnings, was precursor of a violent hailstorm. Animals were killed, crops ruined, and people had their heads broken. The breadth of the cloud was about two miles. The hailstones were some round, some semispherical and others were embossed and crenulated like the foot of a drinking glass, the ice being very transparent and hard.

1812: The latest remarkable fall of aerolites in Europe, of which there is a distinct account, was in the vicinity of Laigle, Normandy, early in the afternoon of April 26. A fiery globe of a very brilliant splendor, which moved in the air with great rapidity, was followed in a few seconds by a violent explosion which lasted five or six minutes and was heard for thirty leagues in all directions. Three or four reports like those of a cannon were followed by discharge resembling musketry fire, after which a dreadful rumbling was heard like the beating of a HUGE drum. The air was calm and the sky serene with the exception of a few clouds such as are frequently observed. The noise proceeded from a small cloud of rectangular form, the largest side being in a direction from east to west. It appeared motionless all the time the phenomenon lasted, but the vapor of which it was composed was projected momentarily from the different sides by the effect of the different explosions. The cloud was about half a league to the northeast of Laigle, and was at so great an altitude that the inhabitants of two hamlets a league apart saw it directly overhead. A multitude of meteoric stones fell amid a hissing sound.

Thunderbird, Dragon of Lao Fzu, p. 27, Saucer,
ALL the same thing, all Rumble when "Hit" Hard or When in Need of Repairs.

The shape of that "cloud" is important. It seems to be the only sure clue that this could be anything more than an ordinary exploding meteor. Rectangular clouds do not just happen. They almost certainly have to be made. And the cloud appeared to be motionless. Meteors do not remain Motionless. The clouds which they usually provoke are not capable of sustaining the heavy meteoritic material inside, should the whole complex become immobile. So this cloud was certainly not of ordinary meteorological origin, and seems to partake of artificiality. Also, a stationary state is indicative of control.

There is something of the incongruous in meteors which exit from clouds, especially clouds of such peculiar formation that they do not associate easily with the common variety of weather clouds. Maybe that seems to be a rather remarkable statement. But if a meteor is moving through the atmosphere at a rate of ten to twenty miles per second there is not much time for clouds to form ahead of it. A cloud train behind the meteor would require little in the way of explanation, but, under such circumstances, how do we form a cloud in time for the meteor to emerge from it; why does the cloud suddenly and sharply stop moving while the meteor passes onward; why, in short, does there seem to be a slight difference between the usual meteors and those which emerge from clouds?

We quote the following from Observatory, 1877, a popular British astronomical monthly of competence and reliability:

… the meteor was seen by J. Plant, Esquire, F.O.S., at Salford, and is described by him as bursting from an intensely lit cloud, like a ball of silver quite as large as the moon. The explosion was remarkable, a whirling shower of pear-drop (sic) stars—ruby, blue, white and yellow—radiating from the center mass, the colors being quite brilliant. The meteor was seen about three seconds before the explosion.

The meteor itself may be only casually interesting, although its colors may be unusual and may hold some interest for students of meteoritics. What is of interest to us is the cloud, which seems to have preceded the meteor instead of following it, and especially, to have been illuminated or self-luminous.

Many are the report of meteors emerging from clouds, as in 1808: "…such a phenomenon as appeared at Siena in 1794, when stones descended, not from a moving meteor, but from a luminous cloud…"

A yellow cloud appeared over Paderborn, from which came a torrential rain and a shower of mussels; the triangular cloud with a tail, whose red nucleus exploded; February 13, 1901, greenish-yellow clouds appeared in France, spreading "intensest darkness"; people froze to death in Naples that night.

Naples in Southernmost Italy.

Did something bring in the cold of outer space?

The Journal of Royal Meteorological Society contains some extracts from the Captain's log, of the ship Lady of the Lake, Captain F.W. Banner. On March 22, 1870 position 5° 47' N. Lat., 27° 52' W. Longitude, the crew observed a remarkable cloud in the sky. It was a cloud with a circular form which enclosed a semicircle divided into four parts, the central dividing line (cord, bar, partition or what?) starting at the center of the circle, and extending far beyond the limits of the structure, then curving backward, like a hook.

NO CLOUD EVER SHAPED BY WIND COULD EVER TAKE THIS SHAPE, NOHOW, IN NATURE

This cloud had geometric shape, and a mechanical complexity. In fact it had an organic, or an artificial form.

Thompson says: "In August and September, 1831, there was an anomalous brightness in the sky and small print was visible at midnight—the barometer fell, the sun was of a silvery whiteness and storms were general in Europe and the West Indies."

W.S. Forest says: "Citizens were much surprised on the morning of August 13, 1831, by the strange appearance of the sun. The sun's disc seemed on rising, to have changed from its usual golden color to a pale, greenish tent which soon gave way to cerule blue and this to a silvery white. In the afternoon the sun appeared like an immense plane of polished silver and to the naked eye there was exhibited an appearance on the surface termed a black spot. The sun shone with a dull gloomy light, and the atmosphere was moist and heavy."

These two passages, one written in England, the other in Virginia, will serve to indicate the vastness of this condition and nature of it.

Many sources mention frequent cases of darkness and obscuration of the sun. There is, in this darkness and "cold days," the blending of terrestrial and cosmic clouds. We will have other occasions to mention cosmic clouds, in connection with things astronomers have seen in space. For now, it is enough to say that when these clouds contact the earth, we have dust, gas, obscuration, darkness, cold and meteorological disturbances in general; a blending of meteoritic and meteorological conditions.

According to the Chicago Tribune, January 7, 1892, a fiery blast shot across the State of Georgia, on the previous June 5th described as "a black tornado, filled with fire." About this time there were earthquake shocks in Italy, approximately the same geographical latitude; people in New York State were watching a glare in the sky and shocks were felt. On June 8th, dust fell from the sky in northern Indiana. Quakes followed around the world for several days. Snow fell in Mobile, which is certainly an indication that the storm may have brought materials from the cold of outer space. There was a tidal wave in the Atlantic, and there were shocks at Memphis, Tennessee, on June 14. There was a tidal wave in Lake Michigan on June 18. A mass of fire fell from the sky on the 20th, on a town in Massachusetts. At the same time quakes occurred in Italy and France. On the 24th, a great meteor shot over Cape Town. Durango, Mexico had its first rain in four years. Glare in the sky alarmed Germans on the 26th. In England, people watched a luminous cloud at night. Quakes were reported in Tasmania and Australia.

SMALL BATTLE

Why recite all those things? Why imply a relationship? Because it is a part of our present purpose to indicate that earthquakes and local storms may be engendered by huge masses of space material passing close to the terrestrial surface.

That storm across Georgia, from the phrase, "A black tornado, filled with fire," does not have to be considered extranormal just from that description. Tornadoes are black, and they often involve brilliant and vicious displays of electrics. on OUTER EDGES, NOT IN MIDDLE "FILL" It is the concomitants which cause us to wonder. The events which we mentioned spread over a rather long time to be in any way connected with one local storm, but there does seem to be a family resemblance, and there are many such examples. Yet in view of the concomitants, and since we do not have a definite statement that the storm was a twister, the term, tornado, being frequently used loosely, we wonder if there were extensive gravitational irregularities, or if something was made to surge through our lower atmosphere, thereby creating a vehement black cloud, filled with fire, which was only a detail in a world-wide melee. Could we have had the close approach of a vast scattering of space debris, through which the earth passed during a period of several days, and from which we had meteorites, water, dust, cold, etc., and disruption of the normal meteorological processes over most of our globe, not to speak of seismic upheavals on a wide scale?

The instances of apparent association between clouds, meteors, and quakes are many. It seems like stretching things too far to claim that all are merely coincidence.

For four hours, in the wake of the Georgia storm, on January 8, dust fell on northern Indiana—no records of such in between. Research fails to disclose any volcanic action to put dust into the air, and if it did, what of the intervening places? There was no dust bowl in Georgia, and besides this storm, as is general, was moving eastward, not northward. From the western deserts—a long way to carry a heavy fall of dust without dropping noticeable amounts! Could it be that the dust was not from Georgia's tornado, but from the common cause of both?

Time after time it seems that isolated clouds, of a singular appearance, approach the earth's surface, yet remain suspended in flight. To be sustained by velocity they would have to move with the speed of escape, around six and one-half miles per second, which they obviously are not doing. Since they apparently bring with them a considerable amount of space debris, they are indicated to have celestial origin rather than arising from the earth's surface.

It is our suggestion that some of the singular, or disassociated clouds, contain camouflaged, navigable space contraptions, or they are dirigible space widgets, guided and directed by intelligence.

Again we close with an arresting quotation. Bearing our theories in mind, consider the following contribution from John P. Bessor to Fate, March, 1954:

The Battle of the Clouds: On July 28th, 1874, the little community of Saw Mill Run, near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, met with disaster from a most singular phenomenon. Curious villagers and country folk looked at the sky and beheld something very strange. Over the northeastern horizon, slowly and majestically, sailed a black cloud ringed with a scarlet belt; and over the southwest horizon slowly sailed another black cloud—with a scarlet belt.

Onward they came towards each other, like two men-of-war approaching the scene of battle. As they drew nearer, they discharged flashes of lighting, and the whole effect was that of an eerie sea battle high in the air.

Nearer and nearer they drew, the violence of the flashes of lightning increasing the closer they approached, until, with one great flash, they collided, and rain fell in torrents. One hundred and fifty persons drowned and it is believed to be the most disastrous flood ever to befall that section of the country.

Rubbish in Space

These few chapters of observational material show that space contains a much greater amount and variety of material scattered between planets than most of us, including the astronomers, have known. Before true meteoric material (the now well-known iron and stone meteorities) were scientifically accepted there had to be innumerable cases where meteorites were truly seen to fall. These were collected by authoritative witnesses. That these meteorites had been identified by their testure and chemical elements, as well as their external appearance, was not enough to overcome bigotry, and more than one French scientist had to risk his professional standing before the Academy in Paris ere it was accepted by science that iron and stone did fall from the sky. This controversy was raging as recently as one hundred and fifty years ago, in spite of firm demonstrations by some isolated scientific observers one or two hundred years previously, and there were still holdouts until the end of the 19th century. So firm is astronomy in its entrenched dogma, that there are still some respected men who dispute that the Arizona meteor crater is meteoric in origin, or that the Carolina Bays were caused by anything but mysteriously formed whirlpools.

GREAT BOMBARDMENT.

The great Bombardment Announced the end of Mu.

It is not surprising, therefore, when we learn that among the vast amount of material that has fallen from the sky, sulfur is present. But it cannot fall from the sky because it isn't in the sky! But it does!

1868: A mass of burning sulfur about the size of a man's fist fell at Pultusk, Poland, on January 30. It fell upon a road and was stomped out by several villagers.

Inflammable objects falling from space may well account for the many reports of falling "fire," from which no tangible debris is found; and since such material is of low specific gravity, its velocity is speedily checked by atmospheric friction, and it can fall slowly, burning the while, and thus, perhaps, give rise to some of the reports of large appearing slowly moving masses of fire.

S-M SHIPS OR ARKS.

The jagged pieces of ice which fell at Orkney, July 24, 1818, had a strong sulphurous odor; and also the coke—or what looked like coke—which fell at Mortree, France, April 24, 1887, with which fell a sulphurous substance. And. the enormous "round things" which rose from the ocean, near Victoria: whether we accept that they were superconstructions, or something else, including perhaps imagination, it was reported that they spread a "stench of sulfur." If they smelled like that, they could not have been too distant, could they?

There was a staggering fall of dust and mud in Europe in February 1903. It seems that southern England was quite a dumping ground, although some scientists thought the dust cam from lanes and byways of the local shires. They hadn't heard that it also covered the Canary Islands. The substance contained a sizable percentage of organic matter, and was, of course, identified by some as sand from the Sahara Desert. It covered Ireland, England, and the Canaries. It was reported on the 27th in Belgium, Holland, Germany, and Austria. Ten million tons fell on south England alone! A vessel reported the stuff falling midway between England and Barbados. It fell in Switzerland, according to Symons' Meteorological Magazine, of March, 1903. It fell in Russia. Not only did Australia get covered with this stuff in November 1902; it was falling there again in February – enormously—fifty tons per square mile of red mud.

-RESULT OF L-M'S "HOME ON MOON" being built.

This stuff was variously said to be like brick dust, buff colored, or light brown, chocolate colored and silky to touch, and slightly iridescent, gray; red-rust colored; quite red, yellowish brown, tinged with pink.

I do not believe these falls of mud on earth indicate life in space, unless in very indirect ways, obscurely, and deviously. But there is definitely, here, an indication of dust in the space proximate to the earth, or in orbits intersecting our orbit. It seems more and more inescapable that there are immense amounts of material of almost every fanciable type. That such unaccountable millions of tons of red dust composed of a high percentage of organic matter could be whirled aloft from the Sahara, or any desert, and disseminated to such scattered areas, is an incomprehensibility far more durable than that of orbital existence in space – and we have to assume clouds of something in space to account for the disturbance of comets' tails, and for the temporary disappearance of comets, as for instance the great comet of 1882.

[2] :"SHIELD" is by Jemi. It is printed over a word, which may be "STASIS", BY Mr. A.

It is therefore, my contention that these falls of mud originate in space, and that such clouds of dust are a normal part of space debris. Whether they come from the explosion producing the asteroids, or from an atom explosion which hoisted Mu into the firmament and into eternity, is beyond or ability to ascertain.

NOT ATOMIC, Was sudden, broad inerse snap of stasis.

It is our stand that, if there is such diversity and quantity of material in vicinal space, then there is room, and perhaps sustenance of a sort, for intelligence and intelligently manipulated space ships.

It is equally our contention, that, if all of this dispersed, but tangible, array of assorted items can exist in nearby space, or in orbits intersecting that of the earth, and if all of these things (except the conventional iron and stone meteorites) can have escaped the cognizance of science for such a long time, even though falling to earth in considerable quantity, then there is no reason why intelligently operated contrivances cannot also be in the same celestial regions, and have escaped our attention, in spite of visiting our atmosphere frequently.

VISITING! They Live here & Work here & build Here but fortunately all undersea.

To list but a few of some of the other materials reported: ashes, sand, algae, iron, gelatinous matter, seeds, red edible stuff, mud, dust, powder, vegetable matter, white substance, soot, coke, charcoal, coal, earthy matter, soft substance, wedge shapes, black rain, colored rain.

Add these things to the stone, ice, water, organic matter, living organisms, gadgets, gold thread, etc., and you have three possible explanations: the surface debris of an exploded planet, the surface debris of a continent blasted off the earth, or the rubbish of a space life of vast extent and unspeakable age; perhaps also, curiosity, a trait of intelligence.

I believe it substantiates a "space life" of some sort. Space being cluttered with such a vast amount of debris, sparsely scattered, but of all types and enormous in the aggregate, it is sufficient to supply many of the needs of space life. You will note that throughout our enumeration of "falls," our theme has been that there seem to be two types of arrivals from outer space: those which are moving in highly elliptical meteoric orbits (true space debris, that is), and those which seem to be, or have been, associated with intelligence. There may well be some overlapping for some of the intelligences may be moving in such orbits, especially if it should develop that some of them are associated with the great comets such as those of 1880-81-82. In its simplest form, then, our idea is that the least objectionable explanation for these falls is that they come from intelligently operated space craft, or are in some way formed, guided, or influenced by the operators of such craft. We base this on characteristics of shape, texture, functionality, delimited and localized distribution, timing, repetition, location in places inaccessible to modern man; and on the purely negative deduction that they could not have happened through any commonly accepted chain of casual conditions.

Such a cause or, such a common denominator does appear to exist in the contemplation of space flight or space navigation, to put it more simply, in space life. This appears to be the least improbable causal factor in sight at this time. Also, there appears to be ample observational proof for this view since 1947.

I believe that space between the earth and the moon is occupied, however thinly, by large navigable constructions of a rigid nature, whose size may range from one to many miles in diameter, and which have a planetary appearance as seen in telescopes. These sometimes come close to the earth.

There are other bodies which seem to be of a cloudlike nature, which cast shadows on both earth & moon, and; which may range the entire solar system accompanying comets. These also, or their smaller components, sometimes approach the earth. All of these objects evince evidences of control by intelligence, as do the more recently sighted UFO's.

Smaller "scouts or operators," which are probably inhabitants of, or associates, of the great spherical contraptions, are constantly seen in earth's atmosphere. They are of many types, and in fact it does seem that many of them have the ability to change shape. They seem to be of two sorts: the solid or material, and the massless or ethereal. All exhibit elements of control, but the weightless ones seem more to have the appearance of remote control. Solid types tend to be discoid or to be spherical or spindle shaped, and these shapes, in themselves, are indicative of intelligent construction. (Red is A and B)

PART THREE

Disappearing Ships and Crews

There are two purposes to be served in discussing the disappearances of ships and crews. First, we shall list enough of the available material to show that such phenomena have occurred and, second, we shall see what conclusions can be drawn and how it will serve our space thesis.

Yes, Many Many times. More often than is recorded. Ulysses & crew believed suffered same fate. Nes[3] "Wanderings thus Were Pure invention.

It is well-known sea lore that ships develop a kind of spiritual or psychic entity, or personality, like people, and the strange tale of the Marie Celeste illustrates this as few other histories can. After reading the whole story, it cannot be denied that a malignant curse enshrouded this unhappy vessel. The dramatic disappearance of her crew is vital to our present theme, but it is only one incident in the strange experiences of the brigantine.

The following account by Henry S. Galus is from Fate (Vol. X, No. 8):

Marie Celeste* Had an Extra Compass in Captains Cabin.

On the afternoon of December 4, 1872, the British brigantine, Dei Gratia, made a queer discovery, about three hundred miles off the Portuguese coast, which soon tangled seamen, courts and researchers in the hottest controversy in nautical history.

Mate Oliver Deveau had raised his glass to windward and had seen a vessel under short sail, plowing directly toward him. Deveau notified Captain David R. Morehouse, of it, and the skipper "spoke" to the craft in greeting. There was no reply. Sensing some tragedy, Morehouse went abreast the brig to lend it possible aid. Nothing stirred on her deck. Yet this brig had been holding a course as if guided by the skill of a salty helmsman!

Deveau and two hands boarded the craft. Official records reveal the baffling sight in his own words: "I found no one on board—I found three and one-half feet of water in the pumps—fore hatch and lazerette hatch both off—binnacle stove in – skylight of the cabin was open and raised—the compass in the binnacle was destroyed. All the Captain's effects had been left – I mean his clothes, furniture, etc. I found the log book in the mate's cabin, on his desk.

CAPT. ALWAYS TAKES THE LOG WHEN ABONDONING SHIP. LOG MUST BE TAKEN EVEN IF CAPT. IS DEAD. THEY WERE FROZE & "SWIPED"

"There seemed to be everything left behind in the cabin as if left in a hurry, but everything in its place. I noticed the impression in the Captain's bed as of a child having lain there."

EXCEPT UNDERSEAS.

Nine days later, at Gibraltar, Deveau swung the ghost ship into port with the idea of collecting salvage money for the 1,700 barrels of alcohol under her hatches. But the destiny of the Marie Celeste was more complicated than that. The Marshal of the Vics Admiralty Court put the brig under arrest. The Queen's Proctor, Frederick S. Flood, asserted that a crew just didn't leave a ship with $80,000 worth of alcohol, to risk their necks on a directionless joy ride. What, then, had Deveau done with the missing crew?

The Dei Gratia had also pulled into port. Flood turned suspicious glances toward its hands. Clearly he was determined to find evidence of crime. He entered the Marie Celeste's cabin, and his eyes snapped when he uncovered an old Italian sword under the Captain's berth. Flood scrutinized the deck—and found the stains he expected! Dr. J. Patron was summoned to make a chemical test.

"No," he told Flood, "these are not blood stains."

John Austin, the ship surveyor and diver, next examined the brig's underside. He came up dripping to report that there was no indication that the brig had struck anything like a reef which might have caused the crew, fearful of being trapped on board, to abandon ship.

Then, why had the Marie Celeste been abandoned? It was learned that her master had been Captain Benjamin S. Briggs. Nine others accompanied him, including his wife and daughter Sophie. Surely Briggs, and old sea master, would have done nothing to endanger his family. The destroyed compass was a clue—but there was no further evidence of violence. Superstitious seamen pedicted:

They break compasses, fearing that we may use More than one Bar Magnet, & thus fly as they.

A compass "card" Looks EXACTLY Like a FLYING SAUCER from the top, Looking down on a Large Ships binnacle compass card floating in its Liquid.

"You'll never find the answer. An unworldly power cleared the brig's deck." The tribunal scoffed. Ghost ships! In the 19th Century!

Lack of evidence now bogged down the court's hearing of the Dei Gratia's salvage claims. Meanwhile, as news of the riddle boiled in the world presses, amazing background facts came to light. Rumor stated that the current tragedy was only a continuation of the misfortunes that dogged the brig since she was first launched in Nova Scotia. Who ever had touched her had suffered disappointments, financial losses, or worse.

As the Amazon, in 1861, the 206-ton brig made her maiden voyage under Captain Robert McLellan. He took sick while plying the Bay of Fundy. Ashore, days later, he died. John N. Parker, the next skipper, was only mildly successful with his trips. The owners replaced him with William Thompson. Promptly, the brig cracked up on Cape Breton Island. This broke her owners. Salvors seized the vessel. John Howard Beatty bought and lost her quickly, for as the Sackville, New Brunswick, Tribune reported, the Amazon piled up on the Maine coast.

As a condemned hulk she was auctioned off at New York. On November 12, 1868, Richard W. Hains paid $1,750 for her, and it was he who named her Marie Celeste. Scarcely ten months later he forfeited the brig for debt. James H. Winchester, her newest proprietor, put the blame for his poor profits on a swift succession of skippers; however, not until the middle of 1872 did a serious misfortune befall him. A Boston Marshal charged Winchester with fraudulent ownership. The Marie Celeste was immediately bonded for $2,600.

Reeling under the blow, Winchester was reedy to let the bedeviled craft go, but fate, through the court, settled in his favor. During ensuing repairs, the ill-fated Benjamin S. Briggs reduced Winchester's costs by purchasing a third interest. And the Captain's wife, Sarah, penned these final words to her mother-in-law, on November 7th, 1872, off Staten Island: "Benje thinks we have a pretty peaceable set (crew) this time, if they continue as they have begun. Can't tell you how smart they are."

Had Captain Briggs conveyed any suspicions of his crew to his wife? One theory of what happened to the Marie Celeste's human cargo, with a possible correlation to Sarah Briggs' words, comes from an English author, Laurence J. Keating. In 1929 his book, The Great Marie Celeste Hoax, "exposed the famous sea mystery with ruthless truth." Keating charged that: "Mrs. Briggs was a prime irritant on board the Marie Celeste; trouble rode most of the voyage; she died and was cast overboard; Captain Briggs disappeared one night from the brig, apparently murdered while most of the men were drunk. Lastly, the Dei Gratia had not found the Marie Celeste, but a brig named Julia—and the whole puzzle was the result of a criminal conspiracy between Captains Morehouse and Briggs, which unfortunately cost the latter his life!"

More than any other theory to date, this astonishing one from Keating has been shouted down. J. Franklin Briggs, nephew of the lost skipper and now living in New Bedford, Massachusetts, has spent many years trying to disprove both Keating's claims and other statements he considers a defamation of the innocent dead. In a privately circulated booklet published August 8, 1944, the surviving Briggs presents a digest of his voluminous investigations which included interviews with H.S. Morehouse, the Dei Gratia's Skipper's son; Winchester Noyes, grandson of Captain Winchester; and Mrs. Alice Melason, Mate Oliver Deveau's daughter.

Still, the booklet does not solve the riddle. "We may believe," J.F. Briggs concludes, "that the Captain became suddenly alarmed (Presumably by rough weather), hauled aback the square sails to stop the brig's headway, ordered all hands into the yawl, and temporarily left the ship, which subsequently gathered way and sailed off."

This view is the simplest explanation. But scores of other solutions have been just as sincerely forwarded. There is the letter Proctor Flood wrote to the London Board of Trade on January 22 or 23, 1873: "My own theory, or guess, is that the crew got at the alcohol and in the fury of drunkenness murdered the master, his wife, child, and the chief mate; that they damaged the bows of the vessel with the view of giving it the appearance of having struck on rocks…so as to induce the Master of any vessel which might pick her up to think her not worth saving; and that they did, sometime between November 25, and December 5, escape on board some vessel."

This, so closely paralleling Author Keating's accusations, was countered by a Captain Shufeldt, U.S. Navy, who had examined the Marie Celeste: "The damage about the bows of the brig appears to me to amount to nothing more than splinters made in the bending planks,,, neither hurting the ship nor any possible chance the result of intention to do so,"

In Yachting, for February, 1940, Dr. Oliver W. Cobb, cousin of Sarah Briggs, wrote: "there may have been leakage, and gas may have accumulated in the hold" because of the effects of temperature changes on the alcohol store. Thus, the Marie Celeste's master, fearful of an explosion, got his crew off the craft. Cobb feels that Briggs used a halyard line to hold the brig until it was determined safe for a return aboard. "Probably a fresh northerly wind sprang up, filled the square sails—these people were left in an open boat on the ocean."

A sailor named Lund, one of the three who sailed the Marie Celeste into Gibraltar claimed that the derelict's "peak halyards were broken and gone." The second seaman, Anderson, "saw ropes hanging over the side." Deveau at the same time testified: "the main peak halyards were broken." He didn't say, "gone." Has Dr. Cobb provided the true solution, then?

No Lazarette Hatch & Stow Hold Hatch covers could have been taken off & the body of Ship Ventilated, often done, common practice.

Several researchers suggested that icebergs threatened the brig and, therefore, the fear-stricken crew took flight only to become victims of other icebergs. However, one of the most painstaking historians of the enigma is Charles Eddy Fay, who now lives at Lake Worth, Florida. He went directly to the Navy Department to ask whether icebergs were common in the part of the ocean where the ghost ship was picked up. On December 7, 1940, the hydrographic office told him: "As to the possibility of icebergs being found in the locality—that is highly improbable, due to the long drift, through comparatively warm water, necessary for any ice to reach this vicinity. However, small pieces of ice have been sighted exceptionally far south as follows—up to 1934."

Another more popular assumption saw Captain Briggs and his crew fall prey to merciless pirates. On this one, too, Fay sought government information. A letter dated January 15, 1941, came from the Naval Archives: "—concerning the possibility of pirates—records do not reveal that any piratical operations took place as late as 1872 between the Azores and the coast of Portugal."

A swirling flood of conjectures continued to pour forth as to the fate of Captain Briggs and his men and women. Was J. L. Hornibrook any nearer the facts in Chamber's Journal, September 17, 1904? "Suddenly a huge octopus rises from the deep, encircles the helmsman. His yells bring every soul running on deck. One by one they are caught by the waving wriggling arms. Then, freighted with its living load, the monster slowly sinks into the deep, leaving no trace of its attack."

Or do you prefer the story from the Washington Post, December 19, 1931, quoting a feature published earlier in the London Daily Express? An R.E. Greenbough found a document in a floating bottle which told of the crew being kidnapped from the Marie Celeste by an undisclosed ship. Kathleen Woodward wrote in the New York Times Magazine, October 12, 1924: A man referred to as Triggs, a bo'sun's mate on the Marie Celeste, quoted as charging Captain Briggs and crew abandoned ship, boarded a derelict steamer, broke open its safe, stole gold, fled and arrived with a misleading tale at Cadiz.

In the British Quarterly Review, July 1931, there appeared a story by Harold T. Wilkins. The Dei Gratia, on a predatory mission, purposely waited in the middle of the ocean for the brig, somehow induced the crew to come aboard and slaughtered all hands. In Nautical Magazine, July 1922, D.G. Ball tried to wash the log page clear once and for all—"the whole story is just a myth without any foundation of fact." He assured his readers that no such ship had ever existed. He regretted that he must divulge this truth for the controversy fascinated him.

That the Marie Celeste did exist is proven by subsequently recorded voyages after her release March10, 1873, by the Gibraltar court; and by the court records themselves.

EXTANT, STILL

Alcohol fumes partly inebriated the Whole Crew & L-Ms WERE OVERHEAD; Drunk men naturally are not Mentally Paralyzed by "Freeze" They seized Lines as they were starting to ascend & Hung on Grimly. Some fell on Deck, L-M SHIP STOPPED M-C & took them all off.

Captain George W. Blatchford, of Wrentham, Massachusetts, finally delivered her alcohol cargo to Genoa, then sailed to Boston. "When she arrived," related Winchester, her owner, "a great many people came to look at her, but as soon as they found out her history they would not touch her." Those who believed an ominous fate still pursued her were soon presented with a convincing sequel. Here are the actual incidents that followed.

Winchester refused to gamble further on the brig. He managed to get rid of her at an $8,000 loss. The succeeding owner, Captain David Cartwright, according to the New York World, January 24, 1886, "sent her to Montevideo with a cargo of lumber. She arrived there minus her deck load, and minus spars and sails. There the Captain got a charter to carry horses. The few delivered alive were too ill to be worth anything. Edgar M. Tuthill (her skipper) obtained a charter to bring freight from Calcutta. On the passage home he was taken sick and died in St. Helena, three weeks later. We next sent her to Africa. She lost $1,000.00."

But the end was near. The Marie Celeste's last proprietor, Wesley A. Grove, signed Captain Gillman E. Parker and loaded her with assorted cargo for Port-au Prince, Haiti. The various shippers; first took out insurance for $25,000—and on January 3, 1885, the drunken Parker staggered up to the helmsman, pointing to a clearly visible coral reef.

"Steer hard for her, m'hearty, and do the job real good." The brig crunched viciously, and the grinning skipper shouted all hands below for a lusty drink session, after which all rowed ashore.

In Haiti, someone talked. The plot failed when the insurance companies dug up evidence to indict the bribing shippers. At the trial in Boston, the shippers admitted guilt. Parker escaped conviction, as the judge ordered a new trial on the charge of barratry.

Perhaps the last echo of the Marie Celeste's evil fate intervened to cheat justice. For within three months Parker died. Six months later his mate was dead. All the conspiring firms by this time had bankrupted, and one of their members committed suicide.

Thus the log book of the most ill-fated brig in history was closed forever.

There are several facts which we must stress. First, the upper rigging of the ship was slightly damaged, as if some unusual accident or activity took place there. Then, the compass was damaged. Aside from these, there was no note of disarray or a struggle. Life had departed from the ship instantly, apparently with all the routine activities interrupted and; no preparations made; log book on the table, clothing in order, sails set, galley undisturbed—but no records in the log or anywhere else!

To attempt to postulate motive for space inhabitants kidnapping crews from ships—not to mention isolated individuals to which we shall come momentarily—is in the realm of pure speculation. On the other hand, bearing our two possibilities in mind as to the origin of space contrivances, in either case our space friends would want to know what has happened to us since they left, or what has happened to us since they put us down here. Again, there is always the possibility that the open seas provide an easy catching place.

In any case, selective transportation requires intelligence. A force acting from the sky and intelligently directed could do some very puzzling things.

Here is another mystery at sea as reported in Fate Magazine, June 1954:

SOS, SOS---came the distress call from the Dutch vessel *S.S.Ourang Medan, Dutch and British listening posts located the vessel as proceeding through the straits of Malacca. It was early February 1948, the sea calm, the weather clear.

SOS, SOS, again came the frenzied call. After a short silence, "…all officers, including Captain dead, lying in chartroom and on Bridge… probably whole crew dead…"

There followed a series of indecipherable dots and dashes and then came quite clearly: "I die." And after that only an ominous silence.

Rescue ships from Dutch Sumatra and British Malaya rushed to the indicated location of the vessel in distress. They found her only fifty miles from the position given. Boats were put over the sides to investigate.

> "Medan" was MOVED. RADIO DIRECTIONALFINDERS ARE TOO ACCURATE & SHIPS TOO SLOW TO MOVE THAT FAR IN *SO LITTLE TIME. (Italic emphasis by A)

When boarding parties reached the Ourang Medan they found an eerie sight. There wasn't a living creature on the ship. The captain lay dead on the bridge. The bodies of the other officers sprawled in the wheelhouse, chartroom and wardroom. The faithful "sparks" was slumped in a chair in the radio shack, his hand still on the sending key. The bodies of the hapless crew lay everywhere: in their rooms, in the passageways, on the decks. And on all the dead face was a look of convulsive horror. As a report of the Proceedings of the Merchant Marine Council put it: "their frozen faces were upturned to the sun, the mouths were gaping open and the eyes staring…" Everyone was dead! Even the ship's dog a small terrier, was lifeless, its teeth bared in anger or agony.

> Navigator trying to Plot Movement of ship?

But strangely there was no sign of wounds or injuries on any of the bodies.

> SUFFOCATION? JAMMED "FREEZE" SomebodySlipped-up on this one Must Have been a "Jammed"-Freezer to kill all. Otherwise, the "sparks" would not have got Hit so hard.

After a quick conference, the would-be rescuers decided to put a tow line onto the unlucky vessel and take her into port. But at that very moment smoke and flames belched froth from No. 4 hold. The fire was immediately so hot and so widespread that it was impossible to subdue.

> Telepathic, Eh?

The boarding parties hurriedly abandoned the doomed vessel and returned to the safety of their own ships. Moments later there was a terrific explosion on the Ourang Medan and the ship seemed to leap into the air. Then it settled back and quietly slid beneath the waters. From that day to this, no one has ever been able to determine what happened to this unfortunate ship or to her officers and crew. The fate of the S.S. Ourang Medan is another unsolved mystery of the sea.

> More Work of "The Little-Men" of Mu & their force-ships.

The notable points: sudden death (or disappearance) of people (all life) at a lonely and isolated spot, at sea. No apparent cause assignable. A sudden and unexplained fire, obviously for the purpose of "destroying the evidence," a fire so suddenly violent and widespread as to defy action, although strong men, familiar with ships, were at hand, prepared for emergencies.

Some meteorologists and astronomers have suggested from time to time that ships and aircraft disappearing at sea may have been struck by meteors. Many writers have expressed the feeling that there is something unexplained in these disappearances without trace, but there is no proven case of an aircraft being struck by a meteor over land. In fact there are a few, if any, proven cases of cars, trucks, trains, buggies, sleighs, mud scows, coal barges, or even buildings, being struck directly by meteors, and considering the millions of these features on a landscape, it seems like stretching and distorting coincidence rather far to blame random meteors for the dispatching of numerous ships and aircraft to oblivion. Especially without trace, and more especially, today with constant radio vigil, without warning or without radio reports from the victims. Can you imagine a ship, struck by meteor big enough to sink it, going down entirely without some debris being scattered about?

As a Sailor, I say, impossible for Meteor.

PRESUME MEN OF "MEDAN" LIKE ALL OTHERS, PILOTS OF AIRCRAFT, AUTOS, SHIPS, ETC. SAW "SUN BLACK-OUT" in Middle fo Day as per "DEEP FREEZE." THIS WAS AN ATTACK FOR REASONS WHICH I DREAD, IF DONE BY S-MEN, AS HERE SEEMS PROBABLY FROM DESCRIPTION.

The New York Times, of June 21, 1921, discusses the disappearances of three U.S. ships, with such a dearth of information that piracy was suggested. Several departments of the U.S. Government were investigating. In February, the Carol Deering, a five-masted schooner, had run ashore on the coast of North Carolina, in circumstances startlingly like those of the Marie Celeste. The crew had disappeared about the time a meal was to be served. Some bottles were later found with messages, one purporting to be from the Captain and one from the Mate, but they were contradictory, and not to plausible. The Times of June 22, 1921, commented on "More Ships Added to the Mystery List," and on June 24 mentioned about a dozen disappearances without a trace.

For something modern, we cite the Washington D.C.Times-Herald, of February 11, 1953"

Colombo, Ceylon, and February 10, 1953: A slightly damaged motor ship whose five-man crew vanished mysteriously at sea was towed into Colombo today, still carrying plenty of food, water and fuel.

Something else MUST HAVE BEEN MISSING.

A Meal had been prepared in the galley, ready for serving. Despite a broken mast, the Holchu rode well in the waters with a cargo of rice. The ship normally plies between Andaman and Nicobar Islands, near the route from Colombo to Singapore.

There was no clue as to the fate of the five Asiatic crew men known to have been aboard.

Sighted three days ago, two hundred miles south of Nicobar Islands, the derelict was boarded by crew members of the British freighter, Ranee. The British vessel was carrying 7,450 tons of rice from Communist China to Ceylon—the first consignment under a new trade agreement…

Note the pattern again in this modern case. The broken mast is the key. This was a motor ship, and carried no sails (presumably), but in any case was not dependent on sails. The damage aloft is a common feature of these events and somehow indicates activity above the ship, or at least above its deck.

Another training ship, British, the Atlanta, set sail early in 1880 from Bermuda, with 250 cadets and sailors aboard, and was not heard of again. Two things strike me: the year 1880, a year of unexplained mysteries; and the Bermuda-Caribbean area where mysterious disappearances are many.

The Danish training ship, Kobenhoven, sailed from Montevideo on December 14, 1928, with fifty cadets and sailors aboard…and disappeared. She was a beautiful sight, full-rigged and radiant of strength and dependability—I saw her and photographed her in the harbor of Funchal, Madeira, in November, 1927, when I was aboard the S.S. Windsor Castle, en route from Southampton to Capetown, What happened?

May I suggest that there seems to be a tendency for selectivity toward sailing vessels? And don't overlook the fact that this strong ship disappeared in the era of wireless and radio. As in the cases of so many airplanes, where radio operators are constantly on duty, this ship not only disappeared with trace, but met a fate so instantaneous that it was impossible to radio for help or to announce impending disaster.

Don't know about Kobenhoven, May have sighted Home-ship in the Water, Making ready for ascent & so Many Highly trained eyes could not be permitted tell What they had seen, So! they are on the Greak Ark, Now? Yet feel that Kobenhoven is still being Held, Intact. Windjammer Sailors are Hard fighters & Prove good sport to the L-Ms Later when pacified, they are good company, Make good Space Sailors. Deep Space is Not for every Man, only a few types can take it for Very Long. Most of these type Men are Sailors, used to Long Long Voyages.

On October 3, 1902, the German bark, Freya, cleared from Manzanillo, on the west coast of Mexico (a tropical pesthole, if ever I saw one), for Punta Arenas (see Nature, April 25, 1907). On October 20, she was found at sea, partly dismasted, lying on her side—nobody aboard. The anchor was still hanging from her bow, not fully shipped, a good indication that calamity had struck very soon after she left port. The date on the wall calendar, in the Captain's cabin was October 4. Weather reports showed that there had been only light winds, but upon July 5 there had been an earthquake in Mexico. It does not seem that this quake could have created a tidal wave sufficient to capsize and damage this vessel, without doing some noteworthy damage along the nearby shores. Note that she was dismasted—not the type of damage to expect from a tidal wave.

Several weeks after the disappearance of the crew of the Freya, another strange sea occurrence was reported. According to the log of the S.S. Fort Salisbury, the second officer, Mr. A. H. Raymer, had, October 28, 1902, in Latitude 50º 31', Longitude 4º 42' W, (which is a few hundred miles off the coast of French Equatorial Africa, in the South Atlantic), been called by the lookout, at 3:05 AM, who reported that there was a huge, dark object, bearing lights, in the sea ahead. Two lights were seen, and the steamer passed a bulk of an estimated length of 500 – 600 feet, which seemed to be slowly sinking. A mechanism of some sort, the observers thought, was making a commotion in the water. Phosphorescence was mentioned, but seems weak to account for two definite lights.

The Captain was interviewed, and said: "I can only say that Mr. Raymer is very earnest on the subject, and has, together with the lookout and helmsman, seen something in the water, of a huge nature, as specified."

HOME-SHIP in process of taking on enough ballast to get to The Atlantic "Chain: cities

Now comes a tale in which there seems to be little chance of error or hoax. This is the sort of thing that can be certified, and it happened in the open, among a group of hard-headed people noted for clear thinking and straight-forward speech. Note how typical it is, as to details.

About seven AM, on a bright sunny morning in 1850, the people living in the vicinity of Easton's Beach, near Newport, R.I., rubbed their eyes in disbelief. They saw a large sailing vessel heading hard-in for shore and disaster. At first they believed it was an optical illusion, but as the vessel drew closer, they heard its weather-beaten sails flapping like shrouds in the stiff breeze, and they shouted: "It's the Seabird?" Frantically they tried to wave her, from her course. But the vessel come (sic) on.

Then miraculously, as though lifted by giant hands, the vessel majestically berthed herself on the shore, undamaged.

The watchers, most of them God-fearing fishermen, crossed themselves, and like a funeral procession, boarded the ship, their hearts filled with fear of the sight that their eyes might meet. But the only thing they did meet was a friendly mongrel, its tail wagging as it emerged from the shadows of the vessel and followed them about the dock.

A search was made for Captain John Durham and his crew, but no sign of them was found. A look of bewilderment covered the faces of the searchers when they crowded into the small galley and found coffee boiling on the stove and an elaborate breakfast laid out on the table. They also found that the crew's quarters smelled strongly of tobacco smoke, but there was no clue to the crew's whereabouts.

Should Have spilled.

Captain Durham was a rugged New Englander, not afraid of the Devil himself, and an excellent seaman. The ship's course was carefully plotted and the navigation instruments all in order. The ship's log lay open, with the last entry neatly noted: "Branton Reef, sighted." Branton Reef, a chain of rock off-shore, is only a couple miles from Newport, where the 300-ton trading boat was scheduled to dock. The Seabird had been on a four-month voyage and was just returning from Honduras.

The Seabird remained beached on the sand, the object of many curious eyes. There was mu;ch speculation of how, where, when and why the captain and his crew had disappeared—so close to home—without leaving a tangible clue.

The crew of a fishing boat, which returned two hours earlier with a catch, reported hailing the captain from a distance, and said that he waved back at them. They said that the Seabird then was on her course for Newport.

One fisherman speculated that a sea monster reached aboard the vessel and swallowed the crew. Friends nodded agreement, for there were reports by reputable seamen of the sightings of strange denizens of the seas, bigger than whales.

FOOD-SHIPS or Home ships

A thorough investigation by a Board of Inquiry failed to shed new light on the mystery. They reported their findings to the Captain's wife, a woman of few words. She glanced up from the Bible she as reading, and with a look of resignation, said: "'Tis the will of the Lord."

The vessel's holds were unloaded. Tropical hardwoods, pitchpine, sacks of coffee and some dyewoods were transported to her designated port of call. Then an attempt was made to refloat the ship—but the Seabird dug deeper into the sand.

She was pushed in Deeper. (Italic by Mr. A)

Soon after, a night gale blew itself into a violent storm. The wind howled around the neck of Rhode Island, kicking up the sea. The sea, in turn, threw mountainous waves at the Seabird, lifting her from her sand anchorage and tossing her about.

In the calm of the day that followed, when the sea was gentle again, the fishing folk who lived in the quiet village near Easton's Beach arose early to see what damage the storm had done. They expected to find the Seabird pounded to pieces, her debris littering the shore.

Instead, the vessel was gone. Like her ill-fated captain and crew she had vanished without a trace, and was never seen or heard of again! (Fate, April, 1953)

There are really at least two important events in this story. The disappearance of the crew can be considered one event, or certainly as one distinct phase of one event. The final disappearance of the ship is another, and perhaps the initial beaching of the boat, without damage, is something to be singled out for attention.

The crew must have abandoned the ship—or disappeared—within sight of land. In fact they were within sight of their homeport, and most likely there were fishing boats around in the area. There was no storm to complicate matters. No boat or wreckage came ashore, in spite of the nearness of land. It would be interesting if we could know whether there was damage to masts or rigging.

It seem obvious that the ship was close enough to port so that the last and final alteration in course had been made before the crew disappeared, and this fact would enable us to place a maximum limit on the distance from shore at which an "event" could have occurred. The vessel was spoken to about two hours previously, another check on distance, as well as on time.

It is one thing for a crew, to vanish without a trace; another for a stranded ship to do likewise. The two disappearances, in quick succession, create an improbability of much higher order. For our present purposes we cannot overlook the disappearance of the ship, for some wreckage should have been seen somewhere, but none was reported, although there was a storm of sufficient violence to make an experienced seagoing population expect to find the ship completely demolished.

Experience has taught that the gear, clothes, supplies & comforting atmosphere of The ship FOR its crew are far More Desirable than a "Froze" crew with nothing but fear to guide their actions when they are "unfrozen." Of course if No one is telepathic on board, there is some difficulty; cannot sense friendliness.

The crew disappeared, suddenly, unexpectedly, completely, in daylight within sight of the home port, in good weather, and left the dog. A sailor leaving a ship casually, or leisurely, would not abandon the ship's mascot or pet!

Now—let's peer into the records a bit closer. First the crew. Do you begin to see a pattern? Complete and sudden disappearance, with no time to leave a record of any kind, from a ship under sail, in calm weather. A very high order of selectivity—so high as to demand that purposefulness be considered. A dexterity for segregation beyond the capability of natural forces in one case, much less in a long sequence of events. A disappearance almost impossible to explain except as upward.

But in this case, the disappearance of the crew is but one phase, and there is evidence of continued application of intelligence—from above. As if the force, which abducted the crew, might have some element of compassion for the owners of the cargo, the unfortunate ship was brought carefully to shore, and gently grounded, high on the sand, "miraculously, as if lifted by giant hands." What better description can there be of a ship being levitated by an intelligently directed force from above?

But even that is not all. The ship lay quietly on the beach until the undamaged cargo was unloaded. Then—disappearance. Yes, we know there was a storm, a big one. Yes, storms do queer things. But this storm, with all the delicacy of a watchmaker, removed all of a large ship…hull, spars, rigging, hatchcovers, deck rear, dunnage, small boats—everything. Took it off the beach where experienced salvors could do nothing with it…took it away, completely, suddenly finally—without trace.

Are we to keep on forever attributing this high order of dexterity and selectivity to untutored storms and whirlwinds?

In the disappearances we certainly have an intimation, however slight, of levitation…of something operating from above, with great and decisive power, and suddenness of action. Whatever it may be, it seems to favor isolated places and ships. There is without doubt, an element of our old friend: selectivity, and perhaps segregation. There is also a suggestion of ruthlessness—selective ruthlessness. There is something of evasion, or secretiveness. All are attributes of intelligence.

The story is told—by C.F. Talman, in Realm of the Air—of a ship which was expected to arrive in New York in colonial days. One Sunday afternoon, after a violent storm she was floating in the air, every spar so clearly visible that there was no doubt about the identity of the image depicted in the sky. That was the last ever seen of her. Mr. Talman opines that this was a mirage, and that probably she had sprung a leak in the storm, and foundered before she got to port.

> Air* too Cleared-up of Dust & etc. after Storm > at Sea. Clouds Show Whole convoys Coming > over Horizon, Not air. ESPECIALLY SUCH CLEARED AIR.

We're in none to good a position to argue with the learned meteorologist. It may have been a mirage. Could be; but let's peer a bit closer.

First of all, if the ship was seen so clearly, it should have been possible for seaside folk to note whether she was in distress. Nothing was said of that. No wreckage was reported, although she was admittedly close to shore, and we're familiar with that characteristic, too. Disappearance close to port, without a trace: and that's a repeating tale, along the Atlantic seaboard. Nothing was said about the image being upside down, which is a usual characteristic of mirages. And if so close as to make every spar recognizable, would not this be pretty close for a mirage? And, again, are mirages commonly noted right after a storm? Aren't they more likely in a time of stable weather when stratification of the atmosphere over water and land is possible?

It is entirely within the realm of possibility that this ship was seen in the process of being levitated!

Teleportation or Kidnapping?

As sheer entertainment, little compares with the intrigue of the countless reports, verified, of the strange and instantaneous movement of persons from one place to another—distances of many many, miles.

But to serve our ends, we must look again for selectivity and, if possible, some indication of motive. Perhaps we should ascribe these phenomena to caprices of space inhabitants. On the other hand, there may be an element of error involved. Perhaps, for some inexplicable reasons, the UFO's made choices for capture or kidnapping and then discovered, suddenly, that their choice had not been a wise one. From what we have already discovered, as to speed of movements and the vast areas which can be covered. It is not at all unlikely that the pickup was made, the error discovered, and the kidnapped set down again—but the UFO has traveled such a great distance that it does not realize that it is not putting the object (person) down in relatively the same place! But if they are that intelligent they'd know they weren't putting the object (person) down in the same place. Perhaps so—but why would they care?

A Malaria infested person, Not Desirable to L-Ms It is a Deadly fearful Plage to them,
This Man May have Had it & also for this reason

Bear these thoughts in mind as we review our first case of teleportation.

On the morning of October 25, 1593, relates Don Luis Gonzales Obregon, in Las Calles de Mexico, a soldier suddenly appeared in the Plaza Mayor of Mexico City; a soldier dressed in the uniform of the regiment which at that moment was guarding the walled citadel of Manila, in the Philippine Islands.

With the soldier's strange appearance came the rumor that his Excellency, Gomez Peres Dasmartinas, Governor of the Philippines, was dead. A preposterous rumor, of course! But one that spread through the city like wildfire.

Puzzled as to how the soldier could have traveled more than nine thousand miles without so much as soiling his uniform, the authorities nevertheless jailed him as a deserter from the Philippines regiment.

Weeks passed while the soldier languished in prison; the long slow weeks necessary for new to travel by sailing ship from the Philippines to Acapulco, then by messenger across the sky-high mountains and into the valley of Mexico.

Suddenly, Mexico City was quaking with news. His Excellency, the Governor of the Philippines was dead, murdered by a mutinous Chinese crew off Punta de Azufre shortly after he had left his island home on a military expedition against the Moluccas! Moreover, he had been murdered on the very day the Philippine soldier had appeared in the Plaza of Mexico City.

The Holy Tribunal of the Inquisition took charge of the soldier. He could not tell them how he had been transported from Manila to Mexico. Only that it had been "in less time than it takes a cock to crow." Nor could he tell them how it had come to pass that Mexico City was buzzing with the news of the Governor's death, even before it was known in Manila.

Time of battle, = each inch of the way.

At order of the Holy Tribunal, the soldier was returned to the Philippines for further investigation into the mysterious matter. Irrefutable witnesses came forward to swear that the soldier had been on duty in the Island City on the night of October 24; just as it had been proved beyond doubt that on the following morning he had been apprehended in the Plaza of Mexico City, more than nine thousand miles away.

"Froze" or Semi-Froze, time not recognized.

A Legend? Not according to the records of the chroniclers of the Order of San Augustin and the order of Santo Domingo. Not according to Dr. Antonio de Morga, high justice of the criminal court of the Royal Audiencia of New Spain, in his Sucesos do las Islas Filipinas.

This case of this peripatetic soldier is one where we can tie down both ends of a teleportation axis, if indeed it is teleportation. We can find unexplained disappearances and appearances, but, offhand, we don't know of others just like this one. And t seems as though there may be several debatable disappearances. But what are you going to do with apports, or appearances? It seems to me that they are a sort of second order phenomenon, unless they can be connected somehow with corresponding disappearances, some place. Shall we settle for a kidnapping by UFO's?

"Help, help! It's got me!" This pitiful plea ending in a piercing scream brought friends running to Oliver Lerch's home, into the bright moonlit night. But he was not to be seen, although they could hear his voice, growing fainter, calling for help from a hundred feet or more above their heads. "Help me, help…"

Oliver Lerch was never seen again on the face of this earth; and thus was recorded one of the most amazing disappearances ever to confront our modern age—the disappearance of a man into thin air!

The facts of the case are clearly written down for everyone to see in the police records of South Bend, Indiana, and have been attested to by level-headed persons not given to delusions, mass hysteria or suggestion. These witnesses include lawyers; Reverend Samuel Mallelieu, the local Methodist minister; and responsible citizens who actually witnessed the weird disappearance.

The impossible happened on the farm of Tom Lerch, Christmas Eve, 1890, in a community of over 100,000 people—by no means an ignorant backwoods settlement filled with limitless superstition.

The Lerch farm stood (and still does) on the outskirts of South Bend, an ordinary farmhouse with the roof sweeping low over the entire building and no attic—no nook or crevice which could conceal a dead body.

Tom Lerch was a stern father who demanded absolute obedience from his two sons; 23 year old Jim, and especially 20 year old Oliver; however, there was nothing to indicate that he was unkind to the boys.

The house was the scene of a merry Christmas party, and young Oliver was in good spirits as he sang with his girl, pretty Lillian Hirach, daughter of a Chicago attorney, a friend of his father's who was also a guest. Jim had his attention also arrested by a young lady whom he later married. Altogether, perhaps twenty people were gathered around the piano, singing hymns and gay holiday songs. Nothing foretold of the grim tragedy which was to come.

Outside, the night was still and quiet. After a day of dimness and snowfall, the winds shifted and the clouds faded away. Now the moon shone down on a countryside charmingly beautiful with glistened snow. Around 10:00, Oliver's mother, who was preparing supper, called to him to fetch some water from the well. He smiled and excused himself from Miss Hirsch. He walked from the living room and put on his coat, cap and gloves. Then he went out into the calm night. That was the last time any person saw him on this earth.

Some minutes later, perhaps five, a horrible cry for help, so terrifying that it could be heard above the singing, split the serenity of the happy occasion. For a second the group in the house froze, looking at each other in astonishment; then with Tom Lerch in the lead they dashed out into the night. The cry sounded again, only this time it was fainter.

"Help, help… It's got me…" Oliver's terror-stricken voice called again, this time from a position above their heads.
